Carrying the thought further, since we know that the giraffe and the flying squirrel have been fashioned by their environment, or adaptation, can we not see that to change men we must change their conditions. Had you been a Methodist, born in a Southern planter's home, you would doubtless have thought slavery a God-ordained institution. Henry Ward Beecher and Wendell Phillips might have been colonels in the Southern army but for their birth and surroundings. Just as the plants in the Arctic region are in reality our oaks and elms, so man is a victim of heredity and environment.

But the most important question that engrosses the attention of mankind is, Whither do I go?

I am not interested in my personal condition after death. Otherworldliness has no place in my thoughts. If there is an immortal life I shall be the same in point of character, disposition and personality five minutes after death as five minutes before that event takes place. So, the important consideration will be as to what kind of character and disposition I possess this side of death. If when I die I wake up to find that I am not dead and I have a future to face, I will face it at that time. Now, the important thing to consider is the trend of the life here. Omar Khayyam has been dust for more than seven hundred years. He cried:

"I sent my soul through the invisible,
Some letter of the after-life to spell,
And by-and-by my soul returned to me
And answer'd, I Myself am Heav'n and Hell."

"Heaven, but the vision of fulfilled desire
And Hell, the shadow from a soul on fire."

Here and now we must face conditions, and our chief mission in life must be to seek to change conditions so that those who follow us will have a better environment than ours. To do this, the individual must seek to understand himself. I do not understand the influence of the will and the conscience upon my life, but as I meditate upon the development of reflex action into instinct, and instinct into reason, I find that I am a greater creature than I gave myself credit for being. Shakespeare makes his crazy Hamlet cry:

"What a piece of work is man!
How noble in reason! in action how like an angel! in apprehension how like a God!"

As I come to understand man's place in nature, I realize that there are possibilities undreamt of, and in seeking to understand myself, my first lesson is to respect myself. When I am tempted to do anything that would belittle the race or bring suffering upon the coming generations, I must stand upon my dignity as a man and cry, "I cannot allow myself to do it."

If I do not understand myself, then I cannot understand my brother; I know nothing of the motives that prompt his actions. Then I must not condemn him, but show sympathy towards him. This will prove the means whereby I shall so govern and control my own temper that I shall disdain to enter into the many factional fights that separate man from man and hinder cooperation. Let the trivial things pass. Because some old womanish creature puts his tongue out at me is no reason why I should put mine out in return. Because men cannot agree upon tactics is no reason why useful work should not be accomplished. If I take an attitude of this sort towards my fellows it will bring an influence to society at large that is much needed before man can be what he might become. Nature has demonstrated that those creatures survive the best who render mutual aid. There are many illustrations in the animal kingdom.

Man, the individual, is dependent upon Society. The organizations thriving the best are those where groups are cooperating. If some groups have become so powerful that they threaten the life of the community, it is because the larger groups are working as units. The study of evolution shows us the way. Our future development depends upon our trend today. In spite of many discouragements, lack of interest, blindness and ignorance on the part of the mass, prejudice on the part of those who should be the teachers of men, I cannot help but feel that we are going towards better conditions of life, and with Tennyson I say:

"I can but trust that good shall fall
At last—far off—at last, to all—
And every winter change to spring."

The greatest literature the world has ever seen is, in my judgment, the poetic—the dramatic; that is to say, the literature of fiction in its widest sense. Certainly if the church could have had control the plays of Shakespeare never would have been written; the literature of the stage could not have existed; most works of fiction, and nearly all poetry, would have perished in the brain. So I think it hardly fair to say that "the Bible has produced the richest and most varied literature the world has ever seen."—R. G. Ingersoll.

Pay your debts, but pay them in a value which is universally recognized. Above all, when it comes to debts of honor, to debts to which the nation's honor is pledged, then there is but one ground that a gentleman can take, and that is the ground of willingness to sacrifice every personal comfort and convenience for the sake of standing everlastingly by his word.—O. B. Frothingham.

The earth, if your God exists, would be only a detestable park, where he would have gathered together those condemned to death, galley slaves during their life. To create without reason in order to destroy without motive, would be his aim. What joy that brute must experience in seeing his creatures make the final sad plunge into eternity.—N. Simon.

When a man is wrong and won't admit it, he always gets angry.—Haliburton.

THE FREEDOM OF THOUGHT.

Its Early History and Progress Told in Paragraphs from a Notable Book.

By Prof. J. B. Bury.

II.

The Puritans who fled from the intolerance of the English church and state and founded colonies in New England, were themselves equally intolerant, not only to Anglicans and Catholics, but to Baptists and Quakers. To Roger Williams belongs the glory of having founded the first modern state which was really tolerant and was based on the principle of taking the control of religious matters entirely out of the hands of the civil government.

It must be added that in Maryland and a few southern states, Atheists still suffer from some political disabilities.

Under Cromwell's autocratic rule even the Anglicans lived in peace, and toleration was extended to the Jews. In these days, voices were raised from various quarters advocating toleration on general grounds. The most illustrious advocate was Milton, the poet, who was in favor of the severance of church from state. It is interesting to notice that Milton places freedom of thought above civil liberty: "Give me the liberty to know, to utter, and to argue freely according to conscience, above all other liberties."

In 1689 John Locke's famous (first) "Letter Concerning Toleration" appeared in Latin. This is a principle on which Locke repeatedly insists. If a state is justified in imposing a creed, it follows that in all the lands, except the one or few in which the true faith prevails, it is the duty of the subjects to embrace a false religion.

The Revolution established religious liberty in France, and in the preamble to the Declaration of Rights (1789) Deism was asserted by the words "in the presence and under the auspices of the Supreme Being" (against which only one voice protested). The Declaration laid down that no one was to be vexed on account of his religious opinions provided he did not thereby trouble public order. Mirabeau, the greatest statesman of the day, protested strongly against the use of words like "tolerance" and "dominant." The same protest was made in Thomas Paine's "Rights of Man" which appeared two years later: "Toleration is not the opposite of Intolerance, but is the counterfeit of it. Both are despotisms. The one assumes itself the right of withholding liberty of conscience, and the other of granting it." Paine was an ardent Deist, and he added: "Were a bill brought into any parliament, entitled 'An Act to tolerate or grant liberty to the Almighty to receive the worship of a Jew or a Turk,' or 'to prohibit the Almighty from receiving it,' all men would startle and call it blasphemy. There would be an uproar. The presumption of toleration in religious matters would then present itself unmasked."

The church in France was separated from the state by the Constitution of 1795, which affirmed the liberty of all worship and withdrew from the Catholic clergy the salaries which the state had hitherto paid. A new rationalistic religion was introduced under the name of Theophilanthropy. Its doctrines, briefly formulated, were: God, immortality, fraternity, humanity; no attacks on other religions, but respect and honor towards all. In 1801, though there seems to have been little discontent with the existing arrangement, Napoleon decided to upset it and bring the pope upon the scene.

Apart from its ecclesiastical policies and its experiments in new creeds based on the principles of rationalistic thinkers, the French Revolution itself has an interest, in connection with our subject, as an example of the coercion of reason by an intolerant faith.

The leaders believed that, by applying certain principles, they could regenerate France and show the world how the lasting happiness of mankind can be secured. They acted in the name of reason, but their principles were articles of faith, which were accepted just as blindly and irrationally as the dogmas of any supernatural creed.

The case for toleration was based by its German defenders chiefly on legal, not, as in England and France, on moral and intellectual grounds. But perhaps the most important fact of all in hastening the realization of religious liberty in Germany was the accession of a rationalist to the throne of Prussia in the person of Frederick the Great. His view that morality was independent of religion and therefore compatible with all religions, and that thus a man could be a good citizen—the only thing which the state was entitled to demand—whatever faith he might profess, led to the logical consequence of complete religious liberty. It is an important fact in history, which has hardly been duly emphasized, that full religious liberty was for the first time, in any country in modern Europe, realized under a Freethinking ruler, the friend of the great "blasphemer" Voltaire.

Extracted from a "A History of Freedom of Thought," by J. B. Bury, Litt.D., LL.D. Henry Holt & Co., New York. Price, 65 cents. Sold at the office of THE TRUTH SEEKER.

In Germany, England, and Italy, where the most powerful church or churches are under the control of the state, there is more freedom, more tolerance of opinion, than in many of the American states where separation prevails. A hundred years ago the Americans showed appalling ingratitude to Thomas Paine, who had done them eminent service in the War of Independence, simply because he published a very unorthodox book. It is notorious that Freethought is still a serious hindrance and handicap to an American, even in most of the universities. This proves that separation is not an infallible receipt for producing tolerance.

During the last three hundred years reason has been slowly but steadily destroying Christian mythology and exposing the pretensions of supernatural revelation. A disinterested love of facts, without any regard to the bearing which those facts may have on one's hopes or fears or destiny, is a rare quality in all ages, and it had been very rare indeed since the ancient days of Greece and Rome. It means the scientific spirit.

A striking illustration of the gradual encroachments of reason is the change which was silently wrought in public opinion on the subject of witchcraft. The last trial of a witch was in 1712, when some clergymen in Hertfordshire prosecuted Jane Wenham. The jury found her guilty, but the judge, who had summed up in her favor, was able to procure the remission of her sentence; and the laws against witchcraft were repealed in 1735. John Wesley said with perfect truth that to disbelieve in witchcraft is to disbelieve in the Bible.

Hobbes, who was perhaps the most brilliant English thinker of the seventeenth century, was a Freethinker and Materialist. What he really thought of religion could be inferred from his remark that the fanciful fear of things invisible (due to ignorance) is the natural seed of that feeling which, in himself, a man calls religion, but, in those who fear or worship the invisible power differently, superstition. In the reign of Charles II Hobbes was silenced and his books were burned.

Spinoza, the Jewish philosopher of Holland, conceived ultimate reality, which he called God, as an absolutely perfect, impersonal Being, a substance whose nature is constituted by two "attributes" thought and spatial extension. If we want his philosophy, we may say that it is pantheism. It has often been described. If Atheism means, as I suppose in it is generally taken to mean, reject personal God, Spinoza was an Atheist. observed that in the seventeenth centuries Atheist was used in the term of abuse for Freethinkers, an of Atheists (except in careful were really Deists, that is, they sonal God but not in revelation.

John Locke wrote a book to show that Christian revelation is not contrary to reason. In the title, the "Reasonableness of Christianity," he notes that the note of all religious controversy during the next hundred years.

It is characteristic of this stage between reason and authority that leading French thinkers in the eighteenth century, the Rationalists, who attacked feigned to acknowledge the truth they were assailing. They speculations did not affect religious rate the domains of reason.

If Locke's philosophy place and deriving was a powerful work. Henry Bayle worked out a investigation of his lived at Amsterdam. philosophical Dictionary, but he never finished it, and this lends

The Dictionary to the moral existence of God is able to find in lives, he would their vices, but criminals you actions make you phemies prove

THE REVIVAL RACKET.

An estimate of the sums withdrawn by the most thrifty of evangelists from the cities he has invaded during the last seven years is contained in Current Opinion:

Boston, Mass.	$55,000.00
Philadelphia, Pa.	51,136.85
Paterson, N. J.	25,000.00
Omaha, Neb.	20,000.00
Syracuse, N. Y.	25,000.00
Trenton, N. J.	35,000.00
Baltimore, Md.	40,000.00
Kansas City, Mo.	32,000.00
Pittsburgh, Pa.	46,000.00
Scranton, Pa.	22,398.00
Wilkes-Barre, Pa.	22,288.90
Columbus, O.	20,939.58
Wheeling, W. Va.	17,450.00
Toledo, O.	15,423.00
Johnstown, Pa.	14,000.00
McKeesport, Pa.	13,438.00
Des Moines, Ia.	13,000.00
Canton, O.	12,500.00
Springfield, O.	12,000.00
Erie, Pa.	11,565.00
South Bend, Ind.	11,200.00
Wichita, Kan.	10,111.00
Denver, Colo.	10,000.00
Beaver Falls, Pa.	10,000.00
Lima, O.	8,050.00
Portsmouth, O.	7,100.00
Colorado Springs, Col.	5,611.58

Total$566,114.91

These sums are alleged to come under the head of what the management has the humor to call "free will offerings," but the Rev. Hamilton Schuyler of Trenton, where the Sunday outfit showed last year, says otherwise. According to him, writing in the American Church Monthly (New York), the evangelist's methods "approximate the nature of polite blackmail." We wonder at the word "polite," but quote the Rev. Schuyler:

"The facts show that the so-called 'free-will' offerings are in reality not such at all, but are the direct result of a well-considered, highly organized and systematic plan that is the very negative of the spontaneous spirit.

"At every meeting urgent appeals are made for generous contributions to defray the cost of the campaign. When these are assured, as is usually the case two or three weeks before the campaign closes, there is inaugurated a systematic canvass for funds to swell the free-will offering for the personal benefit of the revivalist. The town is districted in accordance with a scheme which is carefully studied out, and a host of solicitors appointed. The various individuals are visited and pledges secured.

"The large shops and industrial plants have usually their own special corps of collectors and 'boomers,' foremen and superintendents wherever possible being selected to act in such capacity. Employees of these various establishments are given to understand that a certain definite minimum is expected of them, and evidence of unwillingness on their part to contribute does not, it is safe to say, serve to commend defaulters to the good grace of their superiors. In the case of business and professional men, efforts to obtain contributions are equally systematic. Often an exact sum is specified. Individuals are told that they are rated as belonging to a certain group of givers. They are five-dollar men, ten-dollar men, or higher, as the case may be.

"Pressure of every sort is employed to induce the giving of the sum fixed upon as representing their proper share. In some instances it is not too much to say that arguments are used which approximate the nature of a polite blackmail. Appeals based upon civic pride, the fine advertisement which the city will get if the offerings for the revivalist reach a certain sum, are freely resorted to."

Reports of the working of the machine in New York show that the same sort of pressure is applied here, and that hundreds of the trail-hitters are not volunteers but conscripts.

"Over in the ministers' benches," runs the report of the day's razzapazazza at the tabernacle, "an elderly gentleman of benign aspect and courtly bearing smiled in warm approval and started to applaud. His name was Lyman Abbott. To judge from his frequent nods of commendation and smiles of approval, Dr. Abbott was pleased, on the whole, with the sermon he heard." Dr. Abbott is a believer in evolution. The preacher of the sermon in question has given his high disapproval of evolution in the following words:

"I don't believe your old bastard theory of evolution either; I believe it's pure jackass nonsense."

And of its clerical exponents, like Dr. Abbott, he observed:

"If a minister believes in evolution, he is a stinking skunk, a hypocrite and a liar."

Once a minister asked the evangelist if he could not modify this language regarding clerical adherents of evolution, and the latter replied:

"Stand up, there, you bastard evolutionist! Stand up with the Atheists and Infidels and the whoremongers and the adulterers, and go to hell."

The sermon that Dr. Abbott greeted with "frequent nods of commendation and smiles of approval" omitted these trenchant passages, no doubt.

It appears that the Tabernacle Terror is entitled to his D.D., that degree (honorary) having been conferred upon him by Westminster College, a one-horse religious institution in Pennsylvania, in 1912. In our pamphlet, "The Case of Billy Sunday," we inadvertently alluded to "his fraudulent D.D. from a Pennsylvania college which never confers that degree." The allusion was justified, however, at the time, on the strength of the following:

"To the Editor of the Sun—Sir: I am herewith enclosing clipping from the Sun under date of Wednesday, March 10, from an editorial article entitled 'The Whitefield of Winona Lake.'

"I beg leave to advise you that the Rev. William A. Sunday has not received the degree of D.D. from the Pennsylvania College for Women. This institution has not given this degree in its history.

"We shall appreciate correction of the statement in your columns. JOHN C. ACHESON.

"Pittsburg, March 11.

"We hasten to publish this authoritative statement by the president of the Pennsylvania College for Women. The most recent edition of 'Who's Who in America' contains a biographical or autobiographical sketch of the career of the Rev. William Ashley Sunday, evangelist, in which it is alleged that he received in 1912 from the Pennsylvania College for Women the degree of doctor of divinity."—New York Sun, March 14, 1915.

Correcting the misinformation which the biographer of the evangelist gave to the publishers of "Who's Who in America" leaves the Rev. Sunday in possession of his unearned honor and absolves the Pennsylvania College for Women.

Dr. C. A. Beverly of Lily Dale, N. Y., states in Science of Life (Hamburg, N. Y.) that he was the Rev. W. A. Sunday's family physician for ten years and is still waiting for his fees. "He [the Rev. W. A. Sunday] says my doctor's bill against the estate is outlawed. His grandfather never paid anything; neither does Billy." The Rev. Sunday's personal reputation does not appear to be good. Last year someone sent us a newspaper that had the account of his betrayal of a young girl, illustrated with a picture of her grave. Names, places and dates were given. Confronted with the story when he was out west, his answer was that this occurred before he was "saved." But we hear from a man in New York who has known him for thirty years that he was always "saved"—that is, he was always religious, even as a boy, and had the unpleasant habit of preaching to his team mates when he played ball. There is evidence that the Rev. Dr. Sunday's moral sense is under-developed or arrested in its growth.

Isadora Duncan, the pioneer demonstrator of the interpretative poetical dance, whom we first saw twenty-five years ago turning the poetry and blasphemies of Omar Khayyam into the music of motion, is an avowed pagan. Called on for a speech at the final appearance of her company at the Metropolitan Opera House the other evening, she evoked vigorous and repeated applause by saying: "I myself am a child of Plato, Socrates, Galileo, Darwin, Huxley, Haeckel and Walt Whitman, yet today a rich American pays a man to come here to tell us that those great and noble men are burning in hell. All I can say is that if he believes there is such a place he had better go there." Miss Duncan and her dances have been the target for some of the Rev. Dr. W. A. Sunday's indecencies. He may have understood that her graceful evolutions in the interpretative dance are the same thing as Darwinism.

Prominently connected with the revival conducted by the gutter evangelist in Boston was Mr. Percy Barrows, a well-known organist and Sunday school teacher. Mr. Barrows, according to a report in the Boston Post, has pleaded guilty in the Superior Criminal Court to an indictment charging him in ten counts with assault on boys of his Sunday school class. We have frequently mentioned the need of parents being warned against trusting their children with men of whose character they know nothing further than that they make religious professions and take an active part in church work. This is no guarantee, not even an indication, that they are morally straight. The gutter evangelist has been unfortunate in the men he has had with him in getting up his revivals.

For hundreds of years the Bible was the standard, and whenever anything was asserted in any science contrary to the Bible, the church immediately denounced the scientist. I admit the standard has been changed, and ministers are very busy, not trying to show that science does not agree with the Bible, but that the Bible agrees with science.—R. G. Ingersoll.

He who sows God, gathers the priest. This latter is really the parasite of divinity and the itch fly of gods.—N. Simon.

God and My Neighbors.

We Reubs want to know two things especially: First, how to raise corn without moisture; second, how to raise it in a mud-hole.

My young friend Fritz, a New York agriculturist, writes me that the back-to-the-landers in his section have gone back to their old jobs in the city to earn money to farm on.

In my opinion Billy Sunday is the Real Thing. He preaches boldly what the churches have in their creeds but are ashamed or afraid to mention. Advanced theologians accept in theory the findings of science, of historical and literary criticism, but in practice ignore these and act as though what they know to be myths were facts instead. Now, Billy denies all these results of men's research. He is more consistent than are those scholarly divines who associate with him. If he is a liar and a fraud, so was Paul, so was Peter. Does he resort to all sorts of undignified and ungentlemanly tricks to draw the crowds? Pray how did the holy men of old, the prophets of Jehovah, disport themselves when they wished to attract attention? Billy has not yet, I fancy, gone far enough to appear in public without clothing.

Hezekiah has died and been canonized. Preachers and other friends of his have vied with one another in their tributes to his virtues. They praise his caution, his conservatism, his record as a clean man, a good husband and father. He loved his church. He was a friend of God. He was pure gold.

And Heine, who knew Hezekiah well, says that all these encomiums are well deserved, that all the praise bestowed upon his dead friend are but his due. But Heine, who is a bit of a philosopher, seeks to explain some things concerning Hezekiah, which cause me to pity as well as to admire.

Hezekiah was a poor boy who worked hard to educate himself. He became a teacher, was successful as such, and soon became prominent as an educator. In time he left school work for journalism, and in this field of labor he was also successful. But success is not easy. Hezekiah's life was not one of sloth. He married a wife with aristocratic traditions. Children came to be reared and educated. His family must hold its own in society. Hezekiah's life was one of perpetual struggle. He had to be cautious, conservative; he dared not be otherwise. Besides, his health became poor, he was for years a man working and suffering. He was a self-made man whose education was chiefly literary. He had not the scientific mind. He was ill and somewhat morbid. Hence, his devotion to the church, his brooding over thoughts of death, his dreams of the chance for him to live another, a painless life. And thus did he become the ally of the preachers, and after his death to be canonized by them.

And Heine says that there were so many excellent qualities in Hezekiah that it is to be regretted that he could not have been more free to develop his own individuality, to live up to his best self.

In his answer to the Baptists who were enraged because they were not allowed to go in and "save" the soldiers encamped along the border, General Funston said some pretty good things. Here are a few quoted from the Literary Digest:

"I say frankly that I would not want to take chances on allowing a series of revivals in these great camps. I am justified in giving the word 'revival' its usually accepted meaning—a series of meetings continuing day and night for an indefinite period, with loud exhortation and singing and much emotionalism.

"How about the rights of the men who do not want to attend revivals and who do not wish to be disturbed by them? Are they to be compelled to leave the camp, which is their home, and wander about downtown or through fields to get away from them? Has a man no rights because he is a soldier?

"There are many religious people who disapprove strongly of revivals with their attendant emotionalism. And, anyhow, be a man religious or irreligious, be he Hebrew, Christian or Mohammedan, no other person has a right to rub his belief or his form of worship into his face—that is, to bring it into the place where he has a right to be, and where he cannot escape from it without abandoning that place.

"Soldiers must be protected from imposition by their superior officers, and, if these officers from weakness or other reason, fail in their duty, their only recourse is submission or riot; and it is a safe guess that the latter is what you would have got with a typical old-fashioned revival in any one of the camps."

Betsy says, "If there is no God, what makes it thunder?" And William, "What makes things grow, if there is no God?"

God is the sum of the not understood.

But Thomas R. says there is too much science in the schools.

ROBINSON CRUSOE.

THE TRUTH SEEKER

Published weekly by the Truth Seeker Company, President, George E. Macdonald; Secretary, James A. Conway, 62 Vesey street, New York.

Entered at the Postoffice, New York, N. Y., as second-class matter.

Address communications and make drafts, checks, postoffice and express money orders payable to THE TRUTH SEEKER, 62 Vesey street, New York.

Subscription Rates.

Single subscription in advance . . $3.00
Two new subscribers 5.00
One subscription two years in advance 5.00
One subscription and one new subscriber, in one remittance . . . 5.00
To all foreign countries except Mexico, 50 cents per annum extra.
Subscriptions received for any length of time under a year at the rate of 25 cents per month. Can be begun at any time.
Single copies, 10 cents.

SPECIAL NOTICE.—We shall be obliged to our readers if they will send us the name and address of any Free-thinker who is not a regular subscriber.

OBJECTS.

It is the object of THE TRUTH SEEKER to educate the people out of religious superstition. It denies the inspiration and infallibility of the Bible, and asserts the human origin of that book. It denies the existence of the theological heaven and hell, but as to the existence and immortality of the soul neither affirms nor denies. It waits for evidence.

THE TRUTH SEEKER upholds the theory of Evolution, believing that to be the solution of the question of the origin, growth, and development of the animal kingdom, including man. THE TRUTH SEEKER believes that the answer to the questions Whence? and Whither? can be given only by Science.

THE TRUTH SEEKER holds that morality and ethics—or man's relation to man—are entirely independent of creed or religion, and are founded on rules developed by experience.

In current politics THE TRUTH SEEKER takes no side or part. In general it holds to the principles of freedom enunciated by the Founders of the Republic.

THE TRUTH SEEKER believes in Free Speech, Free Press, and Free Mails; in full discussion of all sides of all subjects, and affords those having new and worthy thoughts, clearly stated, a generous and welcome hearing, each contributor being responsible for his own opinion. We neither indorse an idea by printing it, nor condemn it by exclusion.

THE TRUTH SEEKER is the recognized medium of communication between the Liberals of the country, and is edited each week for their information, instruction, entertainment, and support against religious error and mental slavery and in maintenance of their equal civil and religious rights as citizens of the United States.

The Editor invites communications on the subjects to which these pages are devoted.

POLITICAL PRINCIPLES.

(THE NINE DEMANDS OF LIBERALISM.)

1. We demand that churches and other ecclesiastical property shall be no longer exempt from taxation.
2. We demand that the employment of chaplains in Congress, in the Legislatures, in the navy and militia, and in prisons, asylums and all other institutions supported by public money shall be discontinued.
3. We demand that all public appropriations for educational and charitable institutions of a sectarian character shall cease.
4. We demand that all religious services now sustained by the government shall be abolished; and especially that the use of the Bible in the public schools, whether ostensibly as a text-book or avowedly as a book of religious worship, shall be prohibited.
5. We demand that the appointment by the President of the United States or by the governors of the various states, of all religious festivals and fasts shall wholly cease.
6. We demand that the judicial oath in the courts and in all other departments of the government shall be abolished, and that simple affirmation under the pains and penalties of perjury shall be established in its stead.
7. We demand that all laws directly or indirectly enforcing the observance of Sunday as the Sabbath shall be repealed.
8. We demand that all laws looking to the enforcement of "Christian" morality shall be abrogated and that all laws shall be conformed to the requirements of natural morality, equal rights, and impartial liberty.

9. We demand that not only in the Constitution of the United States and of the several states, but also in the practical administration of the same, no privileges or advantages shall be conceded to Christianity or any other special religion; that our entire political system shall be founded and administered on a purely secular basis; and that whatever changes shall prove necessary to this end shall be consistently, unflinchingly, and promptly made.

Letters of Friends

Readers desirous of communicating with the writers of the letters in this department may address them in care of THE TRUTH SEEKER, 62 Vesey street, New York, N. Y., and the letters will be re-addressed and forwarded.

THE DUTY OF THE AMERICAN FARMER.

From Gifford Pinchot, Pennsylvania.

To the Editor of The Truth Seeker:

In this great time, when every citizen must do his part, the President has made his chief appeal to the men who live on the land. He is right in doing so, for the safety of our country just now is in the hands of our farmers. What I mean is not merely our safety and the safety of our Allies in the matter of food. I mean that the safety of the United States against foreign invasion hangs on the decision of the farmers of the forty-eight states.

The two great weapons in this war are arms and starvation. The war against German arms will be won or lost in France—the war against starvation will be won or lost in America. The kaiser cannot whip the French and English armies and the English navy while England has food. But it is still possible that the German submarines may be able to keep food enough from reaching England to starve her into submission.

If the submarines win, the first item in the kaiser's terms of peace will be the English fleet. With the English fleet in his possession, the kaiser will be master of the world.

What will happen to us then? Every man who stops to think knows the answer. We shall have money, food, labor, land—everything that is desirable in the world except the power to protect what we have. Experts estimate that it will take us nine months to get ready to meet a German army of even 150,000 men, with modern artillery. Under such circumstances, would the Germans treat us better than they have already treated Belgium and France?

Even if the armies of our Allies should crush the German military power this summer, before the shortage of food can reach the point of want, the world would still need vast quantities of American food. But if they do not, only one course can make us safe, and that is to grow food enough on our farms for ourselves and our Allies, and to put ships enough on the sea to carry the food, in spite of the submarines, to the men who are fighting our fight.

If the war lasts beyond this summer, it will be the American farmer who will win or lose the war, who will overcome militarism and autocracy, or allow them to spread and control the world, ourselves included.

This is no fanciful picture, but sober fact. Many a man will make light of it until he comes to think it over, but I venture to say that few will treat it lightly after careful thought. It is no more impossible than the great war itself appeared to be, only a few days before it began.

It is true that we can greatly increase the available food supply out of grain now used in making liquors, and by reducing household waste. But when these two things are done, and done thoroughly, they will not be enough. The final decision will still rest in the hands of the men who raise our food in the first place.

The clear duty of the nation is to guarantee the farmers a fair price for their crops when grown, and a reasonable supply of labor at harvest. The clear duty of the farmer is to raise food enough to win this war for democracy against kaiserism.

No such responsibility has ever rested on any class of men since the world began as rests today on the farmers of America.

THE SOUL AND SCIENCE.

From W. S. Bryan, Tennessee.

To the Editor of The Truth Seeker:

Intelligent Spiritualists very rarely pay any attention to dogmatic outbursts like that of "Redcote Dewar" in your issue of April 21, chiefly because the writers show by their own statements that they know nothing, or but little, about the subject. Mr. Dewar infers that Spiritualists base their belief largely on the writings of Sir Oliver Lodge and the worthless mouthings of professional "mediums," when in fact none of these is essential. There is a vast literature on Spiritualism, from some of the best, the purest, and the most sensible men and women that the world has produced; but Mr. Dewar seems to know nothing about this literature. Like many others who issue dictums, he is as completely in the dark as if he had never given the subject a thought. Intelligent Spiritualists pay very little attention to the writings of Sir Oliver Lodge on this subject, because, like too many other scientists, he allows his emotions and predilections to get the better of his reason; and as to the common public medium, the intelligent Spiritualist has no more faith in their fulminations than he has in the so-called "inspired" writings of the Bible. Both stand on about the same level.

The future will no more repudiate the palpable truths of Spiritualism than the past and the present have repudiated them. These truths will continue to gain a wider and stronger hold on the thinking part of humanity in the future, just as they have done in the past; until it will become merely a matter of intelligence, or knowledge of the subject, whether a man believes or not. Indeed, it has about reached that point now.

When and where did Mr. Dewar discover that the Greeks did not believe in immortality? If they had no such belief, whence came their gods, who were invariably the spirits of mortals? And, moreover, what difference does it make, so far as the truths of Spiritualism are concerned, whether the Greeks believed in immortality or not? The two subjects have not the slightest relation to one another. A man may believe whatever he pleases, without his belief having any connection with truth. For instance, a great many otherwise intelligent people believe, sincerely believe, that the whale swallowed Jonah; but if the whale were still alive he would laugh at their folly.

And what does Haeckel, or any other man, know about the soul, any more, for instance, than I do? Has he ever seen one, or made demonstrations that would have infallibly revealed one if it had been present? No! So far as the soul is concerned, Haeckel is as ignorant as a little child. Then by what authority does he issue the dictum that the "soul is not a special immaterial entity, but the sum of a number of connected functions in the brain; when the brain dies the soul comes to an end"? So far as the reality or non-reality of the soul is concerned, these dogmatists have no more value than the personal opinions of an ignoramus. Please understand me, I am not intimating that Haeckel is an ignoramus on general principles; for within his own sphere he is one of the world's intellectual leaders. But he knows nothing about the soul, and consequently has no right to issue dictums in that sphere. It would have been becoming if, in the realm of the soul, Mr. Haeckel had remained silent. It would have been even more becoming if he had declared that he knew nothing about the subject, and therefore had nothing to say. Haeckel's course during the kaiser's war has shown that he is not capable of logical reasoning on all subjects, and his statements should be accepted, just as we accept those of all philosophers and writers, only to the extent that our reason and common sense and demonstrated fact justify.

Again, what difference does it make what Professor Wineberg, or any other scientist or individual, believes about a personal god, or immortality? He has never seen a god or an immortal soul, and consequently he knows nothing about them, and has no right to declare that "no scientist" can believe in such things. Such a declaration only demonstrates the professor's ignorance of that particular subject, and his narrowness of mind which indicates that he is not a safe teacher. Neither do I believe that there is a personal god, and yet for all that I know there may be such a creature, with long gray beard, sitting on a throne in the clouds wielding a golden scepter. But I do know something about souls, because I have investigated that subject; and consequently I am a better "soulologist" than Dr. Wineburg, or Dr. Haeckel, or Dr. Anybody Else who has never given this particular subject any intelligent thought. Napoleon was a great general, but he was a failure as a novelist, a historian, and a poet. It would be more becoming if some others would follow Napoleon's example, and confine their activities to subjects that they are familiar with.

The physiologist, let him be ever so learned and able in his special field, cannot solve the riddle of the soul any more than an ignoramus can. The physiologist is supposed to be familiar with the mechanism of the body and brain, but he knows nothing about the invisible power that moves and controls these. When the soul departs, the brain and the muscles cease their actions. The master is gone and the servants quit work. If consciousness is not outside of the body why does the man cease thinking when he is dead? Simply because the thinking part has gone somewhere else. The old simile of the watch is too absurd for more than a passing notice. Will a watch run without a mainspring? and does not the mainspring represent something higher than mere physical action? It is the thought that has gone into the mainspring which makes it work.

Will Mr. Dewar please tell me what gravity is? If he will demonstrate that he knows beyond all peradventure what gravity is, then I may be inclined to accept some of his other theories, absurd though they now appear. I am especially interested in this subject of gravity, because my friend, Dr. See, the famous astronomer, has recently promulgated a new theory as to the source of this principle, which is at complete variance with all previous theories. Perhaps Mr. Dewar knows all about gravity, as he seems to think he does about most other subjects under the sun, and if so he ought to inform a waiting and anxious world. Gravity has nothing to do with the blowing down of the walls of Jericho, because gravity is a real thing, though we cannot see it—as Mr. Dewar can assure himself by allowing some workman to drop a hod of brick on his head—while the story of Jericho and its walls is merely a silly yarn to please children.

By what authority does any one accuse Sir Oliver Lodge of denying the essential truths of what is known as Darwinism? With all his failings (and he has them) Sir Oliver has never made any such declaration. Nothing that he might say on any subject ought to have much weight if he did, for "Darwinism," like gravity, is a truth that proves itself. And Spiritualism, soul immortality, individual continuity, is the natural and logical outcome of evolution. It makes no difference if there are a few souls so mean that they do not care to live on, they do and will "live on," just the same. The proper thing for such souls to do is to get knowledge and become worthy of a continuous existence.

REPRINTS.

The Truth Seeker Company has just issued new editions of the following pamphlets, the large sales of which testify to their merits, usefulness and interest:

"An Open Letter to Jesus (Immanuel J.) Christ," by D. M. Bennett, 10 cents.

"Pocket Theology," by Voltaire, 25 cents.

AGNOSTICISM AND SPIRITISM.

From P. O. Hopkins, Ohio.

To the Editor of The Truth Seeker:

I believe all who have read the article by my friend Mr. Thomas will agree he has made spiritualism as clear as mud. He declares there is no such thing as the absolute, and then vehemently swears "All life is eternal"—strongest kind of "absolutism." This is the first brick he cast through the gable of his glass house in which he and the spirits reside.

Then he says spiritualism is a "science." Now science deals with and demonstrates facts and has nothing in common with myths, spooks and a lot of gibberish enacted by a charlatan in a dark cabinet in a darkened room. There is as much science (and no more) about spiritualism as there is Christian science which is a misnomer in both cases, and here went rock number two through the other gable.

As to Agnosticism being "knownothingism," this was simply a handy phrase for friend Thomas. Some Agnostics are thoroughly informed on practically all intelligent subjects, but when we do not, and cannot know anything about a harp or home in the skies, or spirits chasing around trying to speak to us but fail except through a medium we frankly admit we do not know any thing about such things as they have never been demonstrated to an unbiased mind and are only beliefs or hallucinations.

Science operates in the broad light guided by reason and intelligent thinking, while spiritualism stages its greatest pretended manifestations in the dark. It is always more convenient to perform tricks in the dark, thereby deceiving those who wish to believe in spite of evidence to the contrary. Here you sent a missile through your rear wall of glass.

Friend Thomas, your conception of "knownothings" must be spiritual and not material, else you would not call the brightest men who have graced this globe knownothings. Voltaire, Thomas Paine, Thomas Jefferson, Huxley, Darwin, Ingersoll, Haeckel, Mangasarian and many others who have given to the world scientific facts and volumes of splendid, refined, eloquent literature that will never perish from the earth so long as men love facts better than fiction, truth more than imagination and hallucination.

Has Agnosticism done nothing? is it doing nothing now?

Dear Mr. Spiritist, it was Agnosticism that broke the idols of paganism, that throttled and halted the ruthless march and murder of superstition, and finally, that wrote that matchless instrument, the Declaration of Independence. It is Agnosticism that is now pushing forward and breaking through the remaining bars that the monster superstition has erected against freedom of press and speech. Each and every liberty we enjoy is the result of active Agnosticism and Agnostics.

Do you call this "donothingism"? Have you anything like this to the credit of spookism? And I heard the whole structure fall as this brick went crashing through your glass front.

We can see a shadow, but can not see a spirit, therefore a spirit must be less than a shadow and I have never been able to understand how it is possible for a something (or, rather, nothing) thinner than a shadow to be able to send messages to friends, or enjoy or suffer in another world. When the material brain ceases to perform its function there is no more consciousness therefore no more communication.

You say you believe in "dreams and visions," really Mr. Thomas you are going the limit. You should not speak of evolution when a person can believe that kind of dope he is capable of believing anything, even to transubstantiation or spiritualism, and there is as much evidence in the one case as the other, except, in the one you get a piece of bread, while in the other you get the hole in the doughnut.

Don't worry about your departed son, brother Thomas, he is all right, and you will be all right and feeling fine if you will wake up your thinking machine, get away from dreams and fake messages coming from another world which does not exist and inject a little virulent Agnosticism to circulating through your anatomy.

I am somewhat alarmed at your condition, dear Mr. Thomas, and if I were to diagnose your case, I would say, you have become dangerously inoculated with the virus of religion or paganism called Christianity or superstition and that ere long you will likely be going to five o'clock mass, bowing and flirting with the "host" or else join the hallelujah crowd of Billy Sunday, either of which is fatal to evolution or intelligent thinking.

IS THE "ALL" GOD?

From D. F. Sweetland, Illinois.

To the Editor of The Truth Seeker:

The Washington Park Bug Club has opened up for the season to discuss all questions that may arise. As yet but little has been talked of beside the war. Bishop Burke is on hand ready to defend "the Supreme Court of Truth," as he styles the Roman Catholic church.

Last summer I was quite successful (in my mind, at least) in arguing with him on the second question in the catechism. The question is: "What is God?" and the answer given is: "The maker of all things." I contended that this is no definition, as it merely tells what God worked at and gives no description of what he is; that the definition is an impossible one.

It says the creator of all things. God, if he exists, must be some thing; if not, he surely doesn't exist. If he is something, then he created himself according to this definition. This he couldn't do, because he would have to pre-exist in order to be on the job. If he pre-existed he was already in existence and had no need to be created. The only answer the bishop could give to this argument was: "I don't see how a person can fail to believe in God."

In arguing thus, I once ran up against a man who said he was a Vedantic philosopher and that my argument was of no account. He denied that there was such a thing as the All, space being unlimited and filled with the natural, the material must be unlimited. The word all, he claimed, was a term of limitation just as much as any given number, say 6 or 10. The theologians, however, make an extravagant use of the word all. Dowie had a motto that "God was all, over all, through all, in all." All was the biggest word he could think of, so God must be it; but the idea of being all contradicts the idea of supremacy. To be supreme there must be something to be supreme over. The Supreme Court is over the inferior courts. A supreme ham is one that is better than the other hams, so a supreme being is a being over inferior beings, and not an all, which would include the inferior.

Draper, in his "Conflict Between Science and Religion," says: "There is no supreme being, but there is a supreme power." A supreme power couldn't be all the power. If so there couldn't be any inferior powers. So it would seem that universal unlimited being would be a better term for the biggest thing that is than the all. All the gods the theologians have brought out are not as big as Nature. They are only parts of nature. The whole is greater than any of its parts.

A SIGNIFICANT SILENCE.

From J. T. Cummings, Massachusetts.

To the Editor of The Truth Seeker:

Self-sacrifice is an admirable thing in theory, but in the matter of practice, its most ardent advocates often show apostasy. Nothing could better illustrate this fact than the attitude assumed by the churches toward one of the most important features of the prohibition agitation.

None need be told that the adoption of country-wide prohibition would affect not only the business of making, distilling and brewing wines, spirits and malted beverages, but all of the many tributary industries as well, thus throwing out of employment hundreds of thousands of men, most of whom would find it difficult, if not impossible, to engage in other occupations. To these add the families of the workers so ruthlessly deprived of their means of livelihood, and it will readily be seen that the problem is not one to be treated with the contempt characteristic of rabid fanatics when their schemes meet with opposition.

But it is to the hypocrisy and sordidness revealed by discussions of the financial bearings of proposed prohibitory legislation that we would call special attention. The revenue derived by the United States government from the manufacture and sale of liquors is of such importance that its loss would have to be made up from other sources. But when the question is asked, On what shall taxes be imposed for this purpose? it is answered, in some quarters, by impracticable suggestions, while the churches are significantly silent. Yet, what is more reasonable than to suppose that, for the sake of "maintaining a principle," they would be not only willing but eager to make a sacrifice in its behalf commensurate with the nature of the conditions they so lachrymously and hyperbolically denounce from the house-tops?

Alas! the church, like many a philanthropic individual whose susceptibilities are over-sensitive where his pocketnerve is concerned, shrinks and trembles at the thought of expending money, though it never hesitates to accept it, even from testators who, in making their bequests, have, with known malignity, ignored needy and worthy relatives, friends and objects.

The value of untaxed property in the United States (principally that of churches and colleges) is enormous. Assessed, as it ought to be, like other possessions, real and personal, it would, at least, supply the deficiency of revenue that general prohibition would create. For many years, eminent political economists have urged that this be done in common fairness to the unequally taxed people, but we know of but one instance in which a churchman has agreed with them. The Rev. Dr. Hawthorne, a Baptist minister of Atlanta, Ga., said, in September, 1894: "In exempting church property from taxation, the state patronizes religion. It gives to the church whose property it exempts its just proportion of the sum needed to defray the expenses of the government. This is a violation of the law of religious liberty, because it compels the Jew, the Atheist and the Deist to contribute to the support of a religion which they repudiate. If the state should exempt bar-rooms from taxation, it would thereby compel every taxpayer to contribute to the support of bar-rooms. Is it any less a violation of the rights of conscience to make churches beneficiaries of the government, and thereby compel men to support a religion with which they have no sympathy? The burden of supporting any religion should fall only upon those who believe in it, and desire to see its principles and practices upheld and promulgated."

There spoke a man with some appreciation of equity and justice, but his brethren, nowadays, want no mention of the subject on which he was so emphatic. Indeed, the silence thereon of church people generally indicates a desire to shirk all responsibility for the deprivations and financial losses they are so insistent on inflicting. Even now, when a declaration of war with Germany has brought this country face to face with oppressive taxation for its conduct, and the collection of revenue from every possible source is imperative, the churches are shouting for prohibition as a "war measure," a measure which would, of course, cut down the government's receipts by many millions. It is a characteristic and transparent trick, but no observant Liberalist has failed to note that, amidst the ostentatious avowals of "devotion to the flag," accompanying the demand, there is not so much as a whisper of indemnifying cash. Ah, no! While the present wearers of halos—prospective wearers of golden crowns—are experts at devices for getting money from the "unchurched millions," wherewith to "support the gospel," these thankless recipients of free public protection and favors, paid for by the self-same millions, have no notion whatever of supporting the government with the strongest of all sinews of war.

But since church edifices are not too sacred to be used as theatres and concert halls, and for other secular purposes, they are not too sacred to be taxed. Therefore, the most effective means for obviating a possible monetary stringency, in this emergency, may be expressed in three words—Tax the Churches.

A SECRET SOCIETY OF FREE-THINKERS.

From Quixote, Massachusetts.

To the Editor of The Truth Seeker:

Apropos of a recent suggestion in regard to organizing Freethinkers, I would say, why not? "United we stand, divided we fall." I believe it as necessary for self-preservation and for the diffusion of our principles as for any other body, such as the Freemasons, Oddfellows, etc. I am a member of those organizations and have made many friends, and enjoy opportunities extended in that way, of association with good people. It will be apparent, however, that I am unable to wholly reconcile my freethought leanings with some of the teachings, etc.

I wrote you some time ago to inquire if you knew of any fellow-Agnostics in this city (Worcester, Mass.), but heard nothing from you. Using my own desire as a basis, it seems to me there must be others, perhaps in this city, who would like to get in touch with fellow-Freethinkers, consequently why not carry the idea a bit further and figure that a secret society of Freethinkers would find ready acceptance? It would need to be "secret" because of the well-known "gentle opposition" from our more Christianlike fellow-citizens.

Let us organize, and, through this organization, secure legislation favorable to our cause, et cetera.

I wish you would consider submitting this in your Missionary Department, or elsewhere.

A NEW RECRUIT.

From J. D., New York.

To the Editor of The Truth Seeker:

Your issue of April 21st, inquires: "Why does not God stop the war? The fact that it is permitted to go on is inconsistent with a belief that he exists."

Perhaps Divine Providence takes little interest in the war because at present it is engaged in the more important business of watching the sparrows fall.

EVOLUTION OF THE IDEA OF GOD.

By Grant Allen.

This work traces the genesis of the belief in a God from its earliest origin in the mind of primitive man up to its fullest development in advanced Christian theology.

Price, paper, 45 cents

Address, THE TRUTH SEEKER CO
62 Vesey St., New York.Religion and the Bible

Series of Sixteen Freethought Essays

BY F. D. CUMMINGS.

SUBJECTS.

Introduction. I. The God and Man of the Bible. II. God and the Devil. III. Is the Bible Contradictory? IV. Jesus—Was He the Fulfillment of Hebrew Prophecy and Expectancy? V. Jesus, the Teacher of Righteousness. VI. Did the Disciples Look for an Immediate Resurrection? VII. What Does the Bible Teach Regarding the Second Coming of Christ? VIII. The Christ Spirit Outside the Bible. IX. What Is the Bible? X. How Man Advances. XI. Why Do Men Cling to the Bible? XII. Belief, Unbelief, Faith, Reason, and Prayer. XIII. Is There a God? XIV. Reward and Punishment. XV. Immortality. XVI. Conclusion.

A Book That Should Be in the Hands of All Who Seek the Light.

PAPER, 50 CENTS; CLOTH, $1.

Address, THE TRUTH SEEKER CO.,
62 Vesey Street, New York.

CHILDREN'S CORNER FOR BOYS AND GIRLS YOUNG AND OLD

"Between the dark and the daylight,
When the night is beginning to lower,
Comes a pause in the day's occupations
That is known as the Children's Hour."

FREETHOUGHT CALENDAR.

CONDUCTED BY FRANKLIN STEINER.

Edward C. Reichwald, March 7, 1849.

Edward C. Reichwald, secretary and treasurer of the American Secular Union and Freethought Federation, was born in Milwaukee, Wis., March 7, 1849, of German parents. His father was a contractor and in 1859 and 1860 contracted to build three churches. He was defrauded out of his pay for two of them, and there being no Mechanics' Lien law at the time, he lost all. This opened the eyes of the entire family to the dishonesty of religion, and of those engaged in propagating it, with the result that all became Freethinkers. In 1865 young Reichwald came to Chicago, where he obtained employment in a market during the day and attended Bryant & Stratton's Business College evenings, this being the only English education he ever received, all his schooling in Milwaukee having been in the German language. One of the members of the firm withdrew in 1868 and Mr. Reichwald was taken in as a partner, the firm being Jones & Reichwald. In 1883 this firm dissolved and the firm E. C. Reichwald and Brother, composed of Edward C. and William G. Reichwald, was formed, which for years was one of the best known commission houses on South Water street. For many years Mr. Reichwald had taken an interest in Freethought and in 1893 was elected treasurer of the Freethought Federation of America. In 1894, when the Federation was united with the American Secular Union, he was again elected, with Samuel P. Putnam as president and Mrs. M. A. Freeman as secretary. In 1895 Mrs. Freeman, owing to ill-health, was obliged to retire and Mr. Reichwald was elected to fill her place. At the Congress of 1915, he was again elected secretary and treasurer as well, making at the present time almost twenty-four years of continuous service.

In his official position Mr. Reichwald's work has been of the practical and militant kind. He is a man of courage, does not believe in weak tactics, and never hesitates to deal superstition and priestcraft a severe blow. He realizes that the rights of Freethinkers are secured by the Constitution of the United States and of the state of Illinois, as well as the constitutions and laws of the other states. He has never hesitated to bring the representatives of the churches, both Catholic and Protestant, into the courts, when necessary, to compel them to observe the secular features of our government, and obey the laws the same as other organizations. He has successfully fought the enactment and enforcement of Sunday laws in many states. A number of Chicago churches were not paying taxes on property they owned which yielded an income. Among them was the Y. M. C. A., an institution whose building in La Salle street brought in $40,000 yearly in rents. Mr. Reichwald had them all summoned into court. There was a large number, nearly all the principal denominations being represented. At first some of them showed fight, but when they realized that they had evaded the law all began to pay. By this act three million dollars' worth of untaxed property was added to the taxable list and the city was no longer defrauded. Among those involved was the late Archbishop Quigley, the most powerful man in Chicago. The commissioners of Cook county had given this ecclesiastic ground on the County Poor Farm on which to build a chapel, then almost completed, clearly in violation of the constitution of Illinois. After carrying the case to the state Supreme Court, Mr. Reichwald obtained a decision that while the commissioners might permit the archbishop to build the church, they had no authority to give him the ground or, in fact, anything else; and that he might at any time have to tear his building down or give it to the county.

Mr. Reichwald has never met defeat in the courts. His greatest and longest fight was in behalf of the Chicago street speakers, who were arrested time and again by Roman Catholic policemen. Mr. Reichwald has gone on their bonds and employed lawyers to defend them, and has won in every case. One of these, carried to the Court of Appeals, resulted in the abrogation of the police department rule that street speakers must have a permit. Now, if it is known that Mr. Reichwald is back of a speaker, the speaker is never arrested.

Seventy per cent. of the school teachers in Chicago are Roman Catholics, so firm a grip had this church upon the city. These teachers often called in priests to address the children, even taking them, including those of Protestant and Jewish parentage, into a Catholic church, where they were given Catholic instruction and Catholic religious cards. Mr. Reichwald obtained evidence of this, bringing some of both children and cards before the School Board. The result was a new rule that any teacher who tried to influence a child's mind religiously should be at once dismissed. This stopped the practice.

Mr. Reichwald has also worked in conjunction with other organizations with whose work he was in sympathy. As a result, in the winter of 1917 Judge Baldwin issued an injunction forbidding the county treasurer to pay any more money to church-controlled schools, hospitals, etc. For years these institutions had obtained millions of dollars flagrantly in violation of law.

To tell all that Mr. Reichwald has done in defense of equal religious rights for all, for the claim of Freethinkers to an equality of rights with Christians, and for complete separation of church and state, would require more space than is now at our disposal. Only recently he prevented the passage of Sunday laws in Iowa and Michigan. Mr. Reichwald is a widower, his wife having died in 1909. He has one daughter. His office is located at 79 West South Water street, where Freethinkers always receive a hearty welcome.

Events of which the past week is the anniversary are:

May 6, Alexander von Humboldt died, 1859. Sir Wm. Hamilton died, 1856. Karl Marx died, 1883.
May 7, Salmon P. Chase died, 1873.
May 8, John Stuart Mill died, 1873. J. Ridgway convicted of printing "Rights of Man," London, one year's imprisonment, 1793.
May 9, Edward Truelove convicted of selling "Fruits of Philosophy," sentenced 1878. Francis Hopkinson died, 1791.
May 10, Theodore Parker died, 1860. Centennial celebration at Philadelphia opened, 1876.
May 11, E. Truelove convicted of selling "Moral Physiology," 1878.
May 12, Linnæus, naturalist, born, 1707. Benj. Offen died, 1848.

Virtues of the Mule.

The mule is patient, fond of work,
His virtues will bear sifting;
Besides, the business end of him
Is always so uplifting!—Life.

Our Newly Acquired Ships.

There are now ninety-one German and fourteen Austrian vessels in ports of the United States, exclusive of the Virgin Isles, according to the latest count made by the Bureau of Navigation and transmitted to the Senate by the Department of Commerce, says the New York Sun. Under the terms of a joint resolution adopted by the Senate, each of these ships which was owned at the time it came under American jurisdiction "in whole or in part by any corporation, citizen or subject of any nation with which the United States may be at war when such vessel was taken," may be seized and operated in the service of the United States.

If the vessels of Austrian register are owned in part by Germans, that ownership renders them liable to seizure on exactly the same terms as the German ships, regardless of our relations with Austria, which has severed diplomatic relations with the United States, but has as yet made no formal declaration of war.

The gross tonnage of this fleet is 662,513. Of this gross tonnage all but 67,817 is of undisputed German ownership. Dr. Karl Helfferich, the imperial German secretary of the interior, told the Reichstag main committee that the submarine campaign of ruthlessness has sent 1,000,000 gross tons of shipping to the bottom in two months.

The vessels of German and Austrian ownership in this country which are to be put into service by the United States were crippled, in many instances seriously, by their crews on orders from the embassies of their countries on January 31, when Count von Bernstorff delivered to President Wilson the note of the German government announcing its intention to disregard after February 1 the pledges it had given on May 4, 1916, to conduct its undersea warfare in accordance with international law and the practices of civilized nations. The damage done to the ships has never been officially disclosed.

In some vessels it was much greater than in others; in all it was sufficiently great to render the ships useless for weeks. Certain ships were sunk at their wharves, and in general the German and Austro-Hungarian governments sought in every way to render them useless to the United States. The work of repairing them was begun immediately on their seizure by the Federal authorities on April 6, when the President issued his proclamation announcing the recognition by Congress of the state of war thrust upon the United States by Germany.

Of the ships now in custody of the government, thirty-one are in New York harbor. The others are distributed among ports on the Atlantic, Pacific and Gulf coast of continental United States, in Honolulu, Porto Rico, the Philippine Islands—twenty-three vessels, ranging from the 10,981 ton Princess Alice of the North German Lloyd to the 499 ton Wiegand of the Deutsche Sudseeposphat, are in the Philippines—and the Elsass, another North German Lloyd boat, having a tonnage of 6,591, is at Pago Pago. These are the merchant ships which at the beginning of the war tied up in our then neutral ports to save themselves from capture.

These ships are of all sizes, from the 54,282 ton Vaterland at the Hamburg-American pier in Hoboken, to the Wiegand at Cebu. Many of them are cargo carriers, and the transformation of the passenger ships into transports or freighters would not be difficult. The hardest task before the government is to repair their machinery, which was built abroad, and for which parts must be made to replace the injured members. But with expert machinists and naval supervision this can be accomplished in a shorter period than is popularly supposed.

The total tonnage of these vessels is more than one-third of the steam tonnage under United States registry in foreign service in 1916, and a little less than one-seventh of the coastwise tonnage. The use of the seized ships for the transport of foodstuffs to Europe, as is now planned, would go far to counterbalance the losses of allied and neutral shipping due to U-boat attack.

His Strong Point.

"Is your husband much of a provider, Malindy?"

"He jes' ain't nothin' else, ma'am. He gwine to git some new furniture providin' he gits de money; he gwine to git de money providin' he go to work; he go to work providin' de job suits him. I never see such a providin' man in all mah days."—San Francisco Chronicle.

Fixed in a Hurry.

A Brighton mother, on hearing that her sister had received a new little girl, said to Lillian, her little daughter:

"Lillian, auntie has a new baby, and now mama is the baby's aunt, papa is the baby's uncle, and you are her little cousin."

"Well," said Lillian, wonderingly, "wasn't that arranged quick?"—Tit-Bits.

Wanted a Hearer.

Clarence announced his coming by a series of howls. "Oh, my finger, my finger!" he said.

"Poor little finger," mother cooed. "How did you hurt it?"

"With a hammer."

"When?"

"A long time ago," Clarence sobbed.

"But I didn't hear you cry."

"I didn't cry then; I thought you were out," said Clarence.—New York Times.

This Is the Book We Have Been Waiting For

The Belief In God and Immortality

A STATISTICAL STUDY

By JAMES H. LEUBA

Professor of Psychology and Pedagogy in Bryn Mawr College.

The work is the result of an inquiry among men of science — biologists, sociologists, historians, psychologists — as to whether they believe or want to believe in a prayer-answering God and in continuance of life after death. The answer is altogether different from what might be expected in view of the frequent affirmations of the supernaturalists that belief in Christianity, or at least its fundamental dogmas, is held by the majority of the men of science.

It puts into the hands of Freethinkers exactly the information they want on that subject, with the facts and figures verifying it.

As a logical conclusion, founded upon the general aspect of the case, we have held that science leads its votaries to a rejection of such undemonstrable propositions as the existence of gods and the survival of the "soul" when the body is dead. Here we have the evidence, in statistical form, which confirms our view.

To the inquiry into the attitude of the scientists there are added statistics regarding the thought of college students regarding the same religious dogmas.

The author is himself a man of science, an authority in his special branch, which is Psychology, and he knows and sets forth the origin and history of the beliefs with which he deals.

No recent book has attracted more attention from the press, or presented such a serious problem to the supernaturalists.

Cloth, 8vo., $2, postpaid

Sold by

The Truth Seeker Company
62 Vesey Street, New York

THE LETTER BOX.

M. K., New Jersey.—We have been planting potato eyes at Skeetside. If you are interested in the experiment, inquire later how it turned out.

JNO. V. DEMARS, Idaho.—You will find the brothers and sisters of Jesus alluded to in Matt. xiii, 55, 56: "his brethren, James, and Josés, and Simon, and Judas, and his sisters, are they not all with us?" He is there recognized as the carpenter's son, and his mother is named as Mary. You can have Paine's "Age of Reason" for 15 cents.

J. H. SCHAFER, California.—The statement in the Fresno Herald that "God is with us" has appeared in other quarters. He was in Germany when last heard of previous to this announcement, and we have no idea why he quit the kaiser or how he got through the barred zone. We had been reconciled to his remaining with Emperor William, who saw him first.

ALCANDER LONGLEY, St. Louis, Mo.—Your Altruist shows signs of age, and you fonetic type is getting filled up. The news you print about the Altruist Community is gratifying. We saw the other day a man who has just visited Job Harri-man's Llano colony in southern California, and he says it looks to be on its last legs. He has no better report from the colony presided over by one Miller in Florida, called the Ruskin Colony.

R. A. FRAME, West Virginia.—No, Frank Harris, editor of Pearson's, is not regarded as a Rationalist. Reviewing George Moore's "Brook Kerith," last January, and rebuking the author for treating Jesus as human, Mr. Harris said: "There must be a spiritual rebirth: we must submit ourselves again like little children to sit at the feet of the Master: all the best lessons are learned by faith." No Rationalist ever wrote or talked such twaddle as that.

J. PARIS GOODBAR, Virginia.—The Ingersoll Memorial Day address which you find in the Beaver Times incorporated in the speech of the Rev. William A. Sunday, D.D., is printed in a collection called Ingersoll's Patriotic Addresses, selling at 25 cents. Ingersoll died July 21, 1899. Your sensations over some of the "extremely radical articles" appearing occasionally in these columns are shared by the editor. They scare us stiff. That, as you say, they injure the cause, is a debatable proposition.

L. M. H., St. Paul, Minn.—Yes, the president and secretary of this concern are old married fellows. As regards the social doctrine of Mr. J. A. Wilson, they take it alongside, but do not hoist it aboard. Mr. Wilson is not paid for his contributions; as with his opponent, Mr. Eshleman, it is out of the fullness of the heart that the mouth speaketh. THE TRUTH SEEKER judges neither of them, nor his doctrine, and it would not be against our religious principles to print your letter in full. We answer it in this way, however, because you show a little of the unfairness that is likely to result from a narrowed view of a subject. This paper approves freedom of discussion about morals as about anything else, and does not feel itself called upon to interfere with freedom of experiment in the same field, for thus progress and improvement are made. We have endured and observed marriage going on thirty years, and have not come to understand the social radicals' horror of it. So far as we know, it is as good an arrangement as any. Mrs. A. C. Macdonald, our respected parent, had an opportunity to watch experiments in free unions from the days of Victoria Woodhull till forty years later; and she gave it as her matured judgment that unmarried couples did not get along together any better than those who had been through the ceremony. We never give advice; we prefer to state facts and let the reader draw conclusions from them. You say you are a young girl of marriageable age; that a young man has monopolized your time for three years, and now sends you Mr. Wilson's argument as a reason for not marrying you. And you blame Mr. Wilson. We do not believe the argument had anything to do with his determination not to marry. A man in the marrying mood is not amenable to argument, anyhow. We had all the anti-marriage arguments before us thirty years ago, and had never denied their validity; but they were forgotten when the crisis came and have not been much considered since. You will not be influenced by the reasoning of Mr. Wilson to do what your conscience does not approve; and neither reason nor a right conscience will approve any such course as that which you ask us if you should adopt—that of running loose among men. You may not be real happy without a mate, but you will be better off with none than with more than one, unless you are an unusual woman, and you say you are not.

THE REASON WHY. A Story for Freethinkers. By Ernest E. Russell. Paper, 50 cents.

The Ingersoll Birthday Book

Selections by
GRACE LELAND MACDONALD

(Mrs. G. E. Macdonald)
Preface by EVA INGERSOLL-BROWN.
(Granddaughter of Ingersoll)
Decorations by PAUL F. BERDANIER.
Cover by HUGH HENNESSY.

Printed in Color on Cameo Plate Coated
Sepia Paper, 252 pages, Octavo.

Descriptive Circular sent free on application.

PRICE, $1.65 POSTPAID
The Truth Seeker Company
62 Vesey Street, New York

THE REASON WHY

A Story for Freethinkers

By ERNEST E. RUSSELL

We do not know which will be most admired in this book, the narrative or the argument, for both are rich. The author has pictured religion as it is preached and talked, and has added brilliant and informing chapters on modern thought about religion.

In Paper Covers, 50 Cents

THE TRUTH SEEKER OFFICE
NEW YORK

TRACTS REPRINTED

CAN JESUS SAVE? By W. E. Clark. 5 cents.

There is a new idea in this little work for Christian believers to consider.

CREDENTIALS OF CHRIST. LACK OF PROOF THAT HE WAS AN ACTUAL PERSONALITY. By Parish B. Ladd. 5 cents.

Judge Ladd examines, from the established rules of evidence, the pretensions of the church as to the necessity for a Redeemer, the prediction of his coming, and the testimony that he finally appeared upon earth—"Not Proven."

CASE OF BILLY SUNDAY (the). By James F. Morton, Jr., Franklin Steiner and George E. Macdonald. 5 cents. $2.50 a hundred.

One of the most effective exposures ever printed. Has done more than any other cause to discomfort the notorious "gutter evangelist," and should be made to follow him in large quantities, wherever he goes.

FALSE TEACHING OF THE CHRISTIAN CHURCH. By L. K. Washburn. 5 cents.

An earnest appeal to the human consciousness to emancipate itself from the falsehoods instilled into it in the name of religion.

INGERSOLL'S ADVICE TO PARENTS. By R. G. Ingersoll. 10 cents per dozen.

Keep Children out of Church and Sunday School.

OUR ANONYMOUS BIBLE. Is Scripture Infallible and Divinely Inspired? By Chas. L. Snyder. 10 cents.

The negative answer is supported by an array of proofs which the most ardent Bible believer will be unable to refute.

WHAT WE OFFER IN EXCHANGE. By W. A. Croftut. "If you take away my religion, what will you give in its place?" 5 cents.

HOW CHRISTIANITY BEGAN. By Gen. William Birney. Locating the time and place when the religion of Christendom arose. Price 7 cents.

The Candle from Under the Bushel

(Mark iv, 21); or,

1,306 Questions to the Clergy

And for the Consideration of Others.

Instructive, Interesting, and Laughable.

By WILLIAM HART

Price, paper, 50 cents; cloth, $1.00.

Address THE TRUTH SEEKER CO.

MYTH AND LEGEND IN THE BIBLE.

By Keighley Snowden.

A valuable handbook for those who desire to keep handy a clear statement of the most assured results of modern thought as applied to the critical examination of the Bible.

Price, cloth, $1.50.

Address, THE TRUTH SEEKER CO.,
62 Vesey St., New York.

The Influence of the Church
on

Marriage AND Divorce

By JOSEPH McCABE

Marriage law reform is a subject which is likely to assume greater prominence in the near future. There does not exist in English a complete study of the historical influence of the church on marriage. The lack is supplied by Mr. McCabe's new book, which deals fully with the Roman and medieval systems and the modern humanist development.

PRICE, CLOTH, $1.75

The Truth Seeker Co.

62 Vesey St. - New York, N. Y.

THE CASE OF BILLY SUNDAY

A complete exposure of the greatest charlatan of the age, exhibiting his coarse vulgarity in the pulpit, his medieval theology, his insane bigotry, his vulgar abusiveness, and his fundamental dishonesty. Contains the famous parallel columns showing his stealings from Ingersoll, and presents unanswerable proof of the deliberate falsehoods with which he has sought to turn aside exposure. Now is the time to circulate this most effective of all propaganda documents by the hundreds and thousands.

PRICE, FIVE CENTS

For sale by

THE TRUTH SEEKER

62 Vesey Street, New York City

SELF-CONTRADICTIONS OF THE BIBLE. By W. H. Burr. One hundred and forty-four propositions embodying the most palpable and striking self-contradictions of the Bible with a summary. Price 15 cents.

THE FOURTH DEMAND. Religious Teaching in Public Schools, with Reasons Why It Should Be Abolished. By Woolsey Teller. This is a fresh and un-to-date discussion of the subject. Price. 10 cents.

DESIGN ARGUMENT. Anatomically and Physiologically Considered. By an East Indian. Per copy, 10 cents; fifteen copies, $1.

ANTICHRIST. By Ernest Renan. Paper, 50 cents; cloth, $1.00.

The R. P. A. ANNUAL 1917

LIST OF CONTRIBUTIONS:

RELIGION AFTER THE WAR
Arnold Bennett

WILL ORTHODOX CHRISTIANITY SURVIVE THE WORLD WAR?

An attempt at Forecast by Representative Humanists: Sir Ray Lankester, Leonard Huxley, John A. Robson, Sir Bryan Donkin, Hon. John Collier, Professor J. B. Bury, Henry W. Nevinston, Sir H. H. Johnston, H. de Vere Stacpoole, and Right Hon. J. M. Robertson, M.P.

THEOLOGY AND THE WAR..
William Archer

THE GREATEST ILLUSION..
Adam Gowans Whyte

PRE-ANIMISM... Edward Clodd

THE NEOLITH: A POEM.....
Eden Phillpotts

THE PAPACY DURING THE RENAISSANCE
Joseph McCabe

WATCHMAN, WHAT OF THE NIGHT? ... Charles T. Gorham

Sold at

THE TRUTH SEEKER OFFICE

Or sent postpaid for 40 cents per copy

TENTH EDITION. Crimes of Preachers

A RECORD OF THE CLERGY WHO HAVE COMMITTED CRIMES AND IMMORALITIES.

As was said of previous editions, the record is startlingly instructive and will open the eyes of the people, proving as it does that in thousands of cases the Bible and the Christian religion have totally failed to keep even their exponents from committing acts of grossest immorality and deeds of darkest crime.

Cover in colors. 247 pages.

PRICE, 35 CENTS

Address, THE TRUTH SEEKER CO.,
62 Vesey St., New York.

Is The Bible Worth Reading? And Other Essays

By LEMUEL K. WASHBURN

Price, postpaid, $1.

Address THE TRUTH SEEKER,
62 Vesey St., New York

DEPARTMENT OF ECONOMICS.

Is Man or Woman Chief of Sinners?

I am wicked, very wicked (some have said I ought to have been a detective). Once again I have not been answered, and never expect to be, by Mary Monico.

Now, I was so sure that Mary would fasten to my slang instead of the main argument, that I prepared to reply to her criticism long before it arrived. I learned slang in business circles and it wasn't bar business, either. Mrs. Monico lays the blame on the poor seeming to know they use slang, and afterwards says one expects me to instruct her in their "talk." The fact is, slang is good English in America. Can you beat it!

Mary, why do you want to "go visiting" among the poor when it isn't woman's "sphere" to dabble in anything but making a home for hubby and the kiddies? It looks to me as though you are not quite satisfied with the eternal routine of housework and are acting contrary to what you seek to impose upon the rest of us. I am glad you have told us something about yourself, for now we know you mean it all and we had wondered whether you were male or female. There is that much settled, anyway.

Folks, do you remember that Mrs. Monico championed men's apparel as against women's in her clash with Miss Sheridan? Yet Dr. Mary Walker is now a laughing stock to Mary because the good doctor has dared to wear the more comfortable dress. And, do you remember, Mrs. Monico sought to base her attacks on fact (not fiction), and when Mr. Babb told her she was "suffering from mistaken ideas, obsessions and general incompetency as to scientific data and facts," she replied, "I have ever sought to achieve incompetency in this direction." Could Billy Sunday be more slippery and uncertain? And there are plenty more like him in rapacity—aren't they Mary Monico's women when you stop to think of it?

Mary said women were not fit for any "calculating" work and therefore I chose Hetty Green to show that a woman can calculate even to beating the tax collector. Now Mary seeks to turn "calculating" into philanthropy. Well, I'm not going to let her put that over.

I get the history of Joan of Arc when I point out the fact that it was a female child who turned the battle into victory; the point is this—"the woman did it," vision or no vision, and no side-tracking will change the fact.

I am glad you mentioned Miss Rankin, Mary, and I shall ask you to procure Pearson's Magazine, April copy, and read "Uncle Sam's Dishonest Servants," by R. Sackett. Here is one sentence: "The exhaustive debates in Congress hardly ever change a single vote, and never enough to affect the result." Perhaps Miss Rankin has already discovered it is waste of energy to talk.

All right; women have copied the men and they have been led by the men, but, think how I will, I can't figure out which of the sinners should bear the greater guilt—is it the leader or the led one? Mary, have you copied Strindberg, who so roundly belittled all women, and then he finally kills his own argument by saying women have always aped the men. There it is; the men are no good, either, so why not knock both sexes at once and be done with it? But we forgive Strindberg because he was thrice married, and each marriage proved a failure—so he took revenge on the whole sex.

I do not know why it would not be well to do some "refining" (since we are such refiners) in the White House as well as in the individual home. But since men have always had (or taken) the chance to blunder awrong until enough blundering has taught them to blunder aright, I think it would be fair to allow the women as good a chance to blunder until they, too, could blunder as well as the men blunder. And here is the burden of my song: I do not believe in a separation of the sexes anywhere. The gist of Mary Monico's tale is this: To the woman it shall be said, "Thou shalt not," and to the man, "Thy will is my will."

If women are "disciples and copyists" of the men, the poor men are condemned along with their "disciples" for being such poor patterns, and all along we must have thought we were copying a perfect creature. Gee! my head aches; traveling in a circle. I can't get away from the starting point. Women seeking suffrage, or whatever else, are fanatics, and there you go! The men are fanatics, too, because we are copying them. Just look what Mary went and done when she thought she was lashing the women only. Men, what have you got to say for yourselves?

No, you did not say women were "makers of religion," but you said, "She threw in her lot" with religionists, and I might ask, did she throw herself or was she thrown?

I do not wish to be spared the "indignity" of a search which would "bring to light much information that we outgrew years ago." Who are "we," and what is the "information"? Think not to gain by sarcasm or by passing over in silence the facts set forth by eminent thinkers and investigators. To offer you more would evoke no response, since your attitude all along has been, "I have said so, therefore it is so."

I care not a fig for "sentiment or style" in writing any more than I do in real life, and most certainly I am not "delicate" in hunting the truth. If you have felt hurt because of my bluntness, well, then, according to your own reasoning, you deserve to be hurt, since you have failed in your answers. I have pointed out living examples of advanced women, and your silence is eloquent of defeat. Perhaps you have realized you were too hasty in judgment of your sex and are ready to take it back in secret but not in public.

Finally, I entreat you to give me that "information," as I am earnestly desirous of acquiring your knowledge and wisdom.

EMMA BRUNZELL.

THE SAN FRANCISCO FRAME-UP EXPOSED.

The prosecution of the labor men at San Francisco charged with complicity in bomb-throwing at the preparedness parade has been discredited by the confession of one F. E. Riegall of Grayville, Illinois. As a result of this confession F. C. Oxman, whose testimony caused the conviction of Thomas Mooney and Warren K. Billings was arrested on April 12, charged with perjury, and held to await action by the grand jury. Riegall's confession was to the effect that he had been offered a bribe to corroborate the testimony of Oxman that he had seen Mooney, Billings and other defendants in an automobile with a suitcase near the scene of the explosion at Steuart and Market Streets, on the day that it occurred. Riegall has produced letters from Oxman and other evidence in support of his confession. The first letter from Oxman is as follows:

"San Francisco, Dec. 14, 1916.
"F. E. Riegall, Grayville, Ill.

"Dear Ed: It has been a long time since I heard from you. I have a chance for you to come to San Francisco as an expert witness. A very important case. You will only have to answer three or four questions, and I will post you on them. You will get mileage and all that a witness can draw. Probably $100 in the clear, so if you will answer me quick in care this hotel and I will arrange the balance. It is all O. K., but I need a witness. Let me know if you can come. January 3d is the date set for trial. Keep this confidential. Yours truly,
"F. C. OXMAN."

On receipt of this, Riegall wired that he would go on receipt of transportation and expenses. In reply Oxman wrote that the money would be sent, urged silence on the matter and suggested that on arrival at San Francisco he register as from Evansville, Indiana. On December 25 he wrote to Riegall's mother intimating that he might have use for her as a witness also, and if so would secure transportation for her. On the 27th he sent the following telegram:

"San Francisco, 12-27, 1916.
"F. E. Riegall, Grayville, Ill. We are sending you care Illinois Central ticket agent money for your ticket and expenses San Francisco and return. When you arrive San Francisco come to Terminal Hotel and inquire for me. Telegraph when starting. Come at once.
"F. C. OXMAN."

On arrival at San Francisco, Riegall registered on January 6 at the Terminal Hotel under the name of "L. O. Charles, Evansville, Indiana." He declared that he was generously entertained by the district attorney and his assistants, as well as by Oxman. He said further:

"I told Oxman I was in Niagara Falls on the day of the explosion, but he said that didn't matter, as there was a big reward up, and if I would stand in with him, and back up his testimony, I would be in on the money. The next day after I reached San Francisco, Oxman took me to the place where the bomb had gone off and showed me everything and told me what I was to say. Then I met Fickert and Bunner, and they talked it over with me about what I was to say to back up Oxman. When I saw what the frame-up was I never intended to go through with it, but I played horse with them. When they asked me to repeat my testimony I would say: 'At 3 o'clock in the afternoon I was at 1075 Market street—' and then they would get sore and say, 'No, no; it was 2 o'clock at Steuart and Market,' and we'd have to go through it again. I had come out here supposing it was young Oxman who had written to me, as the old man was known in Grayville as Clifford Oxman, and I did not recognize his initials. One of the Oxman family had helped my father out of some trouble once, and I thought I would come along and see if I could do anything. But I had no idea of going through after I found out what the game was. They showed me a good time while I was here, though."

Riegall disappeared when the trial took place and thus evaded testifying. On hearing of the conviction of Mooney he telegraphed Assistant District Attorney Cunha from Grayville as follows:

"Congratulations. My testimony may get Mooney new trial."

In reply Cunha wired him saying he would be willing to help Mooney get a new trial if any doubt of his guilt should develop, and urged Riegall to tell all he knew. Riegall, therefore, wrote asking him whether he should send letters, telegrams and other data to District Attorney C. M. Fickert. To this, he says, he never received a reply. In commenting on the matter, the San Francisco Bulletin says, in its issue of April 14:

"We have sufficient evidence to destroy the whole case against Mooney, Billings and the other defendants, and to justify a case of perjury against several witnesses and of subornation of perjury against the district attorney. The Bulletin, therefore, waits for action by the chief of police. Several of Chief White's subordinates, including Lieutenant Bunner, were intimately connected with the Riegall incident, and thus in touch with the cold-blooded conspiracy by which the men chosen by the people to represent justice used the powers of their office to perpetuate a brutal injustice. The Bulletin urges Chief White to take up this case at once, use the evidence which lies so ready to his hand and see that justice is done."—The Public.

MR. DONAHUE AND SOCIALISM.

With deep interest I have read the controversy on economics between Messrs. Donahue and Severance.

It is not my policy to "wedge" myself into a discussion; but in this instance, as a Socialist, I am directly concerned.

Mr. Donahue has absolutely no conception of what Socialism is or he would not say it was ever "tried." Socialism is international and universal in scope and could not be tried in "a small Grecian city by Lycurgus, 900 B.C." How could Socialism be "applied" in Chicago and the rest of the United States remain a capitalist nation?

Let us examine this ideal system of "competitive individualism" (capitalism) under which "the United States has made the enormous advance of the last fifty years." Fifty years ago the mass of the people (the working class) were far better off than they now are. Why? Because capitalism had not developed so far as it is today.

Improved machinery and inventions, together with the "efficiency system," have yearly swelled the army of unemployed.

In a statement issued by the Studebaker Corporation (makers of automobiles) we get an idea of how "efficiency" works.

In 1915 this corporation had 11,000 men employed and turned out 37,000 cars. In 1916 they only had 7,000 men and turned out 100,000 cars. Here were 4,000 men thrown out of work by the efficiency system. They could not get work elsewhere because other corporations and companies had also used the efficiency system. These unemployed are not responsible for their "hard luck," nor are they "pessimists." They are the victims of a rotten social order.

Suppose, for instance, Mr. Donahue, that all the workers should decide to follow your ideas of "initiative" and "individual efforts," and be determined to "rise above their environment." If they would all be successful, as you claim they could, who would do the work the unsuccessful ones do now? ("Successful" men don't even put on their own coats without a butler to help them).

You say the rich get theirs by "intelligent, determined effort." Well, Jesse James had some of that "stuff," backed by a couple of six-shooters.

In Europe we see the results of intensive competition. The central powers had accumulated vast amounts of surplus products which the producers (the working class) could not buy back. For this it was necessary to find foreign markets. The entente allies were in the "same boat," and the markets were becoming overstocked. This competition between the two groups of world powers became so intense as to lead to war. After being robbed of their products in time of peace, the workers were called upon to fight for foreign markets in which their exploiters could dispose of those products.

It is only to the interests of the rich that the United States was dragged into the war. The workers never gain anything by fighting, but lose their lives, limbs, health and homes.

Mr. Donahue says: "You will find opportunities all around you if you will look for them." Why did you not "look for them" in New York, Mr. Donahue, and save that $20 it took to go to Chicago? Was not there "opportunities all around you" in New York? Why did you not use your "determined effort" there?

Remember, $20 bills do not grow on trees, and a man can't move family and household goods very far on $20.

If there is no work where a poor man is, he must either starve on the instalment plan or play Jesse James, or Mr. Donahue.

Mr. Donahue makes a good admission in favor of Socialism which is worth repeating. He says: "Socialism, by guaranteeing to all a living, takes away the most powerful incentive for exertion." So we get it from our opponent that all would live under socialism. Well, under capitalism, we barely exist, and all incentive is thereby discouraged.

WALTER FREEMAN.

MR. ESHLEMAN AND LIBERTY.

In THE TRUTH SEEKER of April 7, Mr. Eshleman, who worships at the shrine of Grundyism, continues to protest against the "dangerous views" of writers who believe that liberty is something to be lived as well as talked.

Having failed to persuade people by arguments to view sex questions as he does, like all other tyrants he would put them in prison. In case a man or a woman cannot live and be happy in marriage, and is determined to break up the union, "the place for that person is in a prison or an asylum," he says, and declares that horse-whips would be in order. This puts Mr. Eshleman absolutely outside the pale of Rationalism, and squarely in the ranks of bigots and tyrants; and we can easily imagine what he would do to those who disagree with him, were he in power.

He protests against the human sentiment expressed by Mr. Gauvin, that "marriage should lose its binding force when one or the other ceases to be happy in it." He declares that their happiness is secondary; that the main thing is to make the children happy and to prepare them for future happiness. Could there be a more striking example of shallow, illogical thinking? Why is the child's happiness now, and after it grows up, more important than the happiness of the parents? If the parents must sacrifice their happiness for the benefit of the child, then, of course, the child must sacrifice its happiness for the benefit of its children, consequently everybody concerned fails to receive any happiness.

Furthermore, what sort of happiness could a child enjoy living with parents who were unhappy because of being unwillingly tied together? A child, in my opinion, should be reared by its mother. This she would want to do, for she would not give birth to a child if she did not want it, if the tyrannical laws enacted by such men as Mr. Eshleman were repealed.

Of course, Mr. Eshleman would make an exception to men of genius, because unhappiness might interfere with their work, but "merely a case of the ordinary Tom, Dick and Harry . . . horsewhips would be more in order." I assure Mr. Eshleman that the Tom, Dick and Harry class, of which I have the honor of being a member, will not submit to any such programme. Lay it on gently, Mr. Tyrant. We are getting our eyes open and our backs up. What if we should get the whip into our hands?

J. A. WILSON.

A CONTRAST.

When Billy Sunday is forgotten, and all his hippodrome and noise is o'er; when in some lonesome spot his flesh is rotting, his spirit crossed to yonder silent shore; the name of Ingersoll will still be known, his life and work for Truth revered; while Superstition's ghosts are overthrown, with all the theologic myths so feared!

The man who will revile the dead, and steal the product of his mighty brain, to me a very shallow mind reveals that with the big "I" always looks for gain. Such puny men should never dare condemn what Ingersoll has wrought—a giant's work, compared with which the Sunday sputterings are naught, the vapid mutterings of a slangy shirk!

Comparisons are odious, so 'tis said, and I would not draw one "tween the twain," yet 'tis well to speak kindly of the dead, and from bitterness of heart refrain.

Rob Ingersoll needs no defense from me. His name will live when others are long dead, and in the minds of men quite silently freedom of thought its blessed light will shed!

GEORGE EDGAR FRYE.

APOCRYPHAL NEW TESTAMENT.

Being all the Gospels, Epistles, and other pieces now extant, attributed in the first four centuries to Jesus Christ, his Apostles, and their companions, and not included in the New Testament by its compilers. Illustrated. Cloth, $1.50.

SEVENTH EDITION — REDUCED PRICE

BIBLE MYTHS

AND THEIR PARALLELS IN OTHER RELIGIONS

Being a Comparison of the Old and New Testament Myths and Miracles with those of Heathen Nations of Antiquity

CONSIDERING ALSO THEIR ORIGIN AND MEANING. WITH NUMEROUS ILLUSTRATIONS.

IT is a perfect Encyclopedia on the subjects treated, containing a vast amount of out-of-the-way knowledge not accessible to the majority of readers, and all the objections to the dogmas of Christianity one is likely to encounter, grouped under appropriate heads. No author has struck harder blows at the Christian religion. It is the most important Biblical criticism that has ever appeared, being the result of many years of study of the religions of antiquity. It is thoroughly reliable, every fact being verified by copious notes and authorities.

COL. ROBERT G. INGERSOLL said: "This work demonstrates the fact that there is nothing new or original in Christianity; that its maxims, miracles, and mistakes, its doctrines, sacraments, and ceremonies, were all borrowed; that its virgin mothers, miraculous babes, courier-stars, crucifixions, resurrections, and ascensions were familiar things hundreds of years before the founder of Christianity was born. It shows that all the machinery of the supernatural has been in active operation for countless generations; that all the nations of antiquity had about the same religious experience, and substantially agreed as to the correctness of about the same mistakes. Catholicism administered on the estate of Paganism, and appropriated most of the property to its own use. Christianity furnished new steam for an old engine. Fables, like most other things, wear out and have to be patched, gilded, or replaced.

"The author of 'Bible Myths' has succeeded in showing that our Bible is not the great central fire giving light to the world, but a collection of candles and tapers and sparks borrowed by the 'chosen people' from those whom Jehovah, according to the scriptures, had left in the darkness of nature."

REV. M. J. SAVAGE says: "To me, the volume is worth twenty times its cost."

THE BOSTON COMMONWEALTH says: "Here we have evidence upon evidence that there is no myth, legend, supernatural occurrence, doctrine, rite or ceremony recorded in the Bible which cannot be paralleled in some ancient record centuries older than the page on which the same thing is narrated in the Hebrew and Christian scriptures. We confess we are curious as to how the orthodoxes of the Christian world will greet this book. We more than suspect that they will not greet it at all, but will be content to pass it by in fearful silence."

Seventh Edition: Large 8vo, cloth, 614 pages, $2.

Address THE TRUTH SEEKER :: 62 Vesey Street, New York

In Best of Humor.

Blocking Traffic.—Mr. Peck: "Would you mind compelling me to move on, officer? I've been waiting on this corner three hours for my wife!"—Puck.

A Link With the Past.—Dr. A. S. Tibby will speak on "Shakespeare" at the next meeting in Denver of the American University Society. Dr. Tibby knew Shakespeare intimately.—Boulder Camera.

The Speaking.—Mr. Bacon: How was the sewing society meeting?
Mrs. Bacon—Very well attended.
"Did any one speak?"
"Oh, yes."
"Who spoke first?"
"No one. They all spoke at once."

Family Limitation Desired.—Mrs. Norah Mulvaney met her friend, Mrs. Bridget Carr, who had in her arms her twelfth child.
"Arrah, now, Bridget," said Norah, "an' there ye are wid another little Carr in yer arms."
"Another it is, Mrs. Mulvaney," replied her friend, "an' it's me that's hoping 'tis the caboose."—Exchange.

A Difference.—Pat: What is the difference between satisfied and contented?
Mike: There is none, they mean the same thing.
Pat: Yes, but there is a difference and I am trying to find out what it is.
Mike: You are crazy, there is no difference, if you are satisfied you are contented, and if you are contented, why you are satisfied. See?
Pat: You are crazy yourself. Listen! Now I am satisfied that Father Mooney is making love to my wife, but I'll be damned if I am contented.—Ex.

No Case.—The old miser in the story, who dropped a five-dollar gold piece in the plate at church, mistaking it for a nickel, could get no great satisfaction out of the deacon, as will be recalled, but he was not the man to give up easily.
Accordingly he sought legal advice with a view of instituting a suit at law.
But the lawyer whom he consulted was one of those rare and gifted souls who would rather be witty than rich, or almost anything else, for that matter.
"Sir," said he at once, "you have no case. You are guilty of contributory negligence."—Chicago Daily News.

Change Needed.—Edith: "Haven't you and Jack been engaged long enough to get married?"
Ethel—"Too long. He hasn't a cent left."
—Boston Transcript.

Honorable.—Father (of Mrs. Newlywed)—What was it your husband wanted to see me about?
Mrs. Newlywed—I think he wanted to borrow a couple of hundred dollars from you. The poor boy is so anxious to get out of debt.

Climate Cure.—The great specialist appraised his prospective patient with a glance.
"You must take a trip to a warmer climate for your health," he advised. "Ten dollars, consultation fee, please."
"You can take a trip to a still warmer climate for your money," came the answer as the man walked out.—Ex.

In the Cowboy Way.—John Hart, an Englishman and editor of London Opinion, who visited this country last year, carried home some strange stories about us Americans. Here is one he is telling on the Westerner, says the Deming (N. H.) Headlight:

A man who had been born and brought up on the range and had never seen or known woman rode into a border town to see the sights.
Immediately he fell in love with a buxom waitress and they were married. The cowpuncher bought another horse and the couple rode away to the far-off ranch, supposedly happy and content.
Two days afterward the cowpuncher came back, looking very sorrowful, leading the other horse.
"Why, where is your wife?" asked all the men about the hotel in concert as he rode up.
"She broke her leg the second day out," answered the cowpuncher, as the tears ran down his face, "and I had to shoot her."

A Heavenly Donnybrook Fair.—In a recent speech at the American Irish Historical Society's dinner in New York, Irvin S. Cobb told a story about an Irishman. This Irishman on Sunday heard a clergyman preach on the judgment-day. The priest told of the hour when the trumpet shall blow and all peoples of all climes and all ages shall be gathered before the seat of God to be judged according to their deeds done in the flesh. After the sermon he sought out the pastor and he said: "Father, I want to ask you a few questions touching on what you preached about today. Do you really think that on the judgment-day everybody will be there?"

The priest said: "That is my understanding."
"Will Cain and Abel be there?"
"Undoubtedly."
"And David and Goliath—will they both be there?"
"That is my information and belief."
"And Bryan Boru and Oliver Cromwell will be there?"
"Assuredly they will be present."
"And the A. O. H.'s and A. P. A.'s?"
"I am quite positive they will all be there together."
"Father," said the parishioner, "there'll be little judgin' done the first day!"

THE SOUL AND ITS BEARINGS

SHOWING

The Material Quality of the Soul and the Mechanical Nature of Its Functions and of the Business Relations It Sustains with the Environment on One Side and the Rest of the Corporal Organism on the Other.

BY JAMES B. ALEXANDER

This is a Materialistic book. The author does not believe that the soul survives the body. He says: "Is it right to lie for the concealment of a disagreeable truth—to inclose the vital truth in a pleasant husk of fiction by tricking the people with the delusion of agreeable falsehoods? No! Tell the truth! Let not the truth be brought into disrepute by unworthy and debasing associations."

A very frank book; serious, scholarly, convincing.

Price $1.00

Sold at THE TRUTH SEEKER OFFICE

Paine's Age of Reason

By THOMAS PAINE, M.A.

This edition of Thomas Paine's masterpiece is the one that is sure to become the standard for all future correct editions. It is reprinted from one of the first copies in English published by Barrois at Paris, January, 1794, and the proofs were probably read by Paine. It enables the world of the twentieth century to read Paine's AGE OF REASON as Paine wrote it in the eighteenth century. It is printed from large new type. 180 pages. 15c. T. S. Co.

THE CHRISTIAN HELL

From the First to the Twentieth Century By

HYPATIA BRADLAUGH BONNER

There is no book in the English language which describes the theory and experience of the doctrine of the Christian Hell with such fulness of details as this work by Mrs. Bonner. No one who wishes to know what this doctrine means when carried to its natural conclusions, as in the teaching of the Roman Catholic church, should fail to secure a copy of this startling work. Mrs. Bonner's sources are entirely authentic, and the reader is held spellbound by her graphic descriptions, which grow in intensity as she reaches the climax of her subject. There are some twenty-eight illustrations in the book, taken from pictures actually circulated by the churches, which serve to bring to view all the horrifying phases of this most inhuman of conceptions. This work alone is sufficient to condemn Christianity as a thoroughly unnatural institution.

PRICE, PAPER, 30 CENTS
CLOTH - 45 CENTS

The Truth Seeker
62 Vesey Street - New York

EXEMPTING THE CHURCHES

A Presentation of Facts and Reasons to Show Why

CHURCHES SHOULD BE TAXED

Argument of

JAMES F. MORTON, JR.,

Before the Committee on Taxation of the Constitutional Convention at Albany, New York. Expanded into a pamphlet of 84 pages, to which is annexed a tract by John E. Remsburg.

It Covers All the Ground

The many pretexts for the exemption of church property from taxation examined and exposed.

Price 25 Cents

Write for rates on quantities.
THE TRUTH SEEKER CO.

ETERNITY

World-War Thoughts on Life and Death, Religion, and the Theory of Evolution

By ERNST HAECKEL

(Professor at the University of Jena)

Author of "The History of Creation," "The Evolution of Man," "The Riddle of the Universe," etc.

Of highest importance are these latest thoughts of Professor Haeckel, which embody the ideas of a Monist philosopher and Humanitarian Freethinker on War, Religion, and the nature and origin of Man. The conclusions of the evolutionists on these questions are restated, emphasized and strengthened. Apart from severely scoring the hypocrisy of nations that profess to be followers of a Prince of Peace, and yet enter upon wars of conquest and make arms and munitions their trade, what the author has to say on the merits of the parties to the present war is given in an appendix. In the main he confines himself closely to the themes indicated—science, religion and humanity. He rejects utterly the Christian scheme of this world or any other.

Cloth, $1.25 net.

THE TRUTH SEEKER COMPANY

62 Vesey Street, New York

SELF-CONTRADICTIONS OF THE BIBLE. By W. H. Burr. One hundred and forty-four propositions embodying the most palpable and striking contradictions. Price 15 cents.

News of the Week.

Dr. Lauro Muller has tendered President Braz of Brazil his resignation as minister of foreign affairs.

The Chilean Minister to Germany has demanded his passports, according to a Central News dispatch from Amsterdam.

The German authorities have ordered the immediate cancellation of the Berlin order placing American residents there in the status of enemy subjects.

The famous Jewish lawyer, Zarudny, has been appointed assistant minister of justice in Russia. He is the first Jew to hold a ministerial post in Russia.

Count Adam Tarnowski von Tarnow, sent here as the Austrian ambassador, and his suite, sailed for Rotterdam May 4 on the Holland-American liner Ryndam.

Venustiano Carranza May 1 took the oath of office as the first constitutional president of Mexico since the assassination of Francisco Madero, on February 23, 1913.

Grave rioting has taken place in Mainz, Germany. Sixteen hundred people took part in a demonstration because of the scarcity of food, and a number of ships were looted.

President Wilson brought powerful influence to bear upon the House May 5 and succeeded in snatching victory for censorship by a vote of 190 to 185 after its apparent defeat.

It is reported that Colonel Roosevelt has 187,000 volunteers for his proposed expeditionary force to fight in France, with contributions enough from private sources to pay expenses.

Absolute authority to regulate, in its discretion, the production, distribution and prices of food and other necessities during the war was asked of Congress May 3 by the administration.

Further survey of the seized German and Austrian ships shows that seventy-one will be ready for sea within five months. Only the discovery of concealed damages will delay the work.

This government has seized 125 German agents or Germans of suspicious activities. The number of Germans in this country who manifest such activities is called gratifyingly small.

Josephus Daniels, secretary of the navy, May 2 announced that the enlisted strength of the navy now is 86,326, a figure less than seven hundred below the full war quota at present authorized.

Diplomatic dispatches received at Washington May 5 say that as a result of the Russian revolution the Democrats of Persia have started an agitation for the establishment of a republic in that country.

The pope, apparently undiscouraged by centuries of failure, has ordered worldwide prayers for peace in June. The order is taken to mean that the pope may have a hunch that peace is somewhere near.

Mme. Sarah Bernhardt is winning her fight for life at Mount Sinai Hospital. May 2 the great actress, who was operated upon for kidney trouble on April 18, had regained sufficient strength to be able to sit up in bed without help.

Shadow Lawn, "Summer White House," at Long Branch, N. J., changed ownership May 5, when possession of it was taken by the Harsen-Langham Corporation, of New York, in a transaction that involved realty values of about $5,000,000.

For saying "That's not the flag of my country; to hell with that flag," Joseph Sadokierski, a Russian, of 305 East 102d street, New York, was sentenced to the workhouse for one month by Magistrate Simms in Harlem court May 1.

Supply, equipment and transportation arrangements will soon be under way so that 500,000 men of the new conscript army can begin training by June 1, with the expectation of getting them into the field fully organized by April 1 of next year.

By the will of the late Isaac Dudley Fletcher, who died April 28 at his home in New York, the Metropolitan Museum of Art of that city will receive not only an art collection valued at $2,000,000, but also the residuary estate valued at $5,000,000.

Lafayette College, Easton, Pa., one of the greatest memorials to the Marquis de Lafayette on the American continent, will confer on Marshal Joffre and the Marquis de Chambrun, a great grandson of Lafayette, the honorary degree of doctor of laws.

Executions of condemned murderers at Sing Sing prison, New York, hereafter will be held at 11 P.M. on the Monday in the week set for enforcing the court's decree. Heretofore the executions have been held early in the morning, usually on a Friday.

France's war mission, headed by René Viviani, Marshal Joffre and Admiral Chocheprat, passed more than a half hour on the floor of the Senate May 1 and stirred that body and crowded galleries first to vigorous applause and then to roars of cheers.

The regents of the University of the State of New York, with the approval of Gov. Whitman, have authorized the Commissioner of Education, John H. Finley, to make a brief visit to France for the purpose of seeing the schools and observing what they are doing for the nation in war time.

Misses Charlotte Baylies and Edith Sigourney, prominent in Boston society, were notified by the Navy Department May 1 that they had passed the examination and had been accepted as radio operators. They were ordered to report at the navy yard for duty.

Billy Sunday's exhortations to his hearers for money to meet the expenses of his local campaign have not been sufficiently effective, and unless his future audiences are more generous the financial backers of the Sunday campaign will face a substantial deficit.

Reports that Francisco Villa and his forces are camped near Guadeloupe, Chihuahua, within fifty miles of the American border, has caused Brigadier General George Bell, Jr., commanding the United States troops here, to increase his patrol along the border.

During April 2,533 aliens—Italians, Germans, Austrians, Russians and English—took out first papers at the federal naturalization bureau, and in the same period 468 full citizenship papers were issued. In April, 1916, 728 aliens declared their intentions and 256 foreigners received naturalization.

General William Verbeck, proprietor of the St. John's Military School, at Manlius, New York, filed a voluntary petition in bankruptcy in the federal court at Utica, N. Y., May 4, with liabilities of $137,884 and assets of $157,548. St. John's is one of the oldest and best known military schools in the country.

Eleanor C. Donnelly, who was the author of more than fifty volumes, died at Villa Maria Convent, West Chester, Pa., May 1. She was seventy-nine years old. Miss Donnelly was styled "The Adelaide Proctor of America." She was the sister of Ignatius Donnelly, author of the cryptogram which provoked a controversy whether Bacon or Shakespeare wrote the plays attributed to Shakespeare.

Victor Ridder on behalf of himself and his brother Bernard, who are the proprietors of the New York Staats Zeitung, informed Mayor Mitchell May 5 that the editorial in that paper upholding the attitude of Mayor Thompson of Chicago, who refused to extend an invitation to the members of the French and British war commissions to visit Chicago, was written without the knowledge of the proprietors and did not in any way reflect their attitude.

THE WAR.

Seventy-five Norwegian vessels were sunk by German submarines in April and more than one hundred sailors lost their lives. If such monthly loss were maintained, Norway's merchant navy would be destroyed in a year and a half.

Northwest of Rheims French troops have taken the first German line on a front of about two and a half miles, capturing 600 prisoners in the operation.

King Alfonso of Spain is working hard to obtain the consent of all the warring governments to the exchange of prisoners of war captured in the early battles of the war.

The Russian provisional government has sent to the Russian representatives in the Entente Allied countries a note assuring the Allies that the change in government in Russia cannot afford a pretext for any slackening on the part of Russia in the common struggle of all the Entente Allies.

"During the month of April," says the official report from British headquarters in France May 1, "we have taken in the course of our offensive operations 19,343 German prisoners, including 393 officers. In the same period we also captured 257 guns and howitzers, including 98 heavy guns and howitzers, 227 trench mortars and 470 machine guns.

The American steamship Rockingham has been sunk by a German submarine. Two boats containing thirty-three men were picked up May 1—one by a patrol vessel. One boat containing thirteen men is missing.

President Artiguenave of Haiti has sent a message to the Senate and Chamber of Deputies in Congress demanding a declaration of war against Germany and a commission has been appointed to consider the question.

Germany has produced a superman of the air. Lieut. Baron von Richthofen, an aviator only lately come into prominence, has brought down his fifty-second airplane. This is the greatest number of machines brought down by any aviator of any army.

The British attacked May 3 on a front of over twelve miles and cut both the old and the new Hindenburg lines.

An American naval lieutenant and nine of his gun crew of twelve are believed to have lost their lives following an attack by a German submarine that torpedoed and sunk the American oil tanker Vacuum April 28.

In the first two months of unrestricted submarine warfare shipping to the amount of more than 1,600,000 tons was sunk by the Germans.

The troops of the German crown prince made violent and sustained but vain efforts May 1 to win back the important positions conquered by the French in the Champagne.

The French gained another very brilliant victory May 5 on the front north of the Aisne river at both ends of the Chewin des Dames, capturing over 4,300 prisoners.

The Peninsular and Oriental line steamship Ballarat, of 11,120 gross tons, which was used as a troop ship, was sunk recently by a German submarine. All the troops were saved.

The Thirteenth Turkish Army Corps has been driven by the British from its positions in Mesopotamia on both banks of the Shatt-el-Adhem, General Maude reported May 2.

One million three hundred thousand Germans are said to have perished in the war.

The French have repulsed heavy German counter attacks, consolidating new positions along eighteen miles of the Chemin-des-Dames. Seven German cannon have been taken; prisoners have increased to 6,100.

The British have maintained their position on the Hindenburg line at Bullecourt against several mass attacks.

Lectures and Meetings

The Seattle Rationalist Society meets Saturday at 8 p. m. in Strand Hall, 1525 Fourth avenue, Seattle, Wash.; L. A. Wheeler, president, 1330 First avenue. THE TRUTH SEEKER and other Free-thought literature for sale at all meetings. Admission is free.

Tacoma Rationalist Society meets every Sunday at 3 p. m. in Maccabees Hall, 1109 Broadway, Tacoma, Wash. S. T. Hammersmark, Secy., Colonial Hotel.

The Ferrer Association holds public meetings at the Ferrer Centre, 63 East 107th street, New York, every Saturday and Sunday evening, at 8.30, during the winter.

The Paterson Philosophical Society meets Sunday evenings at 8, at 202 Market st., over Garden Theater. Live subjects; interesting speakers. Frank Bamford, 111 Cliff st., secretary.

The Boston Freethought Society meets in Paine Memorial Hall, Appleton street, every Sunday at 3 P. M. J. P. Bland, B.D., is resident speaker, and THE TRUTH SEEKER is for sale at the door.

The Rationalist Society of Toledo, Ohio, meets in the Arcade Bldg., Room 133, St. Clair and Jackson sts., Wednesday evenings at 8.

The Chicago Freethought Society meets in Corinthian Hall, Masonic Temple, Sunday mornings, at 11 o'clock; H. Percy Ward, lecturer.

The Columbus Rationalist Association meets the second and fourth Tuesday evening of each month, 7.30 P. M., at the Hotel Vendome, Third street, opposite State House. O. C. Weatherby, president; Olin J. Ross, 23 East State street, Columbus, O., secretary.

The Freethought Congregation of Cedar Rapids, Iowa, meets every second Sunday of the month at the C. S. P. S. Hall, corner Eleventh Avenue and Third Street; Jos. J. Hajek, Speaker.

The Friendship Liberal League, (Inc.) of Philadelphia, meets every Sunday at 2.30 and 7.30, at 1417 Columbia avenue. Open platform. The Truth Seeker and liberal literature on sale. F. Garfield Bowers, secretary, 245 N. Ninth street.

The Milwaukee Rationalist Society meets every Friday evening in Convention Hall, Republican House. Joel Rubin, Pres., 9, 10 Cawker Bldg.

The Denver Rationalist Association meets the first and third Thursday of each month at 319 Kittredge Building; Olive Oliver, president.

The Church of This World, Rationalist. John Emerson Roberts, lecturer. Meetings every Sunday morning at 11 o'clock in Willis Wood Theatre, Kansas City, Mo. Mr. Roberts' services may be secured for wedding and funeral occasions. Address, 4011 Kenwood ave., Kansas City, Mo.

The Toledo Rationalist Society meets every Wednesday evening at 8, Room 133, Arcade Building, St. Clair and Jackson streets. W. M. Braun, secretary.

Speakers, Dr. Rullison, J. Carl, J. Braun and K. Pauli.

The Detroit Society of Truth Seekers (Lithuanian) meets the second Sunday of every month at 2 P. M. in C. O. F. Hall, Chene, cor. Trombly st.; Karl Rutkus, organizer, 338 West End ave., Detroit, Mich.

The Detroit Freethought Association meets every Sunday afternoon at 2 o'clock in Washington Hall, 46 Grand River ave., West. Edward N. Deibler, secretary, 478 Thirty-third st., Detroit, Mich.

"Cursed by the Past: Blessed by the Future"

REMSBURG'S LATEST WORK

Thomas Paine

The Apostle of Liberty

BY JOHN E. REMSBURG

This is the Great Address delivered by Remsburg in Chicago last year, pronounced a masterpiece of thrilling oratory. To the Address is added

The Testimony of Five Hundred Witnesses.

This list of the names and words of eminent persons in all walks of life who have praised Paine is a revelation even to his admirers and students, and the eulogy of Remsburg is unsurpassed.

220 Pages; 12mo, Paper, 50 Cents

Published and sold by

THE TRUTH SEEKER CO.
62 Vesey St. - New York

"INFIDELS AND CHARITY"

In Humanity's Name

An Account of the Work of Unbelievers for Charity and Philanthropy in the Establishment of Schools, Colleges, Hospitals

and other Institutions for the good of Humanity.

A Rebuke to the Orthodox Assertion that Unbelievers in Christianity are Indifferent to the Public Good.

By FRANKLIN STEINER
Author of "Religion and Roguery."

Price, 25 cents

Sold at the

TRUTH SEEKER OFFICE
62 VESEY STREET, NEW YORK

LAMBERT'S "NOTES ON INGERSOLL." By Helen M. Lucas. What the mannerless priest looks like to a woman who is accustomed to good company: with an examination of his "answers" to Ingersoll. Price, cloth bound. 237 pages, 75 cents.
62 Vesey Street, New York

THE TRUTH SEEKER

A Freethought and Agnostic Newspaper.

Vol. 44.—No. 20.

PUBLISHED
WEEKLY

New York, May 19, 1917.

62 VESEY
STREET

$3.00 Per Year

WHAT DOES IT ALL MEAN?

Reflections on the Life and Death of Man in View of the War and Religion.

BY ALFRED LOISY.

Without doubt, Alfred Loisy, the writer of this essay, was in scriptural studies the greatest scholar among Catholic clergymen of the latter half of the nineteenth century. As a young priest, he studied under Holtzmann at the University of Strassbourg, Alsace. Returning home, he was named professor at the Catholic Institute of Paris, which was the university of French Catholicism. Soon he began to publish the conclusions which his exegetical studies and researches developed, and with no small success crossed swords with Harnack of Berlin. During the ascendant days of Modernism under Leo XIII, when Gibbons of Baltimore, Ireland of St. Paul and Denis O'Connell in Rome were shining lights, all went well with Loisy. His review, published every second month, focussed the liberal thought of young clerical France and was abreast—aye, leading—the advanced movement in scripture, history and dogma. But Pius X banned Modernism with all its works and pomps. Loisy's review went on the Index, and work after work of his was condemned. He was ousted from his chair at the Catholic Institute. Later on, he was excommunicated with bell, book, and candle in the churches of France. Some time afterwards, I asked him: "What do people think of it?"

"Probably," he answered, "most of them fancy a new dogma has been promulgated." Soon France named him to the Chair of Religion in the College de France. During the first year of the war, he published a serious study on "War and Religion," which was translated by another ex-priest, Arthur Galton, the author of a history of the church of France not very flattering to ultramontanists.

Now THE TRUTH SEEKER offers to its readers this essay on "Death and Life." It was written for a literary club of Paris, known as "L'Union Pour La Verite" (Union for Truth). It is one of a series of papers published in the Union's monthly under the heading: "Talks of Noncombatants on the War." The translator is the well-known Rationalist, Joseph McCabe, who, like Loisy and Galton, is also an ex-priest. It is a common boast in Catholic circles that no educated priest leaves the fold. The fact is that of such lovers of truth and righteousness, the name is legion. Among them is proud to be numbered the writer of this brief introductory sketch. S. G.

WHAT use is it today to make philosophical reflections on the meaning of death and the meaning of life? Is it not only too clear that the life and death of men count for little, and that they mean little, in the general economy of the universe? The sun, in these days of sorrow, is no more moved by the lot of human beings than by the accidents that happen to some poor ant-hill or by the great carnage which goes on unceasingly amongst the animals of the earth or the fishes of its water. Yet life and death are still of some importance to men themselves, and they—those at least who, not being exposed to the acute issues of life and death, have nothing better to do—ask at times what life and death mean.

Most people live and die without pausing to reflect much on the nature of life and death. We are, it is true, in this world to live and to die, not to unravel the mystery of life and death. Fate has not appointed us judges of their inmost character. It has assigned our place in the world, and the society of which we form part has given us a code that is thought adequate for the guidance of our conduct during life, until we die. We have, indeed, but time and care enough to live, to fulfill the task that falls to us, to adjust ourselves to the conditions of our existence; not to reflect at any length upon life and death. The few who have the leisure to devote themselves to this contemplation are not always capable of it, or they have no taste for it and will not take the trouble. They would say that such a philosophy is of no essential use in the development of mankind, and that the summary views of those who march in the procession of life without reflecting upon it have more influence. The truth is that men live and die because they must live and die; they must live in expectation of death, and they follow their narrow paths without knowing too much, without seeing too far. We must, therefore, not exaggerate the real influence of the various creeds and theories which this theme of life and death has inspired. We must not attach too great a value to that creed or theory which may appeal to us.

Yet, since man is a thinking animal, his life cannot pass without giving him a certain idea of existence. But he seems to be in little haste to extract it; or, rather, he extracts it without much care, as if he were fixing his mind upon a subject of which he must necessarily form some idea, since that subject is himself. He has therefore dreamed endless dreams on the question of his nature and his destiny, imagining, beyond the bounds of reality, an invisible world that held sway over the visible, a world to which the dead made their silent way.

The character of this invisible world, as conceived by the imagination, has varied with the races and ages which conceived it. What has not varied, what we may regard as a principle which has really ruled the lives of men in all human societies, is the fact that individuals, reared and sustained by the social groups to which they belong, owe themselves in large part, if not entirely, to the community which maintains them. This principle, less obvious but more vital to the conscience than any belief in a life beyond the grave, is the supreme law of human relations since the origin of humanity. It is, therefore, the law of life, in the sense that the metaphysical idea of life and death bears to it the relation of a complement, an ornament, a symbol, to which the intellect turns in order to appease its own restlessness. The true law is not in the symbol in which the intellect finds rest, but in the principle which rules the will and the action.

The grave events which we witness today have not altered this state of things. Those who take the most active part in this clash of nations live and die swiftly, without discussing either life or death, defending their society, their country, their ideal of humanity; dying in order that this society, this country, or this ideal may live, quite apart, if one may venture to say it, from their own opinions and beliefs as to the philosophical, abstract, transcendental meaning of life and death. It is the idlers in the rear who feel the impulse to reflect, or, in some cases, to interpret in the interest of particular theories, doctrines, or religions or political parties, these colossal facts which of themselves support no particular theory or religion, and which, at first sight, prove only one thing—a thing already abundantly shown in history—the readiness of human commonwealths to sacrifice the lives of men in the interest, rightly or wrongly conceived, of their own preservation or expansion.

A religion makes assertions: it offers no proofs. It lives by asserting itself, and it is not difficult to see how it is maintained, sharing the life of the individuals and peoples who profess it. The apologists who seek to establish its truth by means of argument are not always the most convinced believers, and they are far from being the best servants of their faith. The simple believer feels no need to prove the truth of his religion, nor to make a logical defense of it against unbelievers. Since its truth is to him indisputably, intuitively evident, he feels that he expresses best this feature of it by professing and practicing it. There is beyond question a contagion in a sincere faith of this kind, preached in this artless way. And it is no less a fact within our experience that nothing is more dangerous to religious belief than a critical discussion of its contents, even when this discussion is entered upon for the purpose of defense.

Yet some sort of apologetic and rational evidence is indispensable in a world where the faith is exposed to contradiction and opposition. The task is, however, one of the greatest delicacy. It is a question of satisfying the enemy without making any concession to him; of replying to an objection—an objection which may be solid, if not irrefutable—without prejudice to the belief it assails: of approaching the unbeliever and seizing his point of view without leaving the traditional position or betraying the mind of the church. Hence the most distinguished advocates of orthodoxy have often been disavowed by her, and today the apologists of Catholicism are certain law writers whom the religious authorities could promptly call to order by condemning their departures from the official teaching whenever their responsibility was involved.

The Catholic church has its official body of proof, the fundamental principle of which is that the strict object of faith is not to be proved, since faith itself is a grace, a gift of God, not a conviction gradually and laboriously acquired by the use of reason. One might as well say that faith is not a subject of science nor of learned reason. And nothing could be more true than this. On the other hand, the church teaches that reason can demonstrate the existence of God and the fact of a divine revelation, which are attested by the miraculous circumstances in which, first the Jewish, then the Christian, religion arose and attained power. This demonstration does not inspire faith, but prepares the way for it; and it also settles, or is understood to settle, the difficulties of non-believers, by showing that not only is there nothing in the teaching of the faith which contradicts sound reason, but that the acceptance of so well attested a faith is, as it were, an act of the higher reason of which the simple natural reason has no ground to complain, and which, indeed, it ought to approve. If this acceptance of faith is not in the power of the humbler reason, it is because it transcends its sphere, not because it is in itself irrational. It would be difficult to express better the fact that all faith is based upon a principle superior to the individual, and to his personal resources of research and study.

It is needless to say that the weak point of this apologetic is its pretense of demonstration. The history of the Jewish and Christian religions is not a supernatural chapter in the general history of humanity. Its supernatural character exists only in the faith which has itself created the miracles. In the long run the supposed demonstration takes for granted all the usual presuppositions of faith. It proves God, the revelation of God in Christ, and the divine foundation of the church, only for those who already believe these things before they see the proof. Believers themselves begin to see these things, and that is why the defense is being transferred to another field. The traditional method of proof is left in the sanctuary, theologically em-balanced, like the ancient dogmas of which it has been a part since the Vatican Council. For it is now a matter of faith—the point is not without humor—that this body of proof is convincing. We need not wonder that it drops out of use. It would have been just as well to decree that in future it should be used only among the faithful. The church has declared its arguments to be sound because the world would take no further notice of them and refused to be impressed by them. They were sound only for herself, and her defenders were compelled to use a different language in addressing our rebellious age.

What is called "Catholic Modernism" was an attempt at apologetics proceeding from the church, chiefly from members of the Catholic clergy, and its pitiful failure is due to that very reason. It was due also to the fact that it was not merely a simple defense of the ancient faith: it was at the same time, and in even larger measure, an attempt at reform. The ecclesiastical authorities would not suffer priests and monks to suggest to them that they might secure the future of the church by modifying its attitude toward the modern world, by reconstructing its teaching or revising its discipline. This defense of the church by means of regeneration was something very different from pleading its cause, cleverly or otherwise; it was also something different from a capitulation, since one does not capitulate in seeking and establishing the truth. The Modernists were not content with saying that the Catholic faith adapts man to the conditions of his existence; they said also that Catholicism must adapt itself to the conditions of contemporary life. What they proposed was not merely an apology; it was a remedy of a religious crisis the existence of which only a blind man would question. It was a dangerous remedy, some say. Who doubts it? But who will be bold enough to say that the rejection of the remedy has put an end to the disease? Or does the noise which the apologists of the church make about what they call "the religious revival" prevent the crisis of belief from continuing, even, perhaps mainly, amongst the clergy?

The famous novelist, [M. Paul Bourget], a past master in the psychology of adultery, who fancies he discovered that the Modernist movement was the work of "the demon of the south," seems to have wished to deceive his public, and even himself, as to the deeper causes of the movement when he represented it as the dream of mature men who felt the restraint of discipline and celibacy. This foolish piece of vulgarity did not occur to the pope himself when he, not too confidently, declared that pride was the fundamental sin of the Modernists. Hence the criticism launched against these unfortunate innovators would not be worth noticing if it were not part of a new apologetic—an academic, worldly, reactionary apologetic—which we find even professed unbelievers undertaking to defend. One may be permitted to observe that certain supposed studies which profess to be experiences, certain masterpieces of what is called experimental apologetics, are merely elaborate pieces of fiction and experiences of literary art.

After caricaturing and calumniating Modernism without any knowledge of it—for no one with the slightest knowledge of it could represent it as an attempt to restore primitive Christianity—these people now would tell us "the meaning of death;" as if any person now needed such an explanation. Death! Unhappily, we all understand it today. We feel it, we experience it in each of our brothers who fall on the field; and it is not necessary for anyone to come and preach us a sermon about it in the interest of any doctrine whatever. And if this sermon forms part of a reactionary movement, if an ancient belief is put forward in a political interest, if people talk to us about a future life for the advantage of a narrow and outworn idea of our national system, the sermon is an insult to our dead, whose heroic deed it undoes, and to our grief, which it would exploit. Those whom we have lost knew well for what cause they went to their death, and we also know it well. Let their sacrifice and ours be respected. Let no one try to enroll us, in their name, under a flag which was not theirs! They died for France, for the France of today and tomorrow, and they had no vain ambition to restore the past. Let no one seek to make them bear witness against the ideal of liberty for which they fell. We are the witnesses as to what they had at heart.

But we are told that a certain religion is the only one that enables us to face death courageously, and that this religion alone gives life its proper equilibrium. We are told that it alone adapts us to the moral requirements and inexorable conditions of life and death; from which we ought to conclude that this faith, the light of man's existence, is the eternal truth of God. Let us look a little more closely into these lofty statements.

What first strikes a reader who has the least acquaintance with the Modernist controversy is the analogy, one could almost say the identity, of its proposals with certain doctrines which were condemned under the name of Modernism by the predecessor of Benedict XV. Certain mystic philosophers, men who paraded no design of reforming the traditional theology, had ventured to say that the truth of religion was proved by experience, and they seemed to regard with some disdain, under the name of "Extrinsicism," the official method of Christian apologetics, canonized by the Vatican Council, which insists that reason, and reason only, can demonstrate the existence of God and the genuineness of the Christian revelation. There was, according to them, a kind of intimate relation between the needs of human nature and the teaching of religion, and they held that the truth of this religion was made clear by realizing itself, so to say, in the believer, who felt himself living in faith, adjusted to life by faith, raised to a higher life by means of his faith. The new doctrine was described as "Immanence" or "Pragmatism," and this betrayed its non-Catholic origin. To say that you can prove the truth of religion in your own personal and intimate experience is to enter upon the path of Protestantism. To say that you can prove it by its practical value smacks of America, where Pragmatism has, in point of fact, found its most distinguished exponent.

There was a good deal of psychological truth in these theories, seeing that the believer derives spiritual comfort from his belief—that he "lives by faith," as scripture says—and that the faith is in consequence of inestimable value to him in his life. But this experience of faith is possible, and is indeed actually felt, with very different kinds of belief, so that, if we face the matter candidly, it cannot prove the absolute truth of any of them. That is what the official theologians of the Catholic church saw clearly, and, without regard to the Catholic sentiments of the apologists, whether Immanentists or Pragmatists, they did not hesitate to condemn their principle, since, however true it was in its way, it was subversive of Catholicism. It was not enough that these thinkers bore witness that their experience fixed them in the Roman church: that they felt, experienced, and saw in the depths of their souls the real presence of Christ in the eucharist, the infallibility of the pope, the historicity of the Bible, the virginal conception of Christ, and all the other dogmas defined by the church. Who could guarantee that they would experience tomorrow what they said they experienced today? And even if they personally had this experience, was it not only too clear that others might be without it; and that one person might lack the intuitive experience of the mystery of the Blessed Trinity, another the inner conviction of redemption by the death of Christ, and a third the feeling of the historical truth of the Bible?

Hence they excluded from the bosom of the church the theological Babel of Protestantism. In face of this disquieting prospect Rome declared emphatically that the external rule of faith, which is the traditional teaching, has a corresponding internal test of its truth, the inner rational certainty which is engendered by visible miracles, such as had from the start given authenticity also to the external revelation. The evidence for the faith consists in this supernatural mechanism. The Catholic must not believe because he has intimately experienced and realized the truth of the doctrine he believes; he must submit his intelligence to the teaching of a church established by God for the purpose of controlling the mind of man in matters of belief.

It matters little that the system is outworn, ruinous, and indeed already in ruins. In the view of this official and theological Catholicism those who set out to restore the apologetic of Immanence and Pragmatism are unconscious heretics. They plead the truth of a doctrine which condemns them. Probably someone pointed out this, after publication, to the apologist who wrote the work, "The Meaning of Death," because he has thought it expedient to explain his position very carefully in the preface which he wrote for another work, "The Voyage of the Centurion." He says:

"It is certain that usefulness is not a measure of truth; but it is not less certain that usefulness gives us a presumption of truth, so that Pragmatism, which as a definite philosophy is erroneous—a scholastic distinction which betrays a scrupulous determination to be orthodox—is quite legitimate as a method and beginning of inquiry. . . . It is a first stage in which the sincerely religious soul will not linger. Action is not enough for such a soul; or, rather action is but a symbol of a spiritual reality which such a soul needs to reach. . . . A living truth which must be felt as well as understood."

One does not very clearly understand this "action" which is a "symbol," but it is, unfortunately, only too plain that the novelist has drawn back before the yawning pit of Pragmatism only to plunge head first in the bottomless abyss of Immanentism. We thought we had read—we had, in fact, read—in "The Meaning of Death" that the fact that it prepared man to do his duty in face of death was an experimental proof of the truth of the Christian religion. The author, warned of the danger to which he is exposed on the Pragmatist side, now turns round and tells us that his argument is not decisive, and that the proper evidence is one's personal realization of this usefulness, one's inner experience of Catholic truth. But the Immanentist apologetic, the argument from inner experience, is just as much condemned as that of Pragmatism, of verified usefulness, by the Encyclical Pascendi and the Anti-Modernist declaration of Pius X.

As to the future life—the article of faith which "The Meaning of Death" would demonstrate by means of Pragmatism—William James declines to postulate it as a belief guaranteed by its usefulness.

"Religion," he says, "for the great majority of our race means immortality, and nothing else. God is the producer of immortality and whoever has doubts of immortality is written down as an Atheist without further trial. I have said nothing in my lectures about immortality, or the belief therein, for it seems to me a secondary point. If our ideals are only cared for in 'eternity,' I do not see why we might not be willing to resign their care to other hands than ours. Yet I sympathize with the urgent impulse to be present ourselves, and in the conflict of impulses, both of them so vague yet both of them so noble, I know not how to decide. It seems to me that it is eminently a case for facts to testify. Facts, I think, are yet lacking to prove 'spirit-return,' though I have the highest respect for the patient labors of Messrs. Myers, Hodgson, and Hyslop, and am somewhat impressed by their favorable conclusions. I consequently leave the matter open, with this brief word to save the readers from a possible perplexity as to why immortality got no mention in the body of this book" ("Varieties of Religious Experience," p. 524.)

Here is a philosopher who speaks like an honest man. But how imprudent to invoke his authority, in the name of Pragmatism, at the conclusion of "The Meaning of Death"! William James has not the least idea of making the equilibrium of the moral life depend upon the belief in immortality, and he even suggests that the higher interest of the universe may not require that we remain in it eternally to help on the reign of justice or enjoy a share in it.

(To be continued.)

Mark Twain's Brother.

"You must put him in a book or a play right away! You are the only man capable of doing it." So Mark Twain wrote, concerning his brother Orion, to William Dean Howells. A series of letters written by Mark Twain to Mr. Howells and others is now given to the American public in Harper's Magazine. In the letter already quoted from he went on to exhort Mr. Howells: "You might die at any moment, and your very greatest work would be lost to the world. I could write Orion's simple biography, too, by merely stating the bald facts . . . but you must put him into romance."

Orion was one of the most human creatures that ever lived, remarks Albert Bigelow Paine, who edits the letters; his humanity excluded every form of artificiality. To such a close friend as Howells, Mark Twain evidently could not resist telling the amusing truth about this all-too-human brother. In one letter he is led into penning an elaborate portrait of the childlike Orion. Could any novel have made him more living and plausible?

"Observe Orion's career—that is, a little of it: He has belonged to as many as five different religious denominations; last March he withdrew from the deaconship in a Congregational church and the superintendency of its Sunday school, in a speech in which he said that for many months (it runs in my mind that he said thirteen years) he had been a confirmed Infidel, and so felt it to be his duty to retire from the flock.

"2. After being a Republican for years, he wanted me to buy him a Democratic newspaper. A few days before the Presidential election, he came out in a speech and publicly went over to the Democrats; he prudently 'hedged' by voting for six state Republicans, also.

"The new convert was made one of the secretaries of the Democratic meeting, and placed in the list of speakers. He wrote me jubilantly of what a ten-strike he was going to make with that speech. All right—but this of his innocent and pathetic candor in writing me something like this, a week later:

"I was more diffident than I had expected to be, and this was increased by the silence with which I was received when I came forward; so I seemed unable to get the fire into my speech which I had calculated upon, and presently they began to get up and go out; and in a few minutes they all rose up and went away."

"How could a man uncover such a sore as that and show it to another? Not a word of complaint, you see—only a patient, sad surprise."

"3. His next project was to write a burlesque upon 'Paradise Lost.'

"4. Then, learning that the Times was paying Harte $100 a column for stories, he concluded to write some for the same price. I read his first one and persuaded him not to write any more."

"5. Then he read proof on the New York Evening Post at $10 a week and meekly observed that the foreman swore at him and ordered him around 'like a steamboat mate.'

"6. Being discharged from that post, he wanted to try agriculture—was sure he could make a fortune out of a chicken farm. I gave him $900 and he went to a ten-house village two miles above Keokuk on the river bank—this place was a railway station. He soon asked for money to buy a horse and light wagon—because the trains did not run at church time on Sunday and his wife found it rather far to walk."

"For a long time I answered demands for 'loans' and by next mail always received his check for the interest due me to date. In the most guileless way he let it leak out that he did not underestimate the value of his custom to me, since it was not likely that any other customer of mine paid his interest quarterly, and this enabled me to use my capital twice in six months instead of only once. But alas! when the debt at last reached $1,800 or $2,500 (I have forgotten which) the interest ate too formidably into his borrowings, and so he quietly ceased to pay it or speak of it. At the end of two years I found that the chicken farm had long ago been abandoned, and he had moved into Keokuk. Later, in one of his casual moments, he observed that there was no money in fattening a chicken on 65 cents worth of corn and then selling it for 50."

"7. Finally, if I would lend him $500 a year for two years (this was four or five years ago) he knew he could make a success as a lawyer, and would prove it. This is the pension which we have just increased to $600. The first year his legal business brought him $5. It also brought him an unremunerative case where some villains were trying to chouse some negro orphans out of $700. He still has this case. He has waggled it around through various courts and made some booming speeches on it. The negro children have grown up and married off, now, I believe, and their litigated town-lot has been dug up and carted off by somebody—but Orion still infests the courts with his documents and makes the welkin ring with his venerable case. The second year he didn't make anything. The third he made $6, and I made Bliss put a case in his hands—about half an hour's work. Orion charged $50 for it—Bliss paid him $15. Thus four or five years of lawing has brought him $26, but this will doubtless be increased when he gets done lecturing and buys that 'law library.' Meanwhile his office rent has been $60 a year, and he has stuck to that lair day by day as patiently as a spider."

"8. Then he by and by conceived the idea of lecturing around America as 'Mark Twain's Brother'—that to be on the bill. Subject of proposed lecture, 'On the Formation of Character.'

"9. I protested, and he got on his war paint, couched his lance, and ran a bold tilt against total abstinence and the Red Ribbon fanatics. It raised a fine row among the virtuous Keokukians."

"10. I wrote to encourage him in his good work, but I had let a mail intervene; so by the time my letter reached him he was already winning laurels as a Red Ribbon Howler."

"11. Afterward he took a rabid part in a prayer-meeting epidemic; dropped that to travesty Jules Verne; dropped that, in the middle of the last chapter, last March, to digest the matter of an Infidel book which he proposed to write; and now he comes to the surface to rescue our 'noble and beautiful religion' from the sacrilegious talons of Bob Ingersoll."

"Now come! Don't fool away this treasure which Providence has laid at your feet, but take it up and use it. One can let his imagination run riot in portraying Orion, for there is nothing so extravagant as to be out of character with him."

Cataleptic Christianity.

Sometime I am going into a saloon and see for myself whether the proprietor is weasel-eyed. Sometime I'm going into a college and see whether the professor of biology is a polecat. Sometime I am going to heaven and ask Jesus if he would rip out a fellow's bowels for the honor of the Star Spangled Banner.

I've been to the Big Show and I'm confused. I went twice. It's located on Broadway from 166th to 168th street. There are 20,000 seats and all of them were filled at both performances.

"Do you think he is sincere?" was the one question people asked when I told them I had heard Billy Sunday.

I don't know and I don't care. What difference does it make whether an idiot who drools on you is sincere or not?

I was not offended in the least by Billy's slang. He can call God a good skate and the Holy Ghost a regular guy without the slightest protest from me. Neither am I offended at the way he blasphemes—making God out to be such a horrible monster that any self-respecting man would want to get to hell out of his way as soon as possible. It is no part of my business to defend God. If the Almighty can't defend himself, he needn't expect any help from me. Then again, gods are usually created by men in their own image; and Billy Sunday's God couldn't be a very intelligent or high-minded personality.

I'd like to meet his Devil. Anyone who incurs Billy Sunday's hatred as that Devil does must have something worth while about him. But I'm not sure. Billy isn't much of a judge. Saloon-keepers with him are invariably weasel-eyed, Unitarians are hell-begotten, people who think for themselves are dirty dogs, and scientists are rattlesnakes. Anyone who doesn't accept Billy's theology in toto is a damned skunk, and if you think there is anything nobler in life than a puddle of blood, you stink.

This is the "Word of God," as preached to 40,000 New Yorkers daily by a man for whom most metropolitan ministers are standing sponsor. They call it a revival. It isn't. It's a petition in spiritual bankruptcy. In the two "sermons" I heard, there wasn't a note of idealism or a single appeal to human love and brotherhood. They were all about Billy Sunday and the terrible things he and God were going to do to the stinking unbelievers.

But Billy in a way is foxy, although I couldn't help thinking it was the foxiness of pure cowardice. His game is to draw the crowd and demonstrate to the ministers that the people are attracted by the "pure gospel." If the churches didn't support him, he would get no following, and a single frost would alienate the church support. What the churches want is people, as many people as they can consistently attract. There are certain things they won't do in order to attract them, but if the people can be attracted by the "pure gospel," they are willing to compromise generally on culture and taste. So Billy preaches the "pure gospel," damns everybody to hell who doesn't believe in the Puddle of Blood, curses saloon-keepers, "rips dancing from hell to breakfast and back again to lunch"—and not only draws the crowd but makes it apparent that the crowd is with him.

How does he do it? That is where his foxiness comes in.

After he had preached his gruesome gospel, the old-time evangelist used to call for a response—"Will those of you who have accepted the Lord Jesus Christ as your savior, and are trying to lead a consecrated Christian life, stand up?" Billy doesn't take any such desperate chance; the ministers might get wise that the "pure gospel" isn't as popular as it seemed to be. He doesn't even take a vote as to whether saloon-keepers are weasel-eyed or Unitarians stink. No, he winds up with a peroration about the American flag, somehow manages to get Jesus into the trenches—Billy's Jesus, I believe, belongs to the Iowa National Guard—gives Rodey a sign to start up the Star Spangled Banner and yells: "Now, all of you who are willing to fight for Christ and your country, stand up."

The vote was almost unanimous. I wasn't acquainted with any such Christ and I didn't own any country, but I was in a hopeless minority, the "pure gospel" was vindicated, the ministers were apparently convinced and Billy's game was won. I do not know that Billy Sunday is a coward. But I know that it would take some degree of courage to poll his audience on the ideas he professes to believe, while any coward could get by in New York these days with this adroit use of the flag.

So Billy's big show is made to boost the recruiting tents lined up in front of the Tabernacle. In the name of him who said "Resist not evil," he calls upon his hearers to resist the evil Germans. In the name of him who said "Love your enemies," he calls for recruits to shoot them full of holes. In the name of him who told us to turn the other cheek, he calls upon us to gouge out the other fellow's eyes. In the name of the Prince of Peace, let us go to war. In the name of the meek and lowly Jesus, let us go to war. In the name of the Son of God, let us murder the sons of—these aren't the exact slogans of the barkers, but you get the idea.

I want to be fair to Billy Sunday. When radical friends expressed their disgust for him, I thought they were not fair. Admitting that he was narrow, I said, and that his theology was antiquated and his manner coarse, admitting even that he was being used by shrewd capitalists to discourage unionism and that he gave himself rather freely to the contemptible work, still he must have some gripping personal message, some word of hope or comfort which distressed souls are anxious to hear.

I'll take it all back. Billy Sunday makes his appeal to the basest things in the nature of man—to fear, to cowardice, to ignorance, to superstition and to hate.

In view of that message, it is of no consequence whatever whether Billy Sunday is sincere or not; whether he is in the game for the money or just for pure spite. Whatever he is, he is loathsome. If he is on the Lord's side, I want to be on the devil's. If he's a sample of what the blood of Christ can do, I don't want to be infected by a single drop. If he is a typical citizen of heaven, let us all give three cheers for hell.

No, I don't hate him and I think in a way he is apt to do some good. He is calling the bluff of the churches as it was never called before. He is presenting their voodoo worship in all its unlovely nakedness, without that touch of human idealism which induced many people to accept it in days gone by.

The gospel of eternal torture (to those who dare to think) used to be preached as an awful truth. Billy preaches it as a delicious joke. He gloats over the torments, dances gleefully at the very thought of them, and quite consistently mocks and curses the people he supposes will be picked as victims. I have no reason to believe he is not sincere. There are such perverts. But what, I wonder, does any decent person expect to accomplish through such an exhibition?

My guess is that Billy is sincere, while the exhibition itself is a fake. The preachers accept Billy because they think he is popular, while the people accept him because they think he is a preacher.

The preachers think he talks the language of the people. He doesn't. He talks stale slang and gibberish. The people think he is expounding their religion. He isn't. I don't believe there are a hundred men in New York who have such a vicious religion as this man expounds. But, like the old lady who "worshiped" at Blatchford's, thinking it was a Wesleyan chapel, they draw liberally on their expectations and are duly comforted. The organization, the publicity and the freak performance does the rest.

Any cataleptic can draw a crowd in New York by having a fit on the sidewalk. If he would advertise it at regular hours, and get three hundred ministers to vouch that it was a new kind of miracle, the crowds should be equal to those in the tabernacle. And the show would be equally as good.—Charles W. Wood, in the Masses.

"The Rev. Dr. Eckman said 'the idea of the old-fashioned hell, where one's body was cast into the burning pit and subjected to everlasting fire, is improbable, impossible, because it is against the law of reason.' It may be against the law of reason, but it is not against the law of the God of the Bible. Is not his appeal to reason only rank Rationalism? What has reason got to do with faith? Can it be that Dr. Eckman has gone over to those whose Bible is the 'Age of Reason'?"

So writes Frank Newlin in the Times of Scranton, Pa., who continues: "The old-fashioned doctrine of hell is the main contribution of the New Testament to theology. It is the one doctrine that chiefly distinguishes it from the Old Testament. The doctrine of a demon-haunted hell of burning brimstone in which roasting and writhing souls shriek in unspeakable agonies through all the endless ages of eternity is unquestionably the piece de résistance of the New Testament, and no candid man will deny it. It is no use trying to play the ostrich with God's unerring word." His final word is "Hell and Christianity are now and forever one and inseparable." We suspect Mr. Newlin of being an unbeliever exercising his gift as a disputant to make Christians stand by the plain teachings of the gospel and of the religion professing to be built on the words of Christ. The greatest of past, present and future American clergymen, now with us, says there is a hell all right, and he knows—he knows.

THE TRUTH SEEKER.

FOUNDED BY D. M. BENNETT, 1873
CONTINUED BY E. M. MACDONALD, 1883-1909
G. E. MACDONALD Editor
L. K. WASHBURN Editorial Contributor
Sixty-two Vesey Street, New York, N. Y.
Post Office Box 1610.

SATURDAY - - - MAY 19, 1917

What Has the Devil Done?

I would like to know what the devil has done that human beings are supposed to hate his name and speak of him with venomous tongue. We are told what God has done, and we are forced to despise him for his words and deeds, and, if the devil is guilty of worse speech and acts, then are we ready to heap a mountain of just condemnation upon his head. It is many, many years since Satan (the Old Testament name for the New Testament devil) came upon the earth to work havoc in the Garden of Eden which the Lord God had established.

Where did the devil, a Satan, come from when he made his sudden appearance in Eden? Where had he been living up to that eventful time? What had been his business? To the Roman Catholics, Satan was a public school teacher looking for a job. He found one. And ever since he instructed Eve, he has pursued his calling to the benefit of man and to the humiliation of Roman Catholicism. He was the kind of person that Romanism hates, a person who tells the truth.

First, let us look into the origin of the devil. Was he created by the Lord God, or was spontaneous generation his first parents? There is no mention in the story of creation of any serpent that could talk. He was a foreigner, evidently, but familiar with the ways and language of the Lord God. In the words of to-day: He was on to him.

The Garden of Eden fable is the best narrative in the Bible for the Freethinker. The serpent shines resplendently in the story, while the Lord God looks like thirty cents, or less, in comparison.

The first act of divinity is devilish, and the first act of the devil is divine.

Think of it! God a liar and the devil a truth-teller! That serpent can never be killed and that God must lose his worshippers.

Where to seek to find the devil of Orthodox Christianity I do not know. Or where to look to find his tomb (if he be dead) I do not know. In history he has no place. There is no record of his birth, life or death in any reliable chronicle. Whether he had a father or mother, brother or sister, no one can tell.

It is only in religious literature where the devil is found. The believer in God is usually the one who believes in the devil. The devil as well as God is a fictitious individual. He lives where God lives, in human imagination.

It is to be regretted that the Christian church has been so afraid of the truth, and it is no excuse that it has followed its Lord in lying, for it should have had a God who was white clear through, not one who was a little white and a good deal black. The Christian church does not stand upon a historical foundation: upon facts that can be demonstrated. All of its doctrines are chimerical; all of its personnel are marionettes. The supernatural is a world which has no existence, and so its characters are not real. The devil is one of the characters of a supernatural world.

To reach a healthy state man should live in a natural world, and to do this, he must abolish every thing supernatural that is taught, for it is all false. Not only must the devil go, but everything else that belongs to a supernal system. The upper world is no truer than the under world, angels no more real than devils.

Just where to draw the line between what is true and what is false is not a hard question. I should say: Draw the line between what is natural and what is supernatural.

One thing the world has yet to learn, and that is that nothing that is supernatural has ever lived. Another thing is that where it has painted the influence and performances of the devil, the devil was not there.

The first devil, or Satan, was a serpent that could talk in a human language. I ask an intelligent people to say whether such a serpent ever lived. An honest answer to that question settles the existence of a devil.

Every story about the devil is false; every narrative of the devil's doings is a lie; everything said of the devil is untrue, for the reason that the devil never did a single act on earth, or anywhere else; for the further and greater reason that there is no devil, never was a devil, and never will be a devil.

L. K. W.

For Democracy in Taxation.

The Ways and Means Committee at Washington has framed and reported the War Revenue bill for which the country has been looking. The bill does not leave anything unmortgaged to the government, except the churches. Nothing is said in it about putting a tax on ecclesiastical property. It proposes to go back a year and tax the incomes for 1916, already settled for, but the churches that have dodged taxation for decades are overlooked.

The churches are able to own property in the city of New York valued at something like three hundred millions ($300,000,000). Calling this one-tenth of the valuation in the entire country, the holdings foot up three thousand millions, or $3,000,000,000. Anyone may easily compute the tax on this sum at an average rate of 2 per cent., which families are paying on their homes. It appears to be about $60,000,000, or say $3 for every voter.

The churches are able to raise enormous sums for foreign missions. In March of this year the Presbyterian General Assembly, in session at Atlantic City, N. J., authorized the spending of $6,250,000 for missions. The other evangelical churches raise proportionate sums for their work, while Catholics equal them, and send millions to the pope as Peter's Pence.

They can raise the money to pay 175,000 preachers of the gospel. Their church buildings are said to number more than two hundred thousand. They can hire a knockabout evangelist at $50,000 per engagement, and spend two hundred thousand for a tabernacle and expenses.

While parasitic because of their exemption from taxes for state and local purposes, the churches exert great political influence. They practice upon legislatures, procuring laws to put their Bible and religious teachings into the public schools, securing appropriations for the support of their various so-called charitable institutions, and for the enforcement of a religious observance of their holy day. They place their missionaries in the army, the navy, Congress, legislatures, and all sorts of public departments and institutions, and make the people pay them. Their ministers enjoy all the rights and privileges of citizens, while shirking their responsibilities. The preachers are not taxed on their property, nor are they subject to civic or military duty. They are deadheads, spongers, grafters. They assume authority in morals, but neglect the fundamental morality of paying for what they get.

For the world war and our participation in it the churches are as much to blame as the governments; more so than the peoples as a whole, who have been practically voiceless while the pulpits have demanded blood. The church has never denounced war as such, although it has fought science, freedom and progress political and social. Its prohibitions are countless; its anathemas have fallen on a thousand kinds of human activities, but never on the form of mass murder called war.

The question arises, if the church has in the past possessed the power to abolish warfare between nations, and did not do it; if through all the centuries men and ships going forth to war have had the blessing of the church, and if today the church is still militant and in favor of armed strife, then why should not the church bear its share of the cost of prosecuting the war? As we have pointed out, that share, apportioned according to the wealth of our ecclesiastical bodies, would be considerable. But the principle is more important than the revenue. In a country where church and state are nominally divorced, making favorites of the religious institutions is illicit and meretricious. Equal and impartial taxation is one of the first principles of democracy, and our government tells us that is what we are fighting for.

The Faculty of Lying.

In the light of ordinary man's daily experience it ought not to be surprising why the philosophical governor, Pontius Pilate, propounded the inquiry, "What is Truth?" It seems that mankind has happened upon an age when nothing is of less interest to the majority of the people than to speak the truth and to acquire a knowledge of the truth. It matters little to what department of human thought or action we address ourselves, in every instance the results are practically the same, the one great desire of the heart is not to utter truth, but as far as possible to conceal the truth under the plausibility of a well-planned deceit.

The question naturally arises, is there in the heart of man a sincere love of the truth, or is man swayed in his motives in general by a love of what is agreeable for those things which conduce to his worldly pleasure and happiness? No matter where we turn in our investigations, whether it be to political life, business life, social life or religion, we find everywhere the same self-seeking disposition, the same grasping after the agreeable and profitable, the same pride of personal comfort and personal distinction; and all these are maintained at the expense of essential truth, without which life becomes devoid of every quality of lasting integrity and worth.

When this state of things is considered with reference to religion, one is inclined to believe that the last item that enters into the maintenance and spread of religion is truth. What does religion mean to the ordinary believer? It means to a marked degree, prosperity in business, a circle of agreeable acquaintances, amenity from the mental labor of religious investigation, and as a general result, a freedom from friction and social antagonisms which allows one to repose in an Elysium of continued irresponsibility and unconcern, as though the matter of truth had been permanently settled. The marked ignorance shown by the majority of Christians of the history and dogmatic records of their own religion, not to speak of the relation of that religion to the religions which preceded it, is evidence sufficient that the aim of such persons has not been the discovery of truth, but the vindication of a particular type of thinking which has come to them as one of several inheritances.

The great injury that has been done to the cause of truth by the misrepresentatives of religious teachers is one of the most indelible stains to be found anywhere in the long history of humanity. It has narrowed the ability of men to recognize the truth even when it is clearly presented; it has robbed the human heart in a significant degree of its love for essential truth; it has developed in mankind generally a disposition to accept the course of events in our world without applying to them a critical scrutiny such as would tend to lay bare the truth. One might think that it was impossible to find the truth anywhere. In books known as "standard histories" no two reports of political affairs and the progress of religion are exactly alike. Stories of civil and religious conventions differ. No two reporters agree as to the truth of some ordinary fact or event. In a book of quotations which we inspected recently, we found that a large proportion, nearly one third of the citations had been repeated in a somewhat altered form, from that in which the author or iginally wrote them; not one of them textually followed the original.

We are told that it is a classic of legal practice that there are liars, damned liars, and experts. However this may be, we are disposed to believe that a second place, at least, must be accorded those who lie for the kingdom of heaven's sake. Religious statements which Protestants consider palpable lies have been forced upon the world by Romanists for many hundreds of years; and the judgment of the Romanist regarding the creed of Protestantism is that it reeks with the vilest heresies. Here we have a picture of the religious world of today. Both sides cannot be telling the truth. One or the other must be lying. The most hopeful outlook for humanity's future is in the conclusion that neither institution is telling the truth. Why ask whether a lie is ever justifiable? Religion has decided that it is. And so long as religion in its popular acceptation remains with us, just so long will the pious lie find an abiding place in the superstitious heart.

The So-Called Spiritual Faculty.

When the ordinary Christian has demonstrated his inability to prove the postulates of his religion, he usually finds it convenient to fall back, as a last resort, upon the Bible text that "spiritual truths must be spiritually discerned." By this saying he would have men to understand that if they cannot appreciate the truthfulness and beauty of the gospel revelation, it cannot be because of any defect in the message, or the true believer's ability to expound the faith convincingly, but must, in the final analysis of the case, be due to a lack of some personal quality on the part of the unbeliever. In other words, the religionist does not hesitate to declare that the man who refuses to accept the doctrines of Christianity is an imperfect being; he is lacking in the spiritual faculty; he is really a defective.

If this be true, it is important to inquire concerning the authority for the existence of this spiritual faculty. It will not be enough for the religious devotee to wave the whole case aside by saying that certain persons are incapable of passing judgment upon religion because they have no spiritual discernment. If this argument be as conclusive as some Christians consider it, it certainly ought to have a solid basis in fact, and be susceptible of as ready recognition by the unbeliever as by the believer. We are told by Bishop Butler, a well-known Anglican prelate, that "reason is the only faculty we have wherewith to judge concerning anything, even revelation itself." The teaching of psychology since the day it became a science amply testifies to the truthfulness of the statement made by this Christian bishop. If perchance there be such a thing as a spiritual faculty, it is obvious enough that it must be inferior to the faculty of reason, if reason is the only faculty by which we are enabled to judge concerning anything.

In order that the expression, spiritual faculty, carry with it some definite import, those who believe in its existence ought by all means to define what they mean by the word spiritual. After two thousand years of Christianity the world is still waiting for a useful definition of this word. Considering the great importance that is attached to it by the church and religious people, it would seem that there ought to be no difficulty in declaring its meaning; but the fact is that it never has been defined because it cannot be defined. There is no such thing as spirit or spiritual faculty, and least of all, a spiritual world. This idea of the spiritual is but a mental conception, highly appreciated and enjoyed by peculiar types of mind, but having no more reality in fact than the interesting stories of fairy land, and the charming unrealities of the gnomie world. "To make the brain the slave of a brain-created idea," says a modern author, "is as foolish as to subordinate the substance to the shadow." The efforts made by religious people to bring others under the jurisdiction of their brain products without affording the slightest legal evidence for their truthfulness or utility, is but one of the many exasperating conditions associated with religion.

"A man whose reason rejects religion," says the Christian believer, "is unfit to criticize religion, and only those who accept religion as true are qualified to express an opinion as to its truth." Were this conclusion to govern all human operations, the results to the world would be lamentable in the extreme. By equality of reasoning no one would be able to do the devil justice unless he lived the life of the devil. There is no doubt that the devil has often been maligned by "ungodly" persons, as when on one occasion—fully attested to by the "divine scriptures"—the devil, while in conversation with our first parents, made known to them the truth, when the prophecy of their heavenly father was not exactly verified; but it is an easy matter to acquire a knowledge of the works of the devil from the lives and writings of religionists without accompanying the second divinity in person. It is likewise possible to acquire a full and perfect knowledge of religion in all its multitudinous ramifications without being a follower of Buddha, Jesus, or Mohammed.

In a letter recently addressed to this office by a person who had chanced upon one of our publications, we met with a practical illustration of the workings of this "spiritual faculty." The burden of his letter centered around the puerility that we are setting ourselves "above the word of God and of Jesus Christ, and questioning their revelations and teachings." This is another sample of the old practice of Christians to arrogate to themselves all honesty and sincerity while denying to unbelievers the possession of such virtues. A long experience has taught us that the belief in God is the least consequential mental concept ever known to the world. If it was intended to accomplish something really beneficent for humanity, it has proved a failure; the "scheme" does not work. Besides, what is the obligation necessitating every man to believe in God? His existence has not been proved, and the most accurate theological thinkers of every age have not hesitated to declare that his existence is not capable of demonstration, but must be received on faith. If John possesses the spiritual faculty and as a consequence chooses to believe there is a God, that is no reason whatever why James should adopt the same belief, especially if it can be shown that the latter is wanting in the spiritual faculty. There is no moral obligation resting upon any man to accept as truth a proposition that has not been proven. Even the founder of Christianity, Paul the apostle, found no hesitation in saying: "Prove all things; hold fast that which is good."

The position taken by THE TRUTH SEEKER during all the many years that it has been before the public, regarding Christianity, has been that that religion does not prove a single one of its tenets. It preaches about God but does not tell us anything about his nature and characteristics; it prates about spirit and the spiritual life but does not give us a single concrete idea which would enable one to form even a mental picture of what was intended; it allows its evangelists to rave zealously about heaven and hell without the slightest concern about making those supposed future abiding-places convey any truthful meaning to the practical intellect. No believer, not even the most devout, would dare to say that there is a single item of Christian teaching that is not without its grave difficulties when weighed in the balance of strict logic and common sense. Until Christians define their terms so that it may be plainly known what is meant, they cannot justly say that men are under any obligation to accept their doctrines. Any other position than this would find men believing in all manner of absurd things, and placing their confidence in thoughts and opinions which might bring them in the end cruel disappointment and chagrin.

Christianity gains nothing by holding up to contempt and ridicule those who are as honest in rejecting its pretensions as a small minority of believers are in accepting its claims. The true state of the case has never been the attitude of the skeptic towards religion, but rather the inability of religion to prove its cause. Religion will have no need to lament the fewness of its faithful followers when once it has proved itself to be a truthful thing. Show us the reality and it sufficeth us.

Ingersoll Among the Prophets.

We can imagine that ministers have long felt themselves at a disadvantage or straitened in their work because the circumstances of their calling prevented them from quoting the attractive sayings of Ingersoll. There is nothing in the Bible equal to Ingersoll, and nothing in literature surpassing him. But he is a forbidden book to the orthodox, unless they follow the example of the most eminent One among them and steal his words without acknowledgment. The clergymen of the Unitarian faith who have found Ingersoll quotable, do not count, for they are heretics.

The Rev. David Rees Williams, Congregationalist, of Cleveland, Ohio, has disregarded the embargo on the writings of the great Agnostic, and in taking charge of the North Congregational church of that city makes Ingersoll's vision of the future the "poetry" of his faith. "My faith," said the Rev. Mr. Williams, "is summed up and put in words by a man not a member of any church, but one of God's great prophets." Then he quoted:

"The future rises before me—I see a world where thrones have crumbled and where kings are dust. The aristocracy of idleness has perished from the earth. I see a world without a slave. Man at last is free. Nature's forces have by science been enslaved. Lightning and light, wind and wave, frost and flame, and all the secret, subtle powers of earth and air are the tireless toilers for the human race.

"I see a world at peace adorned with every form of art, with music's myriad voices thrilled, while lips are rich with words of love and truth; a world in which no exile sighs, no prisoner mourns; a world in which the gibbet's shadow does not fall; a world where labor reaps its full reward; where work and worth go hand in hand; where the poor girl in trying to win bread with the needle—the needle that has been called 'the asp for the breast of the poor'—is now driven to the desperate choice of crime or death, of suicide or shame.

"I see a world without the beggar's outstretched palm, the miser's heartless, stony stare, the piteous wail of want, the livid lips of lies, the cruel eyes of scorn.

"I see a race without disease of flesh or brain—shapely and fair, the married harmony of form and function—and, as I look, life lengthens, joy deepens, love canopies the earth; and over all, in the great dome, shines the eternal star of human hope."

The passage is, from the famous Decoration Day Oration, and is found on page 453 of volume ix of the Dresden edition of Ingersoll's works. The Rev. Mr. Williams, in remarking upon it, said: "I used these same words in a sermon once, and everyone praised them, not knowing whose they were. Then when they learned the truth, they told me never to use them again without giving the author proper credit." So far as is known, the reverend gentleman did not follow the orthodox precedent of quoting Ingersoll and then including him with the "Who's Who in Hell." On the contrary, he invested Ingersoll with the "Holy Spirit" and placed him among the prophets.

As though the higher cost of material had not sufficiently crippled the business of newspaper publishing, the Committee on Ways and Means for paying the expenses of the war proposes to raise annually the sum of $19,000,000 by increasing the postal rates on second-class mail—that which is weighed in at so much a pound, now one cent. THE TRUTH SEEKER, whose business is conducted at a cost of about $100 per month above the expenses of two years ago, has not decided how this proposed burden is to be borne in case it is approved by Congress. We shall need the cooperation of loyal and generous subscribers.

We hope that interested friends will turn back to an editorial in last week's paper on "The Mockus Brief," and, having reread the article, act upon its appeal. Mr. Schroeder reports that to print in book form his compendium of blasphemy laws and cases will require the raising of $700 additional to the amount already subscribed.

KEEPING A SABBATH HOLY.

One Sunday's Events in a Christian Family
Where Religion Was Discussed.

BY ATWOOD MANVILLE

Harry stifled a religious oath when the maid knocked at his door on Sunday morning at eight o'clock, half an hour later than usual. He hated to think of the routine ahead of him and wanted to make the day as short as possible. He disliked the clean clothes he had to put on, for they symbolized sanctimoniousness with its elimination of all pleasure for a boy of sixteen. He wanted to skate, but knew that it was devilish to do so on Sunday; and yet he wondered how the devil could have anything to do with ice in his home where a snowball had no chance. It was all very confusing to Harry, but he was not a theologian and therefore lost track of the train of thought.

The harmony of God and the Wanston family was not noticeable in the dispositions of the Wanston family on the holy day. Some of them disliked the restraint imposed upon them by custom, and groaned inwardly at the thought of "those endless Sabbaths" referred to in the hymn.

At breakfast, Mr. Wanston was irritated at the delay caused by the servants being at mass, and because he could only read the morning paper on the sly for fear of his religious wife, who considered the Bible, hymn-book and Book of Common Prayer the only printed matter sanctioned by the Lord for grown people's Sunday reading. For the children, however, she permitted "Pilgrim's Progress," although it seemed rather too sensational, and the author's own apology somewhat frivolous:

"Some said, 'John, print it,' others said 'not so,'
Some said 'It might be good'; others said 'No.'"

Then she remembered that Bunyan had said of the Bible: "Every book of it, every chapter of it, every verse of it, every word of it, is the direct utterance of the Most High," so she knew that he must have been a good man.

Elsie disliked Sunday school even more than day school. Janet took the day philosophically, as she did everything, and often had afternoon callers and religious flirtations. Mrs. Wanston was the only one who derived real satisfaction from the Lord's day. She liked the religious feeling and the thought that they were all devoting themselves on at least one day of the week to the service of the master. Her pew was on the right side of the church and the trimming of all her hats studiously placed on the left, so she attracted the attention that St. Paul may not have reckoned on when inspired to write, "Every woman that prayeth with her head uncovered dishonoreth her head."

Mrs. Wanston never departed from the established order of things spiritual, as taught by her parents, and was convinced of the superiority of her religious denomination over all others. She believed that the most fashionable church must be the most godly, for God surely is an aristocrat.

"Elsie, did you say your prayers this morning?" asked her mother.

"Sure I did, but I said 'now I lay me' by mistake. Will that make me sleepy all day?" inquired Elsie, who had an unfortunate habit of misunderstanding religious matters.

"My dear child, you must think more when you pray to God, and you must ask him to make you a good little girl."

"And will God give me whatever I ask him for?" said Elsie, sensing a great opportunity. Mrs. Wanston was far too experienced a Christian to be caught by such tricks, so replied that God would answer any prayer for a proper object.

"But I prayed for a Bible and he did not send it to me. I was feeling awful religious and prayed three nights for the biggest Bible that God ever wrote, and I watched and watched at every window and the chimney, but it never came," remonstrated Elsie.

"You must not pray for foolish things," said her mother.

"Is the Bible foolish?"

"Of course not. Run along to Sunday school."

At a quarter to eleven, Mr. Wanston with his silk hat and malacca cane escorted his wife and three children to church. The hymns and prayers presented many noble sentiments about the Trinity, and begged forgiveness for those who could not be saved unless they believed in the supernatural. The sermon was by the Rev. Claude Jenkins and was in part as follows: "The son of Mary had no earthly father. The principle operating was God the Holy Ghost. This is a unique incident not to be found or even faintly paralleled in any other religion. The idea of the virgin birth is essential to the integrity of God's scheme of salvation for man. Disbelief in the virgin birth vitiates the resurrection, atonement and sacramental character of his life, our hope of life everlasting. The bringing together of two sinful members of the human race is not sufficient for an explanation of Christ's life. All our hope of salvation from sin and of eternal life is bound up in faith in the virgin birth."

As the congregation streamed out of church, many comments were made on the satisfaction of hearing true orthodoxy from such a logical and convincing speaker who had access to all sacred writings and was an authority not to be overlooked.

It was a time-honored custom for Mrs. Wanston's brother, Robert Sandford, to spend Sunday with the family, beginning with the mid-day meal, which was dinner, of course, on that one day of the week, and invariably included roast beef. The Wanston's brand of religion was not so dependent upon varieties of food as some others, but Mrs. Wanston respected the pious feelings of those who could not eat pork, or could eat only fish on certain days (unless they paid a fine to the church) and carefully explained to Elsie the theory of these sacred food laws, described in the eleventh chapter of Leviticus. Elsie investigated and found that they must not eat the hare because it chewed the cud, but that they could eat locusts. She volunteered to tell the cook that she must read the Bible carefully before preparing meals; but Mrs. Wanston said that religious cooks were very sensitive about their church customs and that she had better not interfere.

"Well, all I can say is, God's restaurant would not be a success, and he has an awfully queer idea of some of the animals he created."

"Elsie, how can you! God may take away your appetite if you are so sacrilegious," warned her mother.

"Mama," said Elsie, "I don't seem to love God at all. He seems just like a bogymen."

"O Elsie, not love God who created you and watches you all the time?"

"I suppose he's on the job all right; but it's up to him to be lovable if he wants me to love him. From all I can find in the Old Testament, he's always fighting or plaguing or talking nonsense, and he often scares me horrible," said Elsie.

"Your uncle must have been talking to you again," said her horrified mother.

Uncle Bob was the black sheep of the family, and it was only by a great effort that his sister could forgive him. His views were so outrageous that she feared the children might become contaminated, so determined that when she had forgiven him for his indiscretions the four hundred and ninetyeth time it would no longer be her duty to tolerate him; but since she had started counting, she had only reached eighty-five, so that the scriptures had not yet been fulfilled and it was still her duty to forgive her brother.

"Well, Mary, what was the sermon about?" asked Sandford.

"Not now, Bob," said his sister, glancing significantly at the waitress.

"I am not ashamed of my morning," said Sandford. "I went to see a poor woman who had a baby that had no father."

"Really, Bob, you must not refer to such things. It is positively wrong," said Mrs. Wanston.

"The Bible says to visit the fatherless in their affliction," suggested Sandford. "The poor girl was very penitent."

"Such people are not to be mentioned. They should not commit crimes, and they have only themselves to blame," said Mrs. Wanston.

"She committed no crime; she broke no law, and, therefore, should not be punished. Our duty is to help her in her present trouble and take steps to make the errors of men and women less frequent in the future," said the wicked one. "Your sermon evidently was not about religion."

"Our Sunday school was all about religion," said Elsie. "There was a picture of God when he was a baby, and when he was a child and when he had grown up and was looking out of a cloud, dressed in a blue wrapper."

Mr. Wanston burst out laughing, but Mrs. Wanston was much distressed and said that such sacred subjects should not be treated lightly, and that it all came from talking before the children. Sandford said that he did not see what was objectionable in Elsie's remark and requested his sister to describe God herself, but the eight-year-old chimed in again with: "He was the carpenter who builded the ark, wasn't he, mama?"

"No, dear, God was not a carpenter . . ."

"God created everything without tools," explained Mrs. Wanston accurately; and turning to her husband, she expressed surprise that Elsie's Sunday school teacher and the family prayers had not given her a better comprehension of the great truths upon which our life here and hereafter depended. Sandford tried in vain to elicit a definite description of what the child's mother wanted her daughter to know, but she gave none except that it was all contained in the Bible, and Mr. Wanston could do no better, but suggested asking Mr. Jenkins when he called. He asked Janet pointedly if she expected him, and she merely blushed. Being a stock broker, Mr. Wanston had a great reverence for the clergy and yet did not want his daughter to become the "mistress of the manse" while there was a chance of catching the eligible Bertram Rollings. Mrs. Wanston knew that she ought to prefer the minister of God and prayed twice a day to be delivered from the sin of worldliness. Her prayers may have been answered, but always in the negative; so she still anticipated being the mother-in-law of the millionaire and taking her chances with the eye of the needle. It was an added comfort to remember that there was no arraignment of the mother-in-laws of rich men in the Bible, but only of the men themselves. Mrs. Wanston was the best woman in the world, so, naturally, a literal believer in the King James version and not in the revised or Standard American Bible.

It was now time for Harry to learn his religious lesson for the day, and his mother selected the 103d psalm and sent him to his room until he could say it by heart. Harry, being only a boy, could not understand why God should want boys to be so unhappy on Sunday, if he were a loving father, nor why he did not punish his papa when he caught him reading the Sunday paper. A wonderful thought came to him as he was going up stairs and he ran back to inquire how people knew that Sunday was different from other days.

"Bravo," said his uncle. "You are beginning to think."

"Why, Harry, don't you remember that God's commandment says that we must keep the Sabbath holy?" said Mrs. Wanston.

"But only the Sheenies keep the Sabbath," protested the boy.

"The Bible states the reason for keeping the Sabbath differently in the two accounts of the commandments, but you should not call any race by a derogatory name, especially when they are responsible for the largest portion of your mother's holy book," explained Sandford.

Mr. Wanston said that he had never realized before that the Jews and Christians worshiped the same God but considered different days holy. He was particularly interested because he had been confronted with the refusal of superstitious people to sign contracts on Fridays, Saturdays and Sundays. Sandford suggested to Harry that he tell his mother that if she would show him two commands in the New Testament requiring observance of the Sabbath, or of Sunday, he would promise never to play hockey from Sunday school again. Harry did not want to make any such contract, so merely hung his head and his uncle continued: "Then I shall promise for you and you are bound by that, according to the prayer book."

Mrs. Wanston said that it was wrong to analyze the Bible and that Uncle Bob was a very wicked man and might never go to heaven if he did not repent; to which her brother replied that he certainly should not want to go to the heaven described in the book of Revelation. The good lady rebuked him for not wanting what God's message told us was for our good, and Sandford blasphemously offered her a thousand dollars, little as he could afford it, for her pet charity if she would read Revelation to them and explain heaven so that Harry could understand it; or if she could reconcile the doctrine of the atonement with a loving God.

Janet had been listening intently and seemed to have gathered a new idea. "I shall ask Mr. Jenkins and he can certainly tell me all about it."

"Janet, dear," said her mother, "you must not bother the rector with such questions. You might embarrass him."

Sandford agreed with her on the embarrassment, but advised Janet to "go to it." Mrs. Wanston disliked the slang and the critical spirit, and reminded her daughter that Uncle Bob did not believe in any God. This she said sorrowfully, for she had a tender heart and did not want anyone to suffer what is in store for an Atheist. Sandford denied that he was an Atheist; "I do not believe in a God as described in Homer or in the Bible, but I believe in the spirit of truth and love and righteousness that impels us to do right and to use our best endeavor to remedy the evil conditions now existing, so that future generations may be saved from sorrow; and I believe that we should profit by all good and spiritual teaching contained in the Bible and in other writings."

(Concluded next week.)

THE FREEDOM OF THOUGHT.

Its Early History and Progress Told in Paragraphs from a Notable Book.

By PROF. J. B. BURY.

We are now in the age of Voltaire. He was a convinced deist. He considered that the nature of the universe proved that it was made by a conscious architect, he held that God was required in the interests of conduct, and he ardently combated Atheism. His great achievements were his efficacious labor in the cause of toleration, and his systematic warfare against superstitions. He assailed the Catholic church in every field with ridicule and satire. He concludes that every sensible man should hold the Christian sect in horror. "Men are blind to prefer an absurd and sanguinary creed, supported by executioners and surrounded by fiery faggots, a creed which can only be approved by those to whom it gives power and riches, a particular creed only accepted in a small part of the world—to a simple and universal religion."

Perhaps no writer has ever roused more hatred in Christendom than Voltaire. He was looked on as a sort of anti-Christ. That was natural; his attacks were so tremendously effective at the time.

For constructive thinking we must go to the other great leader of French thought, Rousseau, who contributed to the growth of freedom in a different way. He was a deist, but his deism, unlike that of Voltaire, was religious and emotional. He regarded Christianity with a sort of reverent skepticism. But his thought was revolutionary and repugnant to orthodoxy; it made against authority in every sphere; and it had an enormous influence. The clergy perhaps dreaded his theories more than the scoffs and negations of Voltaire. For some years he was a fugitive on the face of the earth. "Emile," his brilliant contribution to the theory of education, appeared in 1762.

The religious views of Rousseau are only a minor point in his heretical speculations. It was by his daring social and political theories that he set the world on fire. His "Social Contract" in which these theories were set forth was burned at Geneva. Though his principles will not stand criticism for a moment, and though his doctrine worked mischief by its extraordinary power of turning men into fanatics, yet it contributed to progress, by helping to discredit privilege and to establish the view that the object of a State is to secure the well-being of all its members.

Deism—whether in the semi-Christian form of Rousseau or the anti-Christian form of Voltaire—was a house built on the sand, and thinkers arose in France, England, and Germany to shatter its foundations. In France, it proved to be only a half-way inn to Atheism.

Diderot's great work, the "Encyclopedia," was not merely a scientific book of reference. It was representative of the whole movement of the enemies of faith. It was intended to lead men from Christianity with its original sin to a new conception of the world as a place which can be made agreeable and in which the actual evils are due not to radical faults of human nature but to perverse institutions and perverse education.

Hume, the greatest English philosopher of the century, showed that the arguments commonly adduced for a personal God were untenable. Hitherto the credibility of miracles had not been submitted to a general examination independent of the theological assumptions. Hume, pointing out that there must be a uniform experience against every miraculous event (otherwise it would not merit the name of miracle), and that it will require stronger testimony to establish a miracle than an event which is not contrary to experience, lays down the general maxim that "no testimony is sufficient to establish a miracle unless the testimony is of such a kind that its falsehood would be more miraculous than the fact which it endeavors to establish."

This world may be very faulty, compared to a superior standard. It may be the first rude experiment "of some infant Deity who afterwards abandoned it, ashamed of his lame performance"; or the work of some inferior Deity at which his superior would scoff; or the production of some old superannuated Deity which since his death has pursued an adventurous career from the first impulse which he gave it.

The skeptical philosophy of Hume had less influence on the general public than Gibbon's "Decline and Fall of the Roman Empire." Of the numerous Freethinking books that appeared in England in the eighteenth century, this is the only one which is still a widely read classic. In what a lady friend of Dr. Johnson called "the two offensive chapters" (XV and XVI) the causes of the rise and success of Christianity are for the first time critically investigated as a simple historical phenomenon. Like most Freethinkers of the time Gibbon thought it well to protect himself and his work against the possibility of prosecution by paying ironical lip-homage to the orthodox creed.

"Under the reign of Tiberius the whole earth, or at least a celebrated province of the Roman empire, was involved in a preternatural darkness of three hours. Even this miraculous event, which ought to have excited the wonder, the curiosity, and the devotion of mankind, passed without notice in an age of science and history. It happened during the lifetime of Seneca and the elder Pliny, who must have experienced the immediate effects, or received the earliest intelligence, of the prodigy. Each of these philosophers in a laborious work has recorded all the great phenomena of nature, earthquakes, meteors, comets, and eclipses, which his indefatigable curiosity could collect. Both the one and the other have omitted to mention the greatest phenomenon to which the mortal eye has been witness since the creation of the globe."

The ablest answer was given by Paley in his "Evidences of Christianity" (1794), the only one of the apologies of that age which is still read, though it has ceased to have any value.

The list of the English deistic writers of the eighteenth century closes with one whose name is more familiar than any of his predecessors, Thomas Paine.

It was doubtless in consequence of the enormous circulation of the "Age of Reason" that a Society for the Suppression of Vice decided to prosecute the publisher. Unbelief was common among the ruling class, but the view was firmly held that religion was necessary for the populace and that any attempt to disseminate unbelief among the lower classes must be suppressed. The publisher was sentenced to a year's imprisonment.

This was not the end of Paine prosecutions. In 1811 a Third part of the "Age of Reason" appeared, and Eaton the publisher was condemned to eighteen months' imprisonment and to stand in the pillory once a month. The judge, Lord Ellenborough, said in his charge, that "to deny the truths of the book which is the foundation of our faith has never been permitted."

In 1819 Richard Carlisle was prosecuted for publishing the "Age of Reason" and sentenced to a large fine and three years' imprisonment. Unable to pay the fine he was kept in prison for three years. His wife and sister, who carried on the business and continued to sell the book, were fined and imprisoned soon afterwards and a whole host of shop assistants.

The age of enlightenment began in Germany in the middle of the eighteenth century. It was not, however, in direct Rationalistic propaganda, but in literature and philosophy, that the German enlightenment of this century expressed itself. The most illustrious men of letters, Goethe (who was profoundly influenced by Spinoza) and Schiller, stood outside the churches, and the effect of their writings and of the whole literary movement of the time made for the freest treatment of human experience. One German thinker shook the world—the philosopher Kant. His "Critique of Pure Reason" demonstrated that when we attempt to prove by the light of the intellect the existence of God and the immortality of the Soul, we fall helplessly into contradictions. It is true that afterwards, in the interest of ethics, he tried to smuggle in by a back-door the Deity whom he had turned out by the front gate, but the attempt was not a success.

Modern science, heralded by the researches of Copernicus, was founded in the seventeenth century, which saw the demonstration of the Copernican theory, the discovery of gravitation, the discovery of the circulation of the blood, the foundation of modern chemistry and physics. But several generations were to pass before science became, in Protestant countries, an involuntary arch-enemy of theology.

At the beginning of the nineteenth century Laplace worked out the mechanics of the universe, on the nebular hypothesis. His theory involved a long physical process before the earth and solar system came to be formed; but this was not fatal, for a little ingenuity might preserve the credit of the first chapter of the Genesis. Geology was to prove a more formidable enemy to the Biblical story of the creation and the deluge.

It was not till 1863 that Lyell presented fully, in his "Antiquity of Man," the evidence which showed that the human race had inhabited the earth for a far longer period than could be reconciled with the record of scripture.

An English divine of the seventeenth century ingeniously calculated that man was created by the Trinity on October 23, B. C. 4004, at 9 o'clock in the morning, and no reckoning of the Bible dates could put the event much further back.

Advanced thinkers had been reaching the conclusion that the universe, as we find it, is the result of a continuous process, unbroken by supernatural interference, and inexplicable by uniform natural laws. But while the reign of law in the world of non-living matter seemed to be established, the world of life could be considered a field in which the theory of divine intervention is perfectly valid, so long as science failed to assign satisfactory causes for the origination of the various kinds of animals and plants. The publication of Darwin's "Origin of Species" in 1859 is, therefore, a landmark not only in science but in the war between science and theology.

The "Descent of Man" appeared in 1871. The feelings of the orthodox world may be expressed in the words of Mr. Gladstone: "Upon the grounds of what is called evolution God is relieved of the labor of creation, and in the name of unchangeable laws is discharged from governing the world."

Darwinism, as it is called, has had the larger effect of discrediting the theory of the adaptation of means to ends in nature by an external and infinitely powerful intelligence. The inadequacy of the argument from design, as a proof of God's existence, had been shown by the logic of Hume and Kant; but the observation of the life-processes of nature shows that the very analogy between nature and art, on which the argument depends, breaks down.

The Moral Ideal.

An ideal is an image or mental presentation of something we desire to see, to do, or to assist in bringing about—something which we believe to be good and conducive to happiness. The moral ideal is living, flexible, progressive. It is essentially religious because it contains the most vital spirit of religion—the desire for goodness; and it has the advantage that it is perhaps the only element of religion that can be verified by general experience. Supernatural religion concentrates upon another world of which we have no knowledge; morality centres upon this world, of which we know much. And it is an error to suppose that, unless we think of goodness as embodied in the person of a being at once human and divine, our ideal of goodness must be ineffectual.

The supernatural sanction of morals is a delusion and a snare. The very core of morality is that it must be a personal and inward process, a self-development and a self-discipline. If it can be put on and taken off like a suit of clothes, it is merely a means to gaining a transient advantage, a way of getting something for nothing; it is not morality in the truest sense. Even the churches founded on supernaturalism, from the house of bishops to the Salvation Army, practically ignore the supernatural and rely on material and natural means just like any man of the world or "wicked Agnostic." Were they unflinchingly to apply their principles, or cast them away and take to proclaiming a pure rational, ethical religion, they might hope to become, as of old, an embodied national conscience, the guardians of morality, the preachers of sincerity, the inspirers of a common duty.

When people habitually assert their belief in superhuman agency, yet habitually act as if they believed nothing of the kind, we may conclude that their creed is in a fair way to extinction. Supernaturalism, indeed, cannot survive in an atmosphere charged with faith in a natural order of which we may say there is no variableness nor shadow of turning. The dethronement of supernatural belief has strengthened morality by knocking away a rickety support and compelling it to walk alone. With clearer vision morality is now set free to perform its proper task. That task is to elevate the individual character, to purify social life, to promote the highest forms of well-being.

The solvent applied by scientific knowledge and scientific methods has been the chief agency in awakening thought and causing theological systems to decay. The old predisposition to see the "hand of God" in everything has, concurrently with the increase of knowledge, given way to a predisposition to leave the hand of God out of account. And the farther God has receded into the background the better has the condition of humanity become. Theology, in fact, has (broadly speaking) had a bad effect on morals. The moral ideas which have been evolved with so much effort and maintained with so many sacrifices have been blurred and perverted by representations that assume God to have committed acts of which a civilized man would be ashamed. The biblical books have furnished sanction and precedent for the most atrocious crimes. Belief in an infallible book has in reality debased the moral currency to a degree of which only the curious reader of history is aware.

The moral ideal knits together, as no theology has ever done, persons, societies, communities, nations, races, in the bonds of a sympathy awakened and guided by knowledge. It is prophetic of the redemption which can and will come from human effort alone. This ideal can remain pure only when divorced from supernatural belief and associated with reason; that righteousness is not the product of externalized religion, but of an inward urge and effort; and that its simplicity and rationality prove its adaptation to life. It is practical because it is human. It is born of our needs and strivings, our own passion and tears, hammered out of our own hard experience. For us this ideal represents the best of our achievement in our relations with our fellows; it assures us that self-reliant effort will result in steady improvement. The moralist scatters among the many the fruits of the wisdom and insight of the few. And, whatever theory we hold of the will, we know that progress will go on because so much has already been achieved.

R. E.

What Can Mary Do?

It seems that Pope Benedict has reached the conclusion that peace among the nations can be secured only by people everywhere, "from the humblest huts to the most sumptuous palaces," sending up "pious and devoted invocations" to the "Celestial Father." And for this purpose he has informed the "faithful" that from June 1, "there will be definitely introduced into the Litany of the Holy Virgin the invocation: 'Regina pacis, ora pro nobis.'" (Queen of peace, pray for us.) It is really most extraordinary that any sane person would counsel another, at this late date in the history of the present war, to waste his time in making appeals to another human being, who, if she ever lived, has been dead for many hundreds of years, and who can have no more influence upon our present mundane conditions than a statue in one of our city parks. If God did not show his "almighty" power during the three years that the war has lasted, but allowed some of the most revolting and destructive crimes to be perpetrated by his own followers; if he did not in any way stem the tide of cruelty and lust which almost blotted out one of his most devoted people, the Armenians; why is it to be now supposed that he will give heed to a world of prayers offered up to him in the name of Jesus or of the Virgin Mary, when the rational mind conclusively realizes that a sure and permanent peace can be secured only as a result of a complete victory on the part of those who are fighting for the right?

There is nothing more absurd in the philosophy of human life than to appeal to an imaginary deity in heaven for the settlement of affairs on this earth. Of course it is rarely done as an ultimatum, even by the most pious believer, for along with his prayer to God he usually unites his own individual efforts, believing in the homely saying that "God helps them that help themselves." The absolute impossibility of proving the interposition of any celestial influence in the doings of humanity ought to carry with it a much greater weight of importance in deciding the question of the existence of God than is commonly attributed to it. The saying that whatever is from the hand of God, proves nothing whatever as to God's overruling providence in the affairs of men. If whatever way things go, the result is to be attributed to the will of God, we cannot see how such a notion differs from that of the fatalist, who simply surrenders himself to the natural course of events, leaving no place for the working of any power outside of the forces of Nature. Many persons find the belief in God and prayer to him a pleasant belief. It's as good a solution of an impenetrable mystery as religion has been able to put forth; and as it does not militate seriously against the processes of ordinary thinking, and forms an agreeable diversion to the commonplace features of everyday life, it is highly probable that it will continue to be a part of the intellectual make-up of superficial thinkers for many years to come.

Trying to bring the intellectual formulations of one age into the intellectual atmosphere of a totally different age is somewhat like the Irish pedestrian who, coming to a cross-road, and fearing he might make a mistake about the way, decided to take the guide-post with him.—T. F. Seward.

NOTES AT LARGE.

There are times in the life of the most untruthful person, when, suddenly taken off his guard, or when urgently required to protect himself in a dangerous situation, he will tell the truth with the simplicity of a child. This phenomenon was produced on Tuesday, May 1, when Billy Sunday, in his tabernacle in New York, challenged his crowded audience to compare his highly vulgar speech with the language of the Bible, and to note their agreement; and not to pass a final judgment on him and his methods till they had done so. Here are his reported words: "Bring your Bibles, you people of New York, and I will challenge you to try me by the gospel as it was spoken by the prophets in God's court, and then if you can you may condemn me."

We had always known that much of the language of the "Holy Scripture" was of the lowest character, but we doubted that any Christian preacher would venture to give striking publicity to it by adopting a similar style of utterance when delivering his so-called gospel message. This confession of this very unusual evangelist ought to impress the thinking part of the religious community not only with the indecent character of the Bible, but also with the great possibilities for evil latent in that oriental story book. It is obvious that the "good" book is capable of making some very questionable moral characters, as is evidenced by the case of Billy Sunday; and were the truth regarding its influence upon mankind fully known, it would be reasonable to conclude that, since its appearance in its present form, it has done greater injury to life and morals than it has accomplished good in the same spheres.

When questioned as to the degrading nature of much of the Old Testament narrative, the Christian is accustomed to reply that the Bible gives a true picture of human nature in all its various conditions, and that it is because of this authentic portrait that the book is so highly valuable. It is true to life, he says, and shows how God deals with every human state, the lowest as well as the highest. But such a record cannot be a revelation from God. Stories about men are not a revelation of divinity. Men can easily learn about one another; we have whole libraries giving the history of the human race so far as it can be ascertained, and these histories carry with them a degree of reliability quite unknown to the Bible. If the Bible was intended to be a revelation concerning God of such truths as it would be impossible for man to learn without divine assistance, it has completely failed of its purpose, for it reveals absolutely nothing about the person and character of God and the nature of the spiritual world, but what man has for himself pictured those things to be. The intensely human character of the scriptures affords the strongest proof that they were written by men. No god whose plan was to reveal himself, his heavenly home, and his great love and care for his creatures, as well as his eminent purity of mind and heart, would make that revelation known by means of lewd stories and a disgusting speech such as only a Billy Sunday could conjure up. For once the evangelist told the truth when he made known to his hearers that they would find a parallel to his degraded talk in the word of God itself; but in that very statement he sealed the final verdict regarding the precise nature of the Bible that it is a wholly human book, with a decidedly immoral setting, and of but trifling importance either as history or as a guide to human life and conduct.

Men are naturally intolerant about their opinions, especially in matters remote and uncertain, where the opinions are wholly the children and creatures of their own will and judgment. Had religion been true it would have labored to assuage, not to foster, this egotistic ferocity and to counsel liberty in all questions. But let hell be the penalty of religious error; let man's natural intolerance receive a divine consecration and blessing, and the result can only be what it has been—hatred, persecution, division and subdivision. Liberty, and not compulsion, is the only way to secure a healthy progress in any plan of mental or moral activity. But the gospel, with all its theological paraphernalia, easily gets tangled in the brain before it reaches the heart; and this is the reason why it has never succeeded in making an effective appeal to mankind universally, but has had to be content with gathering a few followers here and there out of the great mass of humanity.

If the church had had its way, if Reason had not refused to listen to it, our scientific conceptions today would be those of the Bible. We should believe that the world was flat or concave, and not spherical; or that if spherical, there were no antipodes; that the stars were hung out like lamps night by night; that the sun swept around the earth day by day; that fossils were created just as and where we find them; that eclipses and meteors were miraculous portents; that the multiplicity of languages was a preternatural phenomenon; that all races were derived from the three sons of Noah; that all animal species had existed in one spot and were represented in Noah's ark; that the whole world had been submerged and drained dry again in a couple of years. We should be burning old women on the charge of the evil eye or of intercourse with the devil; we should be treating epilepsy, hysteria, and insanity as diabolical possession; we should be ringing consecrated bells against storm-demons and earth-shakers; the chemist would be a magician; the money-lender an excommunicate.

The men who first challenged these positions were condemned and energetically opposed in the name of revelation as heretics and blasphemers. Had they been Freethinkers, such opposition had been far less effectual. But they were believers who accepted the current notion about divine revelation; who knew nothing of the distinction between the experiential and the intellectual values of writings declared to be sacred; or who, at most, tried vainly to deny the solidarity of theology with the exact sciences. Thus it was that for centuries the scientific efforts of men were checked and frustrated by theology posing as revelation. As soon as that yoke was shaken off, science rushed forward by leaps and bounds. There can never be any agreement between theology and science.

Bruce Barton, who edits a Sunday Magazine and some other periodicals is bright enough to know better, but in a published letter to Emperor Wilhelm of Germany, this is what he says:

"When the smoke of war has cleared away, and you are farming quietly somewhere, Wilhelm, you will begin to see things more clearly. You will begin to understand that what is to blame for your loss of your job is, after all, nothing less than the Christian religion itself."

"Nineteen hundred years ago Jesus Christ went about telling men that they were children of God."

"If that is true—if all men are children of God—then all men are the equals of their kings."

"And now, after nineteen hundred years, Wilhelm, all men are about to find that great truth out."

We should like to be informed at what era of its history the Christian religion has taught the political equality of all men. The Christian religion has taught that "the powers that be are ordained of God," and on this is based the divine right of kings most recently asserted by the kaiser. There is an ancient document which reads: "We hold these truths to be self-evident; that all men are created equal and endowed by their creator with certain inalienable rights," but that is not the gospel of Jesus Christ. The author of it was an eighteenth-century Infidel, and the government based upon it was officially declared to be in no sense founded on the Christian religion. Jesus said: "Render unto the kaiser the things that are the kaiser's," and he said nothing about dethroning kaisers. The Christian religion has been all things to all forms of governments, and while existing under monarchies never did anything to turn them into republics, which have been created by men who rejected the faith. The notion of equality, fought by the Christian religion as political Atheism, is one result of the spread of Rationalism.

Can God be bribed? This is the inquiry of a newspaper man of Portland, Oregon, based on the following circumstance:

"A short time ago the newspapers carried articles wherein the prayers of the Austrian emperor and the populace were directed to God for peace. In the course of his prayer the emperor promised to build a beautiful church and hold annual religious festivals provided his prayer for peace were granted."

"If that does not constitute bribery, what then does?" asks the skeptical journalist. It is bribery, although it goes under the name of "good works" in Catholic theology and worship, which is a systematic attempt so to corrupt the deity, either with the flattery of praise or the gift of ponderable objects to his church, that men may obtain favors confessedly undeserved or may escape the consequences of their misdeeds by a miscarriage of justice.

The debt of the Old Testament writers to the Babylonians for their accounts of the creation and flood has long been known. They picked these things up during the captivity. Did they get their doctrine of messiahs from the same source? The latest news from the University of Pennsylvania, where Professor Langdon is deciphering tablets in the university museum, is that "the doctrine of a messianic hope, of the expectation of deliverance from sin and suffering by a God-man in the shape of a king, goes back at least to 2500 B. C., when the Sumerian theologians and priests evolved a theory which has been the basis of Jewish and Christian religion ever since. The new tablets are of interest because they show that the Sumerians never lost hope that the restoration to a state of sinlessness and happiness through the agency of the gods would come." The ancient messiah of Babylonia was called Tammuz, and he was worshiped by the Jews. At "the door of the gate of the Lord's house," "behold there sat women weeping for Tammuz" (Ezekiel viii, 14).

The editor of the Catholic Citizen (Milwaukee) can reason like a Rationalist. He reproduces this paragraph, which recently appeared in THE TRUTH SEEKER:

"The fire that destroyed four blocks of Asbury Park, New Jersey, built of wood, was stopped when it had gutted the First Methodist church, because the walls were stone and did not burn. The Newark Evening News remarked that the ruins of that church 'seem to stand for a kind of divine interposition, sent us in the nick of time, to save possibly a large section of the city.'"

His comment on the remark of the Newark News regarding divine interposition is as follows:

"This is not so convincing to us, because only last week a stroke of lightning struck a church tower only four blocks from our office, and a brewery a little further along, went unscathed."

That is pure Rationalism, or we don't know the brand, and discredits all divine interposition that has been alleged since the Almighty missed with a bolt of lightning Ingersoll's law office in Washington and hit the building of the Young Men's Christian Association.

A West Virginian subscriber was asked by his local pastor to help him circulate a letter to the unfaithful urging them to observe the Sabbath by going to church. The letter stated that "the first day of the week is the Lord's Day;" that "the Lord has given us six days for our very own;" and "that the spiritual interests of our soul," together with the other important considerations, demand that we "keep sacredly the hours for worship on the first day of the week." The subscriber agreed to help things along if he might be permitted to add a verse of scripture to the letter, to wit, "One man esteemeth one day above another; another esteemeth every day alike. Let every man be fully persuaded in his own mind" (Rom. xiv, 5). The offer was not accepted.

To be misquoted is the misfortune of most public speakers and writers, but the case of the Rev. Mr. G. G. Johnson, who pleads for space for a correction in the Washington Star, is peculiarly painful. He had been quoted as giving utterance to the heretical sentiment that "no man could consign to hell a man who died for his country," but he protests that he said "just the opposite." Of course no one would wish to see a man who died for his country consigned to hell, but his uniform could not save him. "Eternal laws," declares the Rev. Mr. Johnson, "are not changed by changing one's clothes. Eternal issues are fixed by one's attitude towards Jesus Christ," and "one is not saved by character." The reverend gentleman would make a poor recruiting officer for the army, or for an ethical society.

From Los Angeles, Cal., Mrs. Grace Silver Henry reports that the closing of the Burbank Hall Liberal Club meetings until October leaves the meetings conducted by Mr. Henry and herself at Seventh and Main Streets on Saturday nights and at Second and Los Angeles streets every Sunday at 2 P. M., about the only radical ones in the city. The Henrys are doing well in the circulation of Freethought literature.

The Freethinkers of Clarksburg, West Virginia, have held a successful meeting, at which they organized as the Clarksburg Rationalist Society, and appointed a second meeting on May 27. A lecture course is contemplated. The secretary and treasurer, G. A. Miller, may be addressed at 644 S. Seventh street, Clarksburg, W. Va.

In science, hypothesis is never an end but a means; it can attain authenticity only by verification, and the verification is always open to question. Any theory established otherwise than by proof of its truth is an arrest of the scientific process. Such is dogma.—M. D. Conway.

THE REVIVAL RACKET.

In the official "Who's Who in Hell," issued from the tabernacle uptown, there are listed, "Ahaz, Jezebel, Antiochus Epiphanes, Ivan the Terrible, Catherine the Great, Rousseau, Diderot, Voltaire, d'Alembert, and John Stuart Mill, 'who because they rejected Jesus will be in hell along with thugs and thieves.'" Dr. John Haynes Holmes of the Unitarian Church of the Messiah affirms that this list must be considerably enlarged according to the test, and must include, among others, Charles Darwin and Abraham Lincoln, who did not accept Christ and his atonement. Extending the list, and naming only Unitarians—a denomination most certainly damned—these are added:

"John Adams, John Quincy Adams, Thomas Jefferson, Millard Fillmore, John Marshall, Daniel Webster, John C. Calhoun, Edward Everett, Charles Sumner, Henry Wadsworth Longfellow, James Russell Lowell, William Cullen Bryant, Oliver Wendell Holmes, Ralph Waldo Emerson, George Bancroft, William H. Prescott, Francis Parkman, Bret Harte, Helen Hunt Jackson, Edward Everett Hale, Sarah Flower Adams, author of 'Nearer, My God, to Thee'; John Bowring, author of 'In the Cross of Christ I Glory'; Julia Ward Howe, Samuel G. Howe, Lucy Stone, Susan B. Anthony, George William Curtis, William Ellery Channing, and Theodore Parker."

Jefferson was a Freethinker, not a Unitarian, and Susan B. Anthony was an Agnostic, but they are lost just the same if not worse. Dr. Holmes avers that a theology which involves the damnation of the persons he has named "is not a religion at all—it is a crime." It is historic Christianity, however; and unless someone has edited the words of Jesus, the founder of that religion preached at times an identical theology.

We would not have believed it, but Dr. Lyman Abbott, a higher critic in biblical scholarship, and pretending to some respect for science, has written a letter to the New York Sun (May 6) commendatory of the preaching of the knockabout evangelist at the tabernacle. Knowing and virtually admitting that the biblical "facts" asserted by the preacher are exploded myths and superstitions, he yet says they are "psychologically true." He remarks that if the preacher "talked to God as though God was there on the platform it was because to him God was there on the platform." One might say if a man in a delirium sees blue monkeys and pink elephants, it is because to him blue monkeys and pink elephants are there. They are psychologically present; and all the delusions of the paranoiac are factual in the same sense. The argument that maintains the psychological truth of Billy Sunday's theophanies makes realities of all manner of hallucinations and delusions. The evangelist's vision of God is a fellow-guy who says, "Come on, Bill; kick in"—as one might invite him to sit into a game of poker. His Christ came saying to the "highbrows": "You miserable old lobsters, you're a fine bunch of guys the way you skin the widows. You sanctimonious rascals, you're like a sepulchre—nice outside, rotten inside. The whole bunch of you ought to be in jail." In the millennium, he would picture Jesus as coming with bells on. This, according to Dr. Abbott, is psychological truth, under which definition all lies may be excused and defended, and the wildest imaginings of the human mind made respectable.

The editor of the Republican Watchman of Monticello, N. Y., has visited the metropolis and felt the rush of wind from the traveling tornado of the tabernacle. His verdict is recorded in his paper: "Mr. Sunday is a wonderful man. He is probably the greatest preacher in the country today, and he has never had an equal." Such will be the verdict of history, no doubt. Sunday was perhaps approached in excellence at times by the late T. De Witt Talmage, whose sermons he has complimented by stealing them and giving them as his own, but Talmage lacked his gutter vocabulary, and so was less effective with Christians who want religion discussed from the barroom level to which Sunday elevates it.

The authoress, Amelie Rives (now Princess Pierre Troubetskoy), has read the report of a sermon at the tabernacle, and writes to the Times about it. Taking exception to the style of the evangelist, she quotes a sample:

"If Jesus Christ would walk into church today he'd say: 'Get out of here, you old lobsters, you old four-flushers; you've been making my house a clearing house for worldliness and you're only a pawn on the devil's chess board.'"

The question the princess would put to the American public is: "Does it, or does it not, consider the foregoing remarks blasphemous?" and she wishes to know whether the toleration of such vulgar slang of the street, represented as an utterance of Jesus, is consistent with the laws which prohibit the personation of Jesus in a religious play, "no matter how solemnly and reverently he might be represented as speaking." A number of Times correspondents agree that the language quoted is blasphemous, but like the princess, they overlook the point that the diction of this preacher, whether ascribed to Jesus Christ or not, is unfit for public utterance. A witness in a Comstock prosecution was once asked whether he regarded the indicted work as immoral, and he replied that it was worse—it was ungrammatical. So of this passage; it is worse than blasphemous—it is a degradation of human speech.

It is astonishing how often the minds of great men run in the same channel. Brann's Iconoclast quotes the following from a prohibition speech by one Clinton Howard:

"What is the traffic in rum? 'The devil in solution,' said Sir Wilfred Lawson, and he was right. 'Distilled Damnation,' said Robert Hall, and he was right. 'An artist in human slaughter,' said Lord Chesterfield, and he was right. 'Poisoner's General, driving men to Hell,' said Wesley, and he was right. 'More destructive than war, pestilence and famine,' said Gladstone, and he was right. 'A cancer in human society, eating out its vitals and threatening destruction,' said Abraham Lincoln, and he was right."

By a strange coincidence the Chicago editor is able to quote from a copyrighted sermon by the Rev. William Ashley Sunday these words:

"What is the traffic in rum? 'The devil in solution,' said Sir Wilfred Lawson, and he was right. 'Distilled Damnation,' said Robert Hall, and he was right. 'An artist in human slaughter,' said Lord Chesterfield, and he was right. 'Poisoner's General, driving men to Hell,' said Wesley, and he was right. 'More destructive than war, pestilence and famine,' said Gladstone, and he was right. 'A cancer in human society, eating out its vitals and threatening destruction,' said Abraham Lincoln, and he was right."

"Somebody is a thief," declares Mr. Windle, and he believes he can convict the evangelist. Well, it would not be his first offense.

One of the New York daily papers printed the following item last week:

"Eighty Atheists, labelled with white badges, appeared at the afternoon session and were given a special section. Following the service they resented the fact that their delegation was not announced from the pulpit."

This was doubtless one of the few delegations that attended voluntarily, most of the attendants in bodies being conscripts. Mr. Irving Meirowitz, who was among the "eighty Atheists," say that Rodeheaver did not even ask his company to name a hymn; and he was all prepared to start the Marseillaise.

France to America.

Translated from the French of Maurice Manique, by R. E.

O Land of noble lives and brave!
Of Washington and warriors true!
The treaty which today you sign,
Will that of Lafayette renew.
America, till life departs,
Here is thy place within our hearts.

Thou didst not shrink to meet the foe.
To strike the beast of cruel hate;
And loyal lips, in rapturous praise,
Shall everywhere thy deeds relate.
America, receive our thanks,
Here is thy place within our ranks.

Thy fair earth we salute with pride,
Thy age-long friendship we revere;
And welcome thy sweet charity,
Bestowed with human love sincere.
America, where all are free,
Here is thy place in history.

Come now, and let us battle strong!
The day for valiant deeds has come;
An envious despot must be crushed,
And if we would keep our life and home.
America, the right reclaim,
Here is thy place in endless fame.

L'annoncet, Eure, France.

King county, in Texas, with a population of 1,000, has no lawyers, doctors or justices of the peace. Although a "wet" county, there are no saloons within its borders, and for eighteen months no one has occupied a cell in its county jail. The single merchant in King county is rated as a millionaire. In addition to its other immunities, this singular county has no preacher of the gospel, so that nobody is damned.

No radiant pearl which crested fortune wears,
No gem that twinkling hangs from beauty's ears,
Not the bright stars which night's blue arch adorn,
Nor rising sun that gilds the vernal morn,
Shine with such lustre as the tear that flows
Down virtue's manly cheek for others' woes.
—Darwin.

THE TRUTH SEEKER

Published weekly by the Truth Seeker Company, President, George E. Macdonald; Secretary, James A. Conway, 62 Vesey street, New York.

Entered at the Postoffice, New York, N. Y., as second-class matter.

Address communications and make drafts, checks, postoffice and express money orders payable to THE TRUTH SEEKER, 62 Vesey street, New York.

Subscription Rates.

Single subscription in advance . . $3.00
Two new subscribers 5.00
One subscription two years in advance 5.00
One subscription and one new subscriber, in one remittance . . . 5.00
To all foreign countries except Mexico, 50 cents per annum extra.
Subscriptions received for any length of time under a year at the rate of 25 cents per month. Can be begun at any time.
Single copies, 10 cents.

SPECIAL NOTICE.—We shall be obliged to our readers if they will send us the name and address of any Free-thinker who is not a regular subscriber.

OBJECTS.

It is the object of THE TRUTH SEEKER to educate the people out of religious superstition. It denies the inspiration and infallibility of the Bible, and asserts the human origin of that book. It denies the existence of the theological heaven and hell, but as to the existence and immortality of the soul neither affirms nor denies. It waits for evidence.

THE TRUTH SEEKER upholds the theory of Evolution, believing that to be the solution of the question of the origin, growth, and development of the animal kingdom, including man. THE TRUTH SEEKER believes that the answer to the questions Whence? and Whither? can be given only by Science.

THE TRUTH SEEKER holds that morality and ethics—or man's relation to man—are entirely independent of creed or religion, and are founded on rules developed by experience.

In current politics THE TRUTH SEEKER takes no side or part. In general it holds to the principles of freedom enunciated by the Founders of the Republic.

THE TRUTH SEEKER believes in Free Speech, Free Press, and Free Mails; in full discussion of all sides of all subjects, and affords those having new and worthy thoughts, clearly stated, a generous and welcome hearing, each contributor being responsible for his own opinion. We neither indorse an idea by printing it, nor condemn it by exclusion.

THE TRUTH SEEKER is the recognized medium of communication between the Liberals of the country, and is edited each week for their information, instruction, entertainment, and support against religious error and mental slavery and in maintenance of their equal civil and religious rights as citizens of the United States.

The Editor invites communications on the subjects to which these pages are devoted.

POLITICAL PRINCIPLES.

(THE NINE DEMANDS OF LIBERALISM.)

1. We demand that churches and other ecclesiastical property shall be no longer exempt from taxation.
2. We demand that the employment of chaplains in Congress, in the Legislatures, in the navy and militia, and in prisons, asylums and all other institutions supported by public money shall be discontinued.
3. We demand that all public appropriations for educational and charitable institutions of a sectarian character shall cease.
4. We demand that all religious services now sustained by the government shall be abolished; and especially that the use of the Bible in the public schools, whether ostensibly as a text-book or avowedly as a book of religious worship, shall be prohibited.
5. We demand that the appointment by the President of the United States or by the governors of the various states, of all religious festivals and fasts shall wholly cease.
6. We demand that the judicial oath in the courts and in all other departments of the government shall be abolished, and that simple affirmation under the pains and penalties of perjury shall be established in its stead.
7. We demand that all laws directly or indirectly enforcing the observance of Sunday as the Sabbath shall be repealed.
8. We demand that all laws looking to the enforcement of "Christian" morality shall be abrogated and that all laws shall be conformed to the requirements of natural morality, equal rights, and impartial liberty.

9. We demand that not only in the Constitution of the United States and of the several states, but also in the practical administration of the same, no privileges or advantages shall be conceded to Christianity or any other special religion; that our entire political system shall be founded and administered on a purely secular basis; and that whatever changes shall prove necessary to this end shall be consistently, unflinchingly, and promptly made.

Letters of Friends

Readers desirous of communicating with the writers of the letters in this department may address them in care of THE TRUTH SEEKER, 62 Vesey street, New York, N. Y., and the letters will be re-addressed and forwarded.

SOPHISM VS. SPIRITUALISM.

From J. W. Thomas, Oklahoma.

To the Editor of The Truth Seeker:

When I read such articles as that found in THE TRUTH SEEKER for April 14, by O. J. Gibbons, in "Transmission of Intelligence," and for April 21 in "Science and Sir Oliver," by Redcote Dewar, I wonder where those men have been all their lives, that they do not know the world is farther advanced today than ever before, and most of that advancement has been made during the last century. They are Rip Van Winkles, except that the original Rip woke up after 20 years, but those gentlemen may never wake up until they wake from death. Then they will find they have not progressed or developed since they were boys. Mentally and spiritually they are only boys.

Here is a shot from O. J. G.: "A few whiffs of opium smoke will make the brain see wonderful things. Alcohol produces a variety of effects on it." Yes. I thought all that slush was made of alcohol and opium! He speaks as though he had experience. Here is another: "It is not that materialists are hostile to a continued existence. They share the universal love of life." "Show us the father (or any other spirit) and it sufficeth us; but do not try to catch old birds with chaff." This is more sensible and honest, for all normal minded people "share the universal love of life." And it seems to me that this is at least circumstantial evidence that we do continue to exist.

That which we love and long for is a part of our nature. It is a possibility, a birth-right, an intuition. That is the reason the primal savage he speaks of, thought the echo was a spirit. Intuitively and experimentally we all know or may know that we are immortal.

Here is a stunner from Redcote: "The question for mankind today is, who is more credible, Haeckel or Sir Oliver Lodge? Haeckel is endorsed by practically all scientists, for only a moiety have agreed to accept science as science. Sir Oliver, however, has also an endorsement and it is a remarkable one. No sooner was his presidential address noised abroad by the newspapers than an epidemic broke out all over the world of mediums, palmists, thought readers, crystal gazers, fortune tellers and other charlatans who reaped a harvest from multitudes of the ignorant and credulous; who putting implicit faith in the opinions of such an eminent scientist, placed themselves unreservedly at the disposal of those mountebanks to be fleeced. The gratitude of those charlatans to Sir Oliver was unbounded, for owing to the advance of intelligence, their business was dwindling. At the same time it is only fair to assume that it was furthest from Sir Oliver's thoughts to lend the weight of his great name to the furtherance of chicanery."

This statement is not only maliciously erroneous and misleading, but is an insult to everybody interested in the great subject of immortality, calling them mountebanks, charlatans, ignorant and credulous, and spiritualism, chicanery. Personally I can assure the gentleman that not all mediums and spiritualists (and there are multitudes, as he says) are mountebanks and charlatans, or ignorant and credulous, but many of the best people in this country and Europe are mediums and spiritualists, or at least interested in the great and wonderful and glorious subject of immortality. In fact, those people are noted for their intelligence and progressiveness.

Go to a seance and see who are there: doctors, lawyers, mayors, governors, ex-governors, statesmen, etc., besides teachers and scientists. Then there are many private seances conducted by a selected audience. And so far from being users of opium and alcohol, they are prohibitionists almost to a man. Nor is "the question for mankind today" (of immortality) to be settled by Haeckel or Lodge. Although spiritualistic phenomena are scientific, being Nature, and governed by the laws of Nature, the question of immortality cannot be settled by material or physical science, but as Sir Oliver says, must be studied through the instrumentality or mediumship of the human organism, just as the manipulation of electricity must be by or through conductors and not through non-conductors, as O. J. G. and Redcote seem to be. Nor does this make mediums authority on immortality any more than a good musical instrument is an authority on music. Nor can jugglers and sleight-of-hand performers duplicate the achievements of test mediums, any more than a musical instrument can make music by itself. It is not the musical instrument that makes the music, nor is it the medium that gives the information or message. It is the spirit expressing itself through those instruments, and this has been proven thousands of times.

But Redcote has reached the climax of sophistry and stupidity in the following: "There is not the slightest doubt that Sir Oliver has been duped, and it is a duty he owes the world to rectify his error by a public recantation to counteract the publicity of his confession. A great man's message is the world's greatest asset." Yes, this last sentence is true, but would not that great man make an unspeakably contemptible fool of himself to recant and give himself the lie and say that the message or grand and glorious fact of immortality which he had labored for years to prove and had proven by many test proofs, was not so? It seems to me it would be impossible for Sir Oliver or any other sane man to turn and say he doesn't believe something that he has said repeatedly he knows is so! And even if he did make such an infinite fool of himself, it would no more disprove spiritualism than if he should say the same thing about astronomy or physics. Spiritualism is a science, and, like astronomy, can be proven, if we go at it right.

RELIGIOUS CONDITIONS IN OHIO.

From Dr. E. V. Hall, Ohio.

To the Editor of The Truth Seeker:

I am highly pleased with THE TRUTH SEEKER and would regret to miss a number. It always comes filled with choice articles that are of use in my daily rounds. I have a rather large clientele for a country doctor, and they all know something of the old Infidel's religious views. I have been asked: "Doctor, don't you think you are injuring your business by talking about religion as you do?" No, it never hurt any man's business to be honest, provided he is located in an intelligent community, and you know we are all quite intelligent. I am aware of the fact that quite a number say, "Doc. Hall is the best doctor, but I would not have him because he does not believe the Bible." They are not the intelligent representative people of this community; most of them are not capable of understanding and applying a doctor's directions, and I am entirely too busy to undertake to educate them.

Ohio is a pretty good state to live in. We have more college graduates per capita than any other state in the Union and fewer church communicants. We also have more empty, abandoned churches, which makes a very encouraging showing for the intellectual status.

Inclose check payment for another year's deluge from your great superstition annihilator.

THOUGHTS ON THE GREAT "BEGINNING."

From Bertha G. Wilson, California.

To the Editor of The Truth Seeker:

"In the beginning"—but how do we know there ever was a beginning? Was anyone present and conscious when the universe "got under way?"

"Why, yes," say some, "God was in existence before ever there was anything:" which, by the way, seems like an assertion that God is nothing, in other words, never existed at all.

But allowing that God existed before anything existed, how, then, could the writer of the first verse of the holy Bible have known of something that happened before his day? Did God inspire him? The writer doesn't say that he was inspired, and if he had said so, the chances are that he was lying when he said it.

But, supposing he was inspired, how do we know that God's memory was not playing him false? In the third, fourth and fifth verses we read that God said: "Let there be light," and that there was light, and that God divided the light from the darkness which had previously been upon the "face of the deep," and called the light day and the darkness night. This happened the first day. Now, in the fourteenth verse we find God, on the fourth day, saying: "Let there be lights in the firmament of the heaven, to divide the day from the night." How could he have done that, after having already divided the day from the night the first day, unless he had forgotten and thus automatically shut off the supply of light? That he found it necessary to create a material "orb of day" (something that could be relied upon to "stay put") would tend to establish the belief in the fallibility of God's memory. If further proof were needed, it might be furnished in the discrepancies in the story itself. God having found that he could not trust himself for three days, could hardly expect us to rely upon his memory of events to cover a period of at least 235 years. (Adam was 130 years old when Seth was born, and Seth 105 at Enos' birth, which was the time—Genesis iv, 26—when men began to call upon the name of the Lord; and there couldn't have been much "inspiring" done before that.)

But, admitting that God did chance to remember what happened at a certain period in his career, how do we know that he could be relied upon to tell the truth about what he knew? 1 Kings xxii, 23 says: "The Lord hath put a lying spirit in the mouth of all these thy prophets." Evidently the Lord was not above the use of expedients. He seems to have made the end justify the means, in this case; and if in this case, how do we know but that in his great wisdom he considered it expedient to deceive us in regard to this "beginning" business? Certainly, if by making us believe that he had created a universe from nothing, at a particular period in the history of eternity, he could increase our faith in him; and if faith were the only thing that could make us look good to him, his incentive for deceiving us must have been very strong.

But again, supposing there was a beginning of the universe (from the standpoint of those who find such a beginning a mental necessity), then when the mind arrives at that particular beginning, is there any satisfaction in stopping there? To my mind there would be as great a necessity for an endless chain "of beginnings" as there is for an "endless" cycle of existence. When, for instance, did God begin? To say he always was is as unsatisfactory as to say that the universe always was. If the universe always was, there is no mental necessity for a creator, hence no chance for a ruler, for if the thing always was and always is to be, it must exist as it is from necessity and not by whim. If it could not possibly go out of existence, it would need no pilot to guide it away from disaster, because disaster would mean only change, which we see going on all the while. Great masses collide, are smashed to bits, and new masses arise from the remains. And who cares? Apparently no one except the friends of the victims. In the presence of the awful things that are happening in Europe, who cares? Does anyone or anything, aside from those involved or the pitying men and women who look on in helpless misery? If there is a God of love and mercy, he is a helpless and miserable victim, like the rest of us. If he is a God of wrath, he certainly is enjoying himself to loathsome satiation.

But what of eternity itself, which seems to be the only "hint" of God's existence, in the minds of those who cannot believe in the "always was?" Is there no mental necessity in these people, for a beginning or ending of "eternity" even! Just how long did God non-exist before he created the universe? Just how long was non-existence in non-existence before existence began? God must have had a far easier time of it ruling over nothing than he had trying to manage one lone woman. It took her about five minutes to upset all the calculations that God had been making during all eternity. I have an unholy suspicion that she was slightly superior to her creator. No wonder God found it impossible to create her from nothing (as he had her numb-headed "lord and master"). She must have slyly eaten of the fruit of the tree of knowledge sometime before the historian was aware that the deed had been done—another lapse of God's memory. For how could Eve have known enough otherwise to have reasoned that if the fruit would make one wise, it would be a good thing to eat?

It seems as an authority on beginnings, the Bible is a very successful failure.

A LESSON TAUGHT BY "CHICKS."

From V. Sprague, Tennessee.

To the Editor of The Truth Seeker:

The other day we visited a brother out of the Lord who has a beautiful flower garden and an up-to-date henry. While rambling about admiring the blossoms, we came to a small detached building wherein there was a hen with a big brood of little chicks. Inquiring why one hen had charge of so many, I was informed by the lady of the house that the other hens had abandoned their charges; and this, being a nice, motherly old hen, was given the supervision of all. The way she acted would lead one to know that she knew her true worth and that she accepted the charge with gratitude. Her total family consisted of thirty-one little fluffy balls of yellow.

While watching these cute little animated eggs, we noticed that there seemed to be dissensions among them. Every once in a while, one little yellow fluff would dart at another and pick it with its bill. The one attacked would then spread its embryonic wings and give vent to a sharp peep, while using its legs to good advantage. My hostess turned to me and said: "When first they dwelt together, there was perfect harmony. They were affectionate and agreeable and minded the least cluck of the old hen. When she uncovered a nice, fat grub, there was no dissatisfaction on the part of the chicks as to its division. Each knew, if it did not get a share in this particular grub, they would in another. They had implicit faith in the old hen. But now, as you have noticed, there is discord among them. I cannot account for it, can you?"

"Of course," I remarked, "there must be a reason."

Having a little familiarity with the chicken language, I addressed a rather smart-looking chick who stood a little apart watching the others quarrel. Upon hearing itself addressed, this freethinker of the chicken tribe said: "As you have remarked, there is a reason and it is the same that creates so much discord in your own manner of life. Not in an egotistical way, I would have you know, I am somewhat of a philosopher and have read considerable, and, what is more to the point, I do my own thinking while the others are guided entirely by what one or the other tells them. You must know that in our life as well as in yours, heredity is a great factor. Now, these chicks have had different mothers and various fathers and as a natural consequence, they have developed ideas. Some of their ancestors were extremists in a religious sense; some were high up in an ecclesiastical sense, and as Baptist, Methodist or Catholic, their names may have rung through the earth. After the manner of heredity, do you see anything strange in these chicks in taking after their parents? For a time these views lay dormant; and during that time, peace and unity dwelt among us, but after a little, two or three developed these ideas and became obsessed with the idea that they were called of God to shed light in dark places. So they set about trying to make us all see things in the same light as they do. Right here is where the trouble commenced. These chick evangelists have gathered the chicks in little cliques. Each little knot thinks the other gatherings utterly devoid of sense and that they only encumber the earth. They look at each other with distrust; and all feeling of brotherly and sisterly love seems to have flown. Thus, hate and crime are engendered, but the different little gatherings seem to think the world of their particular leader. In his presence, they become as sheep dumb before the shearer. His word is law unto them. They drink down with avidity every word he utters and accept it as truth, no matter how erroneous the statement may be, and, as he is too good for work, they supply him with the fattest grubs. Nothing is too good for him, in fact."

"Thank you," I said, "for what you have told me. It has been very interesting; but there is one other question I would like to ask. Why is it that every once in a while a chick breaks away from a quarreling brood and runs to you?"

"Oh! so you have noticed that? Well, that is the part I enjoy the most; and, looked at aright, it is very humorous. You see, I have made quite a study of their various beliefs and have built up arguments to upset all of their pet theories. These, they call clubs; and in wrangling among themselves, they come to me for help. They use these clubs upon each other with great glee, and seem to see their point when aimed at the other fellow; but are entirely blind when pointed at themselves. As I have discovered that I can make very little progress with individuals, I give the individuals material whereby to down the other, hoping thereby their own eyes will eventually be opened."

After thanking this interesting chick and giving him a few fat worms, I departed.

A MODERN JUDAS.

From Carl W. Petty, New York.

To the Editor of The Truth Seeker:

Your "Revival Extra" was splendid, and I send my sincere thanks and congratulations.

Have you taken note of that Methodist Social Union dinner? This blasphemous reincarnation of Judas stood before 700 professed Christians, under the flag of a so-called Christian country, and stated: "I come to New York with the heart of Christ in my hand, and I shall hurl it into the innermost ranks of the devil. I am calling for volunteers, to all you Methodists of New York, to follow me. Will you do it?" (New York Herald report.)

If you know any more hellish irreverence, any more damnable blasphemy, for the love of heaven keep it to yourself. This is quite enough; and 700 professed Christians cheered him to the echo under fluttering flags of a so-called Christian nation. This blasphemous Judas stands before New York and states: "God could not send Jesus Christ to New York, so he sent me. God could not send the Angel Gabriel to New York, so he sent Rody." What puny deity is it who can't do this or that and has upstart self-appointed vicars spring into the breach and do his work for him!

He states that "Judas had no return ticket from hell." How then did he get up to 168th street and Broadway? He certainly is there! This modern reincarnation differs slightly from the original. The original Judas was satisfied to betray his Lord once, accept 30 pieces of silver as the price, and then went out and hanged himself. This modern reincarnation does it six times a week for about forty weeks a year, to the tune of about $1,200 to $1,500 a night, and picked from his deluded followers, and glories in his faith and blasphemy. Since he doesn't do it for himself, some one ought to hang him and put a slow fire under him to help, and make him feel more at home.

I hope THE TRUTH SEEKER will keep at him and give him no rest this side of hell, from which he has been quite too long absent.

ECONOMY AND ECONOMICS.

From W. C. Tremier, Pennsylvania.

To the Editor of The Truth Seeker:

The term economy as applied to the management of the family exchequer or any kind of business activity, is fairly well understood by any person of average intelligence; but when used in connection with the management of the diversified activities of the body social, only those who comprehend the economic interrelationships which perforce enter into these activities have a reasonably clear conception of all that said terms imply.

Probably the psychic factors most responsible for lack of clear concept regarding the term when employed in its widest sense, is the more or less contradictory treatment it receives when discussed by men closely affiliated with widely differing schools of thought and action.

That group of economists, who, in theory at least, abandon the realm of the demonstrable, for that of the undemonstrable—I refer to the clergy—tell their hearers to put their trust in "the Divine Economy," which at all times operates and regulates everything within the universe for the good of all mankind, but at the same time fails to satisfactorily explain to what extent those economies which come into being as a result of human activities, harmonize with the aforesaid "Divine Economy."

"Kings of Finance," and "Captains of Industry" discuss such economies of government as "Protective Tariffs," "Sound Currency Laws," and other equally "safe and sane" laws, but fail to explain the causes responsible for the industrial stagnation which from time to time takes place under the operation of aforesaid economic legislation.

Again there is that group of economists who volunteer their services in "guiding the Ship of State" away from the shoals of economic mismanagement which threaten its destruction, but as this class of economists advise the nation's electorals of "bad pilots" rather than of sound economic policies, they excite mental prejudices, rather than stimulate intelligent dispassionate thought.

There is still another group of economists who outnumber all those already mentioned, and this group is known as the well-to-do, or "middle class" group within the body social.

The economic concepts of this latter group seldom advance beyond those individual economies that gave Smith, or Jones "a good start in the world."

This latter group appears to lose sight of the important fact that it is the many who spend liberally of their economic resources who most contribute to the economic success of those who spend sparingly of like resources.

If society should either by common consent, or by legal enactment, bar all present-day luxuries, and adopt those economies in dress and other creature comforts which generally obtained in "the good old-fashioned days" of a half century or more ago, widespread industrial stagnation would speedily follow as a result of said economies; and all classes of society would in varying degrees be subjected to said economic effects.

The employer who procures from a competitive market such class of workman as will best serve his economic interests at the lowest wage cost to himself, would be practicing what might properly be called good business economy, and would also be practicing the same kind of business economy by disposing of these commodities in those trade markets where money was most plentiful by reason of generally high wages, together with a predisposition on the part of the recipients of same to exchange said wages for such commodities as would add most to their pleasure and comfort. When, however, the competition becomes so acute in the labor market as to cause a generally low standard of wages to obtain in the large industrial centers, or if, on the other hand, prices of commodities advance out of economic proportion to the wages paid for the production of same, economic equilibrium will be destroyed and business and industry would alike suffer.

Let me add in closing that while it is imperative that we as individuals adopt such economies as will under our present economic system insure security from the ills which so often threaten to injure or destroy us, it is equally important that we acquaint our minds with the diversified economic interrelationships that enter all human activities to make, or mar, our individual existence.

New York's Market Basket.

Says the Globe:

Here are the items in New York city's food budget that must be obtained during the next twelve months, unless the city is to suffer crises and its people forced to abandon settled eating habits in favor of strange and often unwelcome food substitutes:

880,000,000 pounds of beef and other meats, most of which arrives from American packing houses and is subject at present to an unprecedented export demand.

800,000,000 quarts of milk from milk centers which have produced raw milk because cheese at 17 cents a pound did not pay. With cheese at 25 cents a pound it is different.

139,000,000 pounds of butter.

150,501,630 dozen eggs, usually produced with feed at less than half the present prices.

900,000,000 loaves of bread.

400,000,000 pounds of sugar, most of which formerly came from points outside the United States.

750,000,000 pounds of potatoes, from farms suffering from shortage of labor, prohibitive seed prices and a scarcity of fertilizer.

5,000,000 pounds of oranges and other fruit.

28,956,009 pounds of cheese.

150,000,000 pounds of fish.

45,000,000 pounds of coffee.

5,000,000 pounds of tea.

THE BIBLE OF NATURE

A Contribution to the Religion of the Future.

BY FELIX L. OSWALD

FIVE CHAPTERS OF PHYSICAL MAXIMS.
FIVE CHAPTERS OF MORAL MAXIMS.
FIVE CHAPTERS OF MENTAL MAXIMS.
FIVE CHAPTERS OF OBJECTIVE MAXIMS.

Dr. Oswald was a well-known Naturalist, Physician, Hygienist and Philosopher, and as a writer as spicy as Montaigne.

Price of the Bible of Nature, cloth, postpaid, $1. Address THE TRUTH SEEKER.

THE OLD TESTAMENT

By Chilperic Edwards

This little volume disposes completely of the notion of divine revelation. It shows what modern criticism has done with the Old Testament canon and analyzes in detail the separate books of the collection.

Price, cloth, 45 cents.

Address THE TRUTH SEEKER.

62 Vesey St., New York

DYNAMIC THEORY OF LIFE AND MIND. By James B. Alexander. An Attempt to show that all Organic Beings are Both Constructed and Operated by the Dynamic Agencies of their respective Environments. Over 400 illustrations, 87 chapters, 1,057 pages, and a 3-column index of 11 pages. Price, express prepaid, $2.75.

CHILDREN'S CORNER FOR BOYS AND GIRLS YOUNG AND OLD

"Between the dark and the daylight,
When the night is beginning to lower,
Comes a pause in the day's occupations
That is known as the Children's Hour."

FREETHOUGHT CALENDAR.

CONDUCTED BY FRANKLIN STEINER.

Robert Owen, May 14, 1771. November 19, 1858.

Robert Owen, the New Lanark cotton spinner and Freethought philanthropist, was born in Newtown, Montgomeryshire, North Wales, May 14, 1771. Here he received all his school education, which terminated at the age of nine. For a time he was apprenticed to a draper, after which he moved to Manchester and thoroughly familiarized himself with cotton spinning. When but nineteen years old he became manager of a mill that employed five hundred people and he made it one of the best factories in Great Britain. In 1795 he became manager and part owner of the Chorlton Twist Co. of Manchester. While on a visit to Glasgow he met and fell in love with the daughter of David Dale, proprietor of the New Lanark mills. He prevailed upon his partner to purchase them and after his marriage with Miss Dale settled there, finally buying out his partners and becoming sole proprietor. In New Lanark began his successful efforts for the uplifting of his working people which have been the admiration of the world. Parton says in "Captains of Industry," first series, p. 184: "He built commodious and beautiful school rooms in which the children were better taught, in some respects, than the sons of the nobility were taught in Eton or Harrow. Besides the usual branches, he had the little sons and daughters of the people drilled regularly in singing, dancing, military exercises and polite demeanor." He succeeded in drawing the attention of the English nobility to the work of bettering the condition of the laboring classes, and among his friends were Lord Brougham and the Duke of Kent, father of Queen Victoria. To Lord Brougham he wrote concerning the success of his work: "For twenty-nine years we did without magistrates or lawyers; without a single legal punishment; without any known poor rates; without intemperance or religious animosities. We reduced the hours of labor, well educated all the children from infancy, greatly improved the condition of adults and cleared upwards of three hundred thousand pounds profit." The Encyclopedia Britannica in the past has been grudging in its justice to unbelievers and non-Christians, yet in the eleventh edition (the last) it has this to say about New Lanark: "According to the unanimous testimony of all who visited it, the results achieved by Owen were singularly good. The manners of the children brought up under his system were beautifully graceful, genial and unconstrained; health, plenty and contentment prevailed; drunkenness was almost unknown, and illegitimacy was extremely rare. The most perfect good feeling subsisted between Owen and his work people and all the operations of the mill proceeded with the utmost smoothness and regularity; and the business was a great commercial success." But the name of Robert Owen shines above all others for one act which has perhaps never been paralleled by any Christian employer. In 1806, owing to President Jefferson's proclamation forbidding English ships to enter American waters, he could obtain no cotton and his mills were closed. Yet during this time he paid out to his people £7,000 rather than see them suffer for want of work. He made a trip to the United States, determined to repeat his New Lanark experiment there, buying land in the new state of Indiana for the purpose. Unfortunately it was not a success, as no one but Robert Owen himself was capable of doing the work, and the men he placed in charge made a failure. While in the United States he held a debate with Alexander Campbell on "The Evidences of Christianity."

George Jacob Holyoke, in his "History of Co-operation" says that Robert Owen was the founder of co-operative stores in England where they have been a great success. Some trace the modern socialist movement to the seed he sowed and they are doubtless correct. The latter part of his life was spent in the British Isles advocating Freethought and social reforms. His last public appearance was in Liverpool, where, leaning upon the arm of Lord Brougham, he addressed the National Association for the Advancement of Social Science. From here, he traveled to his birthplace, Newtown, declaring, "I will lay my bones whence I derived them." Here he died, November 19, 1858, aged eighty-seven years. The world has produced no man nobler than Robert Owen. Three of his sons, Robert Dale, David Dale, and Richard Dale emigrated to the United States where they became distinguished as well as useful citizens.

Other events of which the past week is the anniversary are:

May 13, Thomas Cooper, English Free-thinker, died, 1839.
May 14, Pennsylvania Hall opened, 1838.
Grattan, Irish patriot, died, 1820.
May 15, decision affirmed in case of D. M. Bennett, found guilty of mailing "Cupid's Yokes," 1880. Le Roy Sunderland died, 1885.
May 16, Socinius died, 1562. Balzac, French novelist, born, 1799.
May 17, Talleyrand died, 1838. Dr. Jenner born, 1749.
May 18, first trial by jury, 1270.
May 19, Fichte, German philosopher and skeptic, born, 1762. Israel Putnam died, 1790.

SYMPATHY.

I fear that when Pete's daughter Lucy gets to heaven, looks over the battlements, and sees all the sinners writhing in torment, the sight will spoil her fun.

You see, Lucy takes to plane geometry as a hen does to corn. In the examination at the end of the first semester, she got a hundred, and is away up at the top, proud and happy.

But the dear child's joy is marred by her sympathy for some of the girls who have come out on the wrong side of 75. For the pedagogue whose light and pleasant pastime it is to pound geometry into the heads of the sophomores, has taken revenge on the unsuccessful by posting in a conspicuous place at the main entrance of the high school building a list of those who have disgraced themselves by failure and are, accordingly, on dishonorable mention, so to speak. And Lucy says that those of the girls that are careless and lazy and thus deserving of punishment treat the matter as a joke, while some of the slow, plodding ones who have tried to learn geometry, but have done poorly in the examination, feel humiliated and angry. And Lucy asks me, "Do you not think the teacher did wrong to punish the failures in such a way, indiscriminately?"

Even very little folks have their troubles. And our Little Boy has been having a very grave one, which came about in this way: He bears a distinguished name, composed of that of a noted soldier combined with that of a famous explorer. But, his family being poor and there being several other children to be provided for, he came to live with us, and go to school. And when he appeared among them, the school children, good Sunday school boys and girls of course, but rude and ignorant little rustics, dubbed him "Jack," a name here much in vogue for mules, but not deemed flattering when applied to boys. And this teased our Little Boy, but, small and weak, and a social underling, he had to bear the infliction with as good grace as possible. We tried to help the child by speaking in praise of the name "Jack," and telling him of some of the honorable Jacks that we have known. And, as the weeks passed, the Little Boy read aloud to us many a tale in which often there was a "Jack," the youngest of the brothers, who proved to be the cleverest and out-did the rest and won for himself the most beautiful princess. Thus it came to pass that the Little Boy's ideas as to the disgracefulness of being called "Jack" underwent a complete change, until one evening he surprised me by the following conversation:

"I wonder what the teacher thought today when I wrote 'Jack' on my paper?"

"Then you don't mind being called 'Jack' any more?" I inquired.

"No, I rather like it," answered he.

"Let us see if we can't fix this up some way to make it satisfactory," said I. "Suppose we throw away 'Mordecai,' that awkward middle name of yours."

"But," objected the Little Boy, "my own papa, who died when I was three weeks old, gave me that name. Mamma gave me my other one."

"What was your own father's name?" I asked.

"It was John," said he.

"Ha!" exclaimed I, "that is lucky for us. What do you say to dropping 'Mordecai' and taking your own father's name instead 'Jack' is merely a nickname for John, which is as good a name as one can find. Call yourself 'John,' and let them nickname you 'Jack' as much as they please."

This scheme pleased the Little Boy well. So now he signs himself "John Sherman Livingstone," and you may call him "Jack," if you wish. K.

The Underland.

When I was, oh, so much smaller,
And so much nearer the ground,
The dear, queer things I could hear and see

The wonderful things I found!
I mined on the mole-hill mountains,
I toiled in the valleys of sand,
And the gems untold and the pebble-gold
I shut away in my hand!

When I was, oh, so much smaller,
Wherever I chanced to pass
I saw the ants and the little brown bugs
Climb up on the blades of grass!
I travelled, and the little brown bugs,
Through a forest vast and sweet,
Whose shadowy glades I know no more,
Because it is under my feet!

When I was, oh, so much smaller,
And so much nearer the floor,
The leagues of its carpet prairie!
The flowers that scattered it o'er!
The house—what a boundless kingdom!
What mysteries came and went!
Each chair was a wayside boulder,
Each table a spreading tent!
The lamps were moons hung in heaven,
And the big folks giant-high;
Away up on my father's shoulder
I could reach clear into the sky!

I'm glad I'm coming up taller!
We can't stay close to the ground!
Yet I think, oh, often and often,
Of the wonderful things I found!
Of the hills, and the pleasant valleys,
Of the byways, memory-sweet,
The land that I left behind me
When I grew away from my feet!
—Catherine Young Glen.

The Professor's Banner.

A professor at Princeton who has taken much interest in the woman-suffrage movement was persuaded to carry a banner in a parade held in Washington.

His wife observed him marching with a dejected air and carrying his banner so that it hung limply on its standard, and later she reproved him for not making a better appearance.

"Why didn't you march like somebody, and let the people see your banner?" she asked.

"Dearie," sighed the professor, "did you see what was on that banner? It read, 'Any man can vote. Why can't I?'"—The Lamb.

Are You Pious?

"Now," said a teacher to his class during a lesson in English, "can anyone give me a word ending with 'ous,' meaning full of, as 'dangerous,' full of danger, and 'hazardous,' full of hazard?" There was a silence in the class for a moment. Then a boy sitting in the front row put up his hand. "Well," said the teacher, "what is your word?" "Pious, sir," came the reply, "'pious' full of pie!"

Three Great Names.

In an Ohio town is a colored man whose last name is Washington.

Heaven has blest him with three sons.

When the first son arrived the father named him George Washington. In due time the second son came. Naturally he was christened Booker Washington. When the third man child was born his parent was at loss, at first, for a name for him. Finally, though, he hit on a suitable selection.

The third son, if he lives, will go through life as Spokane Washington.—Saturday Evening Post.

Not All for Grandma.

A little boy of seven was being scolded in a room adjoining one in which his grandma lay ill. He motioned toward grandma's room and quietly said, "Sh—! It's too much for her; it'll wear her out."

Later, grandma thanked him for his consideration, whereupon he replied, "Don't mention it, gram; that was fifty-fifty—part for you and part for me."—Everybody's Magazine.

Oldest First.

Father—Tommy, go out to the barn and hitch the horse to the old sleigh.

Son—Why not to the new sleigh, father?

Father—Wear out the old first, is my motto, my son.

Son—Well then, father, you go out and hitch up the horse.—Everybody's Magazine.

This Is the Book We Have Been Waiting For

The Belief In God and Immortality

A STATISTICAL STUDY

By JAMES H. LEUBA

Professor of Psychology and Pedagogy in Bryn Mawr College.

The work is the result of an inquiry among men of science—biologists, sociologists, historians, psychologists—as to whether they believe or want to believe in a prayer-answering God and in continuance of life after death. The answer is altogether different from what might be expected in view of the frequent affirmations of the supernaturalists that belief in Christianity, or at least its fundamental dogmas, is held by the majority of the men of science.

It puts into the hands of Freethinkers exactly the information they want on that subject, with the facts and figures verifying it.

As a logical conclusion, founded upon the general aspect of the case, we have held that science leads its votaries to a rejection of such undemonstrable propositions as the existence of gods and the survival of the "soul" when the body is dead. Here we have the evidence, in statistical form, which confirms our view.

To the inquiry into the attitude of the scientists there are added statistics regarding the thought of college students regarding the same religious dogmas.

The author is himself a man of science, an authority in his special branch, which is Psychology, and he knows and sets forth the origin and history of the beliefs with which he deals.

No recent book has attracted more attention from the press, or presented such a serious problem to the supernaturalists.

Cloth, 8vo., $2, postpaid

Sold by

The Truth Seeker Company
62 Vesey Street, New York

THE LETTER BOX.

J. A. H., Washington.—The reference to the Magnificat (Luke i, 30ff) as a paraphrase of a prophecy concerning Hercules is not recalled by us. If it occurred in THE TRUTH SEEKER we may expect the author to reveal himself on reading this inquiry.

W.M. BRANDT, Manhattan.—The words you saw in THE TRUTH SEEKER, "The Lord could not drive out the inhabitants of the valley, because they had chariots of iron," you will find in the book of Judges, i, 19. Copies of the Masters poem on Ingersoll might be had of Mrs. Ingersoll, by writing to her.

CHARLES SMITH, West Virginia.—THE TRUTH SEEKER received no report of the debate announced Oct. 7, 1916, to take place at Shawnee, Okla., between Stanley J. Clark and the Rev. Jos. F. Worlick on the authenticity of the Bible. Dr. R. L. Hudspeth of Shawnee may be able to tell you something about it.

J. DANFORTH TAYLOR, M.D., Boston.—To the questions: "Do you believe in any kind of a God?" "Do you believe in any kind of future existence?" and "Why do you condemn Christianity?" we should expect an interesting series of replies if we could get those you designate as "prominent TRUTH SEEKER readers" to give their answers. And, as you say, it would make good stuff.

D. G., Ohio.—You say that in looking up Josephus you find his "address to the Greeks on Hades" makes him a believer in Christ, yet it is not quoted by any of the old writers in verification; and you inquire whether this is a forgery bodily or has been interpolated. We did not take a hand in the recent Josephus discussion in THE TRUTH SEEKER. Some of the daring disputants may favor you with an opinion.

W. WEISHAAR, Chicago.—A confusion of persons and dates is indicated in the question of the man who wanted to know of you if Thomas Paine wrote the "Star Spangled Banner." Key composed the national anthem during the war of 1812-15, but Paine died in 1809. The anachronism is about the same as in the popular Sunday-school story that Paine showed the manuscript of his "Age of Reason," written in 1793, to Franklin, who died in 1790, and was advised by the latter to burn it.

GORDON OWENS, Chicago.—The other day we had a letter from a Washington physician who wrote: "Here's to the staunch old TRUTH SEEKER, the best and sanest paper, in my judgment, published in the English language on the globe." The same mail brought from an Arizona subscriber the remark: "I could read a TRUTH SEEKER every day, and a few extras in between." While the letters were on our desk a man who has been attached to a New York bank for about fifty years called to express his appreciation personally. We were later reflecting that blessings do not always come singly when a colored gentleman entered the place, bought some books, assured us that Cardinal Gibbons had no idea how many good Negroes were Free-thinkers, and deposited the subscription price of the paper. We called it a perfect day, and the sun came out for the first time in a gloomy week.

THE CHRISTIAN MYTHOLOGY

A Work that Traces the Principal Features of the Christian Religion to Their Source in the Mythologies of Older Religions.

By BRIGHAM LEATHERBEE

Illustrated.

A feature of the work is the uncovering of the phallic principles in Christianity, to which the key is given in a series of illustrations.

"The Christian Mythology" is printed on light but substantial paper, convenient in size, handsomely bound in cloth, with gold sidestamp, and is provided with a sufficient index and a Bibliography that guides the reader to works drawn upon as authorities. The unpretentious little volume will bring light to thousands who know nothing about the origin of the dogmas they believe or the rites they practice.

Published by

The Truth Seeker Co.
62 Vesey Street New York

Price, 75 cents

THE REASON WHY. A Story for Freethinkers. By Ernest E. Russell. Paper, 50 cents.

The Ingersoll Birthday Book

Selections by

GRACE LELAND MACDONALD

(Mrs. G. E. Macdonald)

Preface by EVA INGERSOLL-BROWN.

(Granddaughter of Ingersoll)

Decorations by PAUL F. BERDANIER.

Cover by HUGH HENNESSY.

Printed in Color on Cameo Plate Coated

Sepia Paper, 252 pages, Octavo.

Descriptive Circular sent free on application.

PRICE, $1.65 POSTPAID

The Truth Seeker Company
62 Vesey Street, New York

THE REASON WHY

A Story for Freethinkers

By ERNEST E. RUSSELL

We do not know which will be most admired in this book, the narrative or the argument, for both are rich. The author has pictured religion as it is preached and talked, and has added brilliant and informing chapters on modern thought about religion.

In Paper Covers, 50 Cents

THE
TRUTH SEEKER OFFICE
NEW YORK

TRACTS REPRINTED

CAN JESUS SAVE? By W. E. Clark. 5 cents.

There is a new idea in this little work for Christian believers to consider.

CREDENTIALS OF CHRIST. LACK OF PROOF THAT HE WAS AN ACTUAL PERSONALITY. By Parish B. Ladd. 5 cents.

Judge Ladd examines, from the established rules of evidence, the pretensions of the church as to the necessity for a Redeemer, the prediction of his coming, and the testimony that he finally appeared upon earth—"Not Proven."

CASE OF BILLY SUNDAY (the). By James F. Morton, Jr., Franklin Steiner and George E. Macdonald. 5 cents. $2.50 a hundred.

One of the most effective exposures ever printed. Has done more than any other cause to discomfort the notorious "gutter evangelist," and should be made to follow him in large quantities, wherever he goes.

FALSE TEACHING OF THE CHRISTIAN CHURCH. By L. K. Washburn. 5 cents.

An earnest appeal to the human consciousness to emancipate itself from the falsehoods instilled into it in the name of religion.

INGERSOLL'S ADVICE TO PARENTS. By R. G. Ingersoll. 10 cents per dozen.

Keep Children out of Church and Sunday School.

OUR ANONYMOUS BIBLE. Is Scripture Infallible and Divinely Inspired? By Chas. L. Snyder. 10 cents.

The negative answer is supported by an array of proofs which the most ardent Bible believer will be unable to refute.

WHAT WE OFFER IN EXCHANGE. By W. A. Crofut. "If you take away my religion, what will you give in its place?" 5 cents.

HOW CHRISTIANITY BEGAN. By Gen. William Birney. Locating the time and place when the religion of Christendom arose. Price 7 cents.

The Candle from Under the Bushel

(Mark iv, 21); or,

1,306 Questions to the Clergy

And for the Consideration of Others.

Instructive, Interesting, and Laughable.

By WILLIAM HART

Price, paper, 50 cents; cloth, $1.00.

Address THE TRUTH SEEKER CO.

MYTH AND LEGEND IN THE BIBLE

By Keighley Snowden.

A valuable handbook for those who desire to keep handy a clear statement of the most assured results of modern thought as applied to the critical examination of the Bible.

Price, cloth, $1.50.

Address, THE TRUTH SEEKER CO.,
62 Vesey St., New York.

The Influence of the Church
on

Marriage AND Divorce

By JOSEPH McCABE

Marriage law reform is a subject which is likely to assume greater prominence in the near future. There does not exist in English a complete study of the historical influence of the church on marriage. The lack is supplied by Mr. McCabe's new book, which deals fully with the Roman and medieval systems and the modern humanist development.

PRICE, CLOTH, $1.75

The Truth Seeker Co.

62 Vesey St. - New York, N. Y.

THE CASE OF BILLY SUNDAY

A complete exposure of the greatest charlatan of the age, exhibiting his coarse vulgarity in the pulpit, his medieval theology, his insane bigotry, his vulgar abusiveness, and his fundamental dishonesty. Contains the famous parallel columns showing his stealings from Ingersoll, and presents unanswerable proof of the deliberate falsehoods with which he has sought to turn aside exposure. Now is the time to circulate this most effective of all propaganda documents by the hundreds and thousands.

PRICE, FIVE CENTS

For sale by

THE TRUTH SEEKER

62 Vesey Street, New York City

SELF-CONTRADICTIONS OF THE BIBLE. By W. H. Burr. One hundred and forty-four propositions embodying the most palpable and striking self-contradictions of the Bible with a summary. Price 15 cents.

THE FOURTH DEMAND. Religious Teaching in Public Schools, with Reasons Why It Should Be Abolished. By Woolsey Teller. This is a fresh and up-to-date discussion of the subject. Price. 10 cents.

DESIGN ARGUMENT. Anatomically and Physiologically Considered. By an East Indian. Per copy, 10 cents; fifteen copies, $1.

ANTICHRIST. By Ernest Renan. Paper, 50 cents; cloth, $1.00.

The R. P. A. ANNUAL 1917

LIST OF CONTRIBUTIONS:

RELIGION AFTER THE WAR
Arnold Bennett

WILL ORTHODOX CHRISTIANITY SURVIVE THE WORLD WAR?

An attempt at Forecast by Representative Humanists: Sir Ray Lankester, Leonard Huxley, John A. Robson, Sir Bryan Donkin, Hon. John Collier, Professor J. B. Bury, Henry W. Nevins, Sir H. H. Johnston, H. de Vere Stacpoole, and Right Hon. J. M. Robertson, M.P.

THEOLOGY AND THE WAR..
William Archer

THE GREATEST ILLUSION..
Adam Gowans Whyte

PRE-ANIMISM...Edward Clodd

THE NEOLITH: A POEM.....
Eden Phillpotts

THE PAPACY DURING THE RENAISSANCE
Joseph McCabe

WATCHMAN, WHAT OF THE NIGHT? ...Charles T. Gorham

Sold at

THE TRUTH SEEKER OFFICE

Or sent postpaid for

40 cents per copy

TENTH EDITION. Crimes of Preachers

A RECORD OF THE CLERGY WHO HAVE COMMITTED CRIMES AND IMMORALITIES.

As was said of previous editions, the record is startlingly instructive and will open the eyes of the people, proving as it does that in thousands of cases the Bible and the Christian religion have totally failed to keep even their exponents from committing acts of grossest immorality and deeds of darkest crime.

Cover in colors. 247 pages.

PRICE, 35 CENTS

Address, THE TRUTH SEEKER CO.,
62 Vesey St., New York.

Is The Bible Worth Reading? And Other Essays

By LEMUEL K. WASHBURN

Price, postpaid, $1.

Address THE TRUTH SEEKER,
62 Vesey St. New York

DEPARTMENT OF ECONOMICS.

The Family the Social Unit in Japan.

What are the secret causes of the success of the Japanese? Let us admit that our military and naval instruction, our system of public education during the last forty years are the secondary causes, still it must be recognized that the first cause is seen in this fact, that in Japan the social unit is the family, while in the West it is the individual.

Let us ask what is meant by the individualistic conception, and we shall see that it is the result of putting above everything profit and personal advantages, in crushing under the feet the needs and the interests of others. When one has an occasional regard for these latter, it is still from egoistic motives. The child, for example, considers that it owes nothing in return to its parents, who, as his originators, have been responsible for him. Arrived at the age of manhood, his first purpose is to manage matters for himself.

That leads to some shocking customs. Children, when of full age, live with their parents in return for their board. An elder son, a millionaire, feels no obligation towards his younger brother reduced to poverty through his own idleness or bad conduct. If the parents are well off, the children will come often to see them, in order to secure a better chance of inheriting something from them; but if they are poor, the children provide for their own needs, and neglect their parents more and more. In brief, in the West, life means gold, and personal interest is everything. One does not think of accepting aid from his parents, at least if he can do otherwise. If a man cannot acquire sufficient means to maintain his own home, he never thinks of marrying. If you ask a millionaire the question: "Your son is old enough to marry; when does he expect to settle down?" he will reply: "Oh! he doesn't think of that yet! He gains nothing by providing for two persons."

In Japan, the family system leads to mutual aid and the cooperation of all those who are in any way related. Parents aid their children and the children the parents. Older brothers aid their younger brothers, and the younger their older. The honor and glory of the family are the first care of each. If there is a want on one side, the other side provides it. These families grouped together form a village, and the groups of villages added together form a single nation. This principle certainly creates a tendency to borrow and a sentiment of dependence, but it causes to develop the beautiful fruits of patriotism and of family respect, seeing that we Japanese still look back upon 120 generations from Jimmu Tenno, the founder of the empire, and we feel that since then we have always formed a single and true people.

Now, even should an emperor be lacking in distinctive virtues, we do not withdraw from him our homage, and we write with all our heart: "May he reign thousands of years, ten thousand years and more, our emperor."

In the West, the word family has not the same meaning that it has with us. There it designates only the husband and wife. When the children grow up they marry and live apart. In Japan, a family is a chain of generations united to one another and ready to help each other. This is the principle of mutual obligation which has engendered the Bushido and patriotic zeal.

A father who learns of the death of his child, if his first impulse is to hasten to his child's assistance, will content himself with grinding his teeth and saying with Masaoka: "It is for our chief and our master." When a woman receives from the outposts a telegram informing her of the death of her husband on the field of battle, it is in such a spirit she rejoices in having seen him accomplish his duty as a soldier. Hence the marvelous military discipline, the "esprit de corps" and the reduced number of the Russian spies. In the West, a woman who learns of the death of her husband frequently falls in a faint, but in Japan her natural emotion is subordinated to another thought, to see that the family suffer no harm.

For the individualist, for one to die upon the field of battle is the height of folly, but that one who establishes himself upon the principle of the family always asks himself, in case of danger or immanent death, this question: "What will my relations say? If I make myself culpable of an unworthy act, that will cast dishonor upon all my family and my relatives. I must die."

The loyalty of Chinese Confucianism and the loyalty of the Japanese religion are two absolutely different principles. A Chinese master has said: "If governments are not worthy, the subjects are not obliged to tolerate them"; and similarly, if an emperor was incapable, there should be no further obligation of fidelity towards him on the part of the people. In Japan there is nothing like this; whatever might be the character of a master, we remain attached to him because he is the representative of the imperial dynasty. He is the direct descendant of the father of the nation. Thus Confucianism has been greatly modified in penetrating Japan.

Buddhism and Christianity are both individualistic, but Buddhism, in passing through the Ryōbu-Shinto and through other transformations, ended in shinshin, a sect based upon the principle of the family, and became thus fundamentally different from what it was at the beginning. We honor our parents after their death because they once lived, and because they brought us up; we offer them a worship in token of reverence. Japan has reconciled the individualistic Buddhism of India with our communistic principle.

When Francis Xavier was desirous of introducing Christianity into Japan, he found a number of hearers, but when they asked him what had become of their mothers who had never heard of Christianity, and when he replied that they were actually undergoing the tortures of an eternal punishment, they wrote: "If it is thus with them, we wish to have nothing to do with all that." And I would add that their decision merits all our eulogies. We see then that Buddhism and Confucianism must be transformed through the communistic principle of the family in order to get a footing in Japan.

The problem which presents itself today is to determine how to render strong and great the new nation. Occidental individualism ought, in certain regards, to be admitted if we wish to hold our rank in the presence of the implacable rivalry of modern life, for occidental civilization is the authentic product of individualism. But, on the other hand, if we reject the family basis, Japan would certainly incur a great danger. There is among the young a strong tendency to adopt the individual as a basis, and to put personal interest above everything. If this current persists, one might predict that, in case a new war should break forth in fifty or a hundred years from now, the results would be entirely different. Here is a remarkable fact: the edicts of our emperor concerning instruction and military duties, which formerly excited the fancy of the occidentals, are today exalted by them, and certain of them read these regulations with the same intonation of respect which they employ when reading the gospels.

It is from the individualistic point of view that it was hoped in the West to solve social and industrial problems, and in holding to this principle it is evidently impossible to avoid strikes. In Japan, strikes are relatively rare, for if a workman, laboring, for example, in an engraving or printing house falls sick, the members of his family are accepted as substitutes. If a man gets into trouble, all the members of his family come to his aid. In Scotland where the system of clans exists, analogous to our family system, conflicts among workmen are very uncommon. There was recently established at Winchester in England an independent community based upon the family principle. It is necessary for us to give increasing attention to the grave problems in the political domain as well as to that which concerns education. One must admit that individualism alone favors the complete development of character, and that in order to triumph in the modern struggle, it is necessary at the beginning to develop the faculties of each, while aiming at the model laid down by western individualism, but it is always necessary for us to strive to avoid the unsuitable features of those principles, and to try to appropriate whatever they possess of real worth.

In that which concerns the personal ideas and philosophic views of each, one can, without inconvenience, take an attitude clearly individualistic, but at the same time a regard for the greatness of Japan, for its position among the nations of the world, ought to make us maintain the family principle which has been ours during two thousand years, while supplementing it with western individualism. Then we shall be able to see the realization of a new and more perfect nation. But we must be particularly careful not to embrace individualism to excess.—Dr. E. TAKAKUSU, Director of the School of Foreign Languages at Tokyo. (Translated from the French for THE TRUTH SEEKER by R. E.)

Only Cautionary.—He wondered why his wife suddenly turned cold on him and remained so for several days. For all that he had said in remonstrance was:

"My dear, you'll never be able to drive that nail with a flat-iron. For heaven's sake, use your head."—Ladies' Home Journal.

THE SOCIALIST LABOR PARTY.

I wish to take up a little of your space in answer to a few remarks made by Homer Wakefield, M.D., in the issue of April 28th. In his article headed "A Plea for Rationalism Undeified," he bemoans the fact that socialism has been "throttled" and "diseased," etc., "by crankisms."

Yes, sad to say, real socialism has been almost submerged beneath an avalanche of various brands of so-called reforms labeled "socialism." But for your benefit, Dr. Wakefield, I wish to state that a real socialist party does exist and has been in the field for twenty-five or thirty years; it is the Socialist Labor Party, and until a few years ago, the "giant" you hoped for was Daniel DeLeon.

You say you "do not read of abuses to be corrected," of goals to be attained, etc., in socialist papers. Do you ever read the Weekly People, published at 45 Rose street, New York city? If you see that paper (or send for sample), try to find anything but "abuses to be corrected," etc., and note your success. The entire paper is devoted to the needs of the working class, and an adequate program by which to attain economic freedom is taught through its columns.

Why should we congratulate ourselves because we can appropriate $7,000,000,000 for a starter for the defeat of the military despot of Prussia, etc.? May I ask by what means are we to rid ourselves of the military despotism (conscription) imposed upon us by a murder-mad plutocracy? In order to defeat one military regime, another, still worse, must be launched!

You speak of Andrew Carnegie as a Rationalist, and then wonder why he is not interested in the "uplift and liberation" of mankind. Andrew Carnegie is a member of what we socialists call the capitalist class. In order that the capitalist class may exist as such, the mass of the people (the workers) must produce a very large surplus which is sold in foreign markets. Since all advanced nations are capitalistic, the world markets soon become overstocked. The producers were not able to buy their products at home because their "charitable" exploiters (including "Andy") had not paid them enough in wages. Therefore the best way to uplift mankind is with explosives. So in this sense Mr. Carnegie is interested in our uplift.

We are also informed that, among other things, Mr. Carnegie gives his millions to charity. Does it not seem disgraceful that charity is necessary amidst plenty? We boast of the vast natural wealth and products of the United States and still millions of dollars are needed every year for charity.

Why do we pay double and triple prices for the bare necessities of life? To create the necessity for charity and give the Carnegies a good name. Let us remove the cause of involuntary poverty, which is the competitive profit system. Give us freedom from all economic oppression, including conscription, and it will be a very easy matter to attain the beautifully pictured ideals of rationalism.

I wish to ask Dr. Wakefield what organization he thought was "an ideal socialist organization." Who were a few of the prominent leaders?

In closing I will ask Dr. Wakefield to kindly point out wherein the Socialist Labor party could be improved.

WALTER FREEMAN.

She Had Nothing to Talk About.—Old Saint Peter, taking a stroll through the realm of Paradise, says Puck, observed a middle-aged woman, a very recent arrival, whose expression betokened anything but happiness. Instantly he approached her to inquire the cause.

"My good woman," he began, "you don't look as though you were enjoying yourself. Your golden harp is untouched at your side. Your crown of glory is not on straight, yet seemingly you do not care. In fact, your whole appearance and demeanor suggest despair rather than rapture. Don't you know where you are, my good soul? This is heaven."

The woman looked up at Saint Peter with a lack lustre eye.

"Alas, I know it," she said in hollow tones, "but it is not heaven to me."

"What? Why, my dear madam, what—"

"I can't help it; it's true. When I was on earth, I got my chief enjoyment out of talking about my ailments, swapping symptoms with the woman next door. Oh, you cannot realize the happy hours I spent. And now—and now—"

"But, my dear soul," expostulated the saint, "there are no ailments in heaven."

The unhappy shade heaved a heartrending sigh.

"That's just the trouble. I'm perfectly well," she said; "I haven't a single topic for conversation."

DOXOLOGY.

Praise Good from which all blessings flow.
Praise it as through the world we go;
Praise Love and Truth with one accord,
For they to us shall joy afford.

W. M. P.

SPIRITISM UNVEILED.

To the Editor of The Truth Seeker:

Mr. Perry in his lengthy effusion of April 28 ignores all the material points, but dilates with much waste of energy on one little merriment which I indulged in. I did not say it "required" a block and tackle to work out the imposition. There are other means known even to his "Ohio critic" by which it could be effected.

A few years ago I was indirectly connected with the "profession," and was offered strong inducements to give up law and enter it; consequently I could enumerate instances of feats that to Mr. Perry would appear quite as inexplicable as those he mentions, but which to the initiated are ridiculously simple.

Powerful magnets and electricity work wonders in hypnotizing individuals into belief of the supernatural. No doubt Prof. Crookes and other scientists laugh in their sleeves at the ease with which the credulous can be illusioned. You will notice, though, that of the several large monetary challenges made by scientists against spiritist professors, not one was ever accepted. The reason is obvious. Othello's occupation would be gone. Remember how the clever American, Slade, was exposed as a common impostor at the famous seances at Leipsig, though he had previously mystified the greatest scientists into belief.

Even the greatest of men must be allowed to have their joke with the gullible without necessarily being termed charlatans. Greater names (in their own coteries) have been allowed this amusement. For instance, what said the great Leo X, viceregent of the Christian God (and how he must have chuckled up his embroidered sleeve as the wealth came rolling in): "And all these privileges have been secured to us by the fable of Jesus Christ!"

Maskelyne and Cook of London, England, the greatest of all, refused a challenge from scientists.

Mr. Perry does not deny the palpable confederacy and prearrangement when he says: "Why should the committee have been waiting in the adjoining room with an open window to receive the man? How could they know a spirit would conduct this medium through great danger from one room to another through open windows?"

But as the arguments advance, the more absurd they appear. Mr. Perry says: "Prof. Crookes having prepared wires charged with electrical force enough to knock a person down had anyone come in contact with them," but he does not add to prevent discovery of the hidden means employed. If a man "could not be held down by the feet," how could the spirits' powers be possibly interfered with? And why this prevalence of powerful electricity if "spirits" are to do these purposeless and mundane tricks?

The two scientific facts that disprove all spiritist theories are (1) that man is a product of the animal world by flesh and blood evolution, differing only in degree from the preceding species, and (2) that by the known laws of the whole universe force (or spirit) cannot exist apart from matter. Mr. Perry must refute these before he can maintain his theories.

These "spiritist feats" are being witnessed by the combination of force and matter—man—who assumes in his combined entirety to witness the actions of a disembodied spirit, which cannot exist; hence the fallacy.

The experiences of the lady who had "about decided to take the awful leap into oblivion, and commit the act of all others the most wicked by taking her own life," (the moral involved is much questioned), is the most easily explained of all, by those who (like myself) are acquainted with the modus operandi. To the initiated it is to laugh.

But why gratuitously spoil the fun of the professors when they refuse emolumentary challenge? Professors of Christianity have spiritists beaten to a frazzle; they have gulled their millions by names which have been sainted! Yet scholarship and science have annihilated it—except to the credulous.

SEVENTH EDITION — REDUCED PRICE

BIBLE MYTHS

AND THEIR PARALLELS IN OTHER RELIGIONS

Being a Comparison of the Old and New Testament Myths and Miracles with those of Heathen Nations of Antiquity

CONSIDERING ALSO THEIR ORIGIN AND MEANING. WITH NUMEROUS ILLUSTRATIONS.

IT is a perfect Encyclopedia on the subjects treated, containing a vast amount of out-of-the-way knowledge not accessible to the majority of readers, and all the objections to the dogmas of Christianity one is likely to encounter, grouped under appropriate heads. No author has struck harder blows at the Christian religion. It is the most important Biblical criticism that has ever appeared, being the result of many years of study of the religions of antiquity. It is thoroughly reliable, every fact being verified by copious notes and authorities.

COL. ROBERT G. INGERSOLL said: "This work demonstrates the fact that there is nothing new or original in Christianity; that its maxims, miracles, and mistakes, its doctrines, sacraments, and ceremonies, were all borrowed; that its virgin mothers, miraculous babes, courier-stars, crucifixions, resurrections, and ascensions were familiar things hundreds of years before the founder of Christianity was born. It shows that all the machinery of the supernatural has been in active operation for countless generations; that all the nations of antiquity had about the same religious experience, and substantially agreed as to the correctness of about the same mistakes. Catholicism administered on the estate of Paganism, and appropriated most of the property to its own use. Christianity furnished new steam for an old engine. Fables, like most other things, wear out and have to be patched, gilded, or replaced.

"The author of 'Bible Myths' has succeeded in showing that our Bible is not the great central fire giving light to the world, but a collection of candles and tapers and sparks borrowed by the 'chosen people' from those whom Jehovah, according to the scriptures, had left in the darkness of nature."

REV. M. J. SAVAGE says: "To me, the volume is worth twenty times its cost."

THE BOSTON COMMONWEALTH says: "Here we have evidence upon evidence that there is no myth, legend, supernatural occurrence, doctrine, rite or ceremony recorded in the Bible which cannot be paralleled in some ancient record centuries older than the page on which the same thing is narrated in the Hebrew and Christian scriptures. We confess we are curious as to how the orthodoxies of the Christian world will greet this book. We more than suspect that they will not greet it at all, but will be content to pass it by in fearful silence."

Seventh Edition: Large 8vo, cloth, 614 pages, $2.

Address THE TRUTH SEEKER :: 62 Vesey Street, New York

In Best of Humor.

"Sambo's Prayer."

Yo' say it ain't no good to pray?
It's coz you doan pray right.
Jes' pray de way yo' oughter pray
An' pray wiv all yo' might.
Doan ask de Lawd to guv yer things,
But ask him to he'p yo'
He'p yo'self to git de things,
An' he will pull yo' froo.
Jes' ask in humbleness of sp'it
An' you'll get w'at yo' ask to git.

I prayed myse'f fo' free long weeks
Wiv mos' tremendous viggah,
"Lawd, sen' a chick'n, oh, good Lawd!
To dis mos' hungry niggah;
Oh, sen' a chick'n, Lord, be quick!"
But de good Lawd didn' quick'n,
An' though I wrastled long in prayer
I neval seen no chick'n;
I didn't pray right, I wasted bref,
An' so I almos' starved to def.

"Oh, sen' a chicken, Lawd to me,"
I prayed wiv tears an' plead'n;
"Oh, sen' a chick'n, Lawd, an' heah
Thy servant's interced'n."
But w'en no chick'n come I prayed,
My heart wiv sorer strick'n,
"Sen' me, oh, sen' dis niggah, Lawd,
Oh, sen' him to a chick'n."
Yo' say it ain't no good to pray?
Wa-al—we had chick'n-pie nex' day!
—ANONYMOUS.

Heroism.—Woman—"How did you get that Carnegie medal?"
Tramp—"Heroism, lady. I took it away from a guy that was twice my size."—New Orleans Times-Democrat.

City Chauffeur in the Army.—"What's become of your chauffeur?"
"Oh, he was with the regiment down in Texas and crawled under an army mule to see why it wouldn't go."—Kansas City Star.

A Geographical Joke.—Very likely you have overlooked it; but geography has nevertheless had its little joke, its quiet little satire, by locating the war in what has hitherto been called the Temperate Zone.—Puck.

Learning How.—Little Helen—"Daddy, I have been playing I was mama."
Dad—"Is that so? What did you do, dearie?"

Little Helen—"I bought you a nice present and had it charged to you."—Indianapolis Star.

Pa Rejoices.—Gwendolyn—I hear that Fanny Forty-odd is to be married. Who is the happy man?

Grace—Why, her father.—Puck.

An Improvement.—"He left his home all for her."

"Why, so?"

"Well, you see, hers was the better home."—Penn State Froth.

Looked Bad.—Howard—"Do you believe in signs?"

Coward—"Well, I don't know! The fire-alarm went off three times while the minister was preaching Wildway's funeral sermon."—Life.

Efficient.—He—"I want you to help spend my salary."

She—"Am I not doing that?"

He—"No, no; I mean forever and ever."

She—"It won't take me as long as that."

—Lamb.

He Won.—An Irishman, passing a shop where a notice was displayed saying that everything was sold by the yard, thought he would play a joke on the shopman, so he entered the shop and asked for a yard of milk. The shopman, not in the least taken aback, dipped his fingers in a bowl of milk and drew a line a yard long on the counter. Pat, not wishing to be caught in his own trap, asked the price.

"Sixpence," said the shopman.
"All right, sorr," said Pat. "Roll it up; I'll take it."—Tit-Bits.

"Know Thyself."—A stout, baggage-laden, old English gentleman was trying to make a hurried exit from a railway carriage. At the door he stumbled on the foot of a brawny Scot.

"Hoots, toots, mon!" groaned the Highlander. "Canna ye look whaur y're going? Hoot, mon, hoot!"

The burdened traveler slammed the door behind him and shouted through the window:

"Hoot yourself! I am a traveler, not an automobile."—Argonaut.

The Dinosaur.

Behold the mighty dinosaur, Famous in prehistoric lore. Not only for his weight and strength But for his intellectual length. You will observe by these remains The creature had two sets of brains— One in his head (the usual place), The other at his spinal base. Thus he could reason a priori As well as a posteriori. No problem bothered him a bit:

He made both head and tail of it. So wise he was, so wise and solemn, Each thought filled just a spinal column. If one brain found the pressure strong It passed a few ideas along; If something slipt his forward mind 'Twas rescued by the one behind; And if in error he was caught He had a saving afterthought. As he thought twice before he spoke He had no judgments to revoke; For he could think, without congestion, Upon both sides of every question.

O, gaze upon this model beast Defunct ten million years at least!

—Chicago Tribune.

THE SOUL AND ITS BEARINGS

SHOWING

The Material Quality of the Soul and the Mechanical Nature of Its Functions and of the Business Relations It Sustains with the Environment on One Side and the Rest of the Corporal Organism on the Other.

BY JAMES B. ALEXANDER

This is a Materialistic book. The author does not believe that the soul survives the body. He says: "Is it right to lie for the concealment of a disagreeable truth—to inclose the vital truth in a pleasant husk of fiction by tricking the people with the delusion of agreeable falsehoods? No! Tell the truth! Let not the truth be brought into disrepute by unworthy and debasing associations."

A very frank book; serious, scholarly, convincing.

Price $1.00

Sold at THE TRUTH SEEKER OFFICE

Paine's Age of Reason

By THOMAS PAINE, M.A.

This edition of Thomas Paine's masterpiece is the one that is sure to become the standard for all future correct editions. It is reprinted from one of the first copies in English published by Barrois at Paris, January, 1794, and the proofs were probably read by Paine. It enables the world of the twentieth century to read Paine's AGE OF REASON as Paine wrote it in the eighteenth century. It is printed from large new type. 180 pages. 15c. T. S. Co.

THE CHRISTIAN HELL

From the First to the Twentieth Century
By

HYPATIA BRADLAUGH BONNER

There is no book in the English language which describes the theory and experience of the doctrine of the Christian Hell with such fulness of details as this work by Mrs. Bonner. No one who wishes to know what this doctrine means when carried to its natural conclusions, as in the teaching of the Roman Catholic church, should fail to secure a copy of this startling work. Mrs. Bonner's sources are entirely authentic, and the reader is held spellbound by her graphic descriptions, which grow in intensity as she reaches the climax of her subject. There are some twenty-eight illustrations in the book, taken from pictures actually circulated by the churches, which serve to bring to view all the horrifying phases of this most inhuman of conceptions. This work alone is sufficient to condemn Christianity as a thoroughly unnatural institution.

PRICE, PAPER, 30 CENTS
CLOTH - 45 CENTS

The Truth Seeker

62 Vesey Street - New York

EXEMPTING THE CHURCHES

A Presentation of Facts and Reasons
to Show Why

CHURCHES SHOULD BE TAXED

Argument of

JAMES F. MORTON, JR.,

Before the Committee on Taxation of the Constitutional Convention at Albany, New York. Expanded into a pamphlet of 84 pages, to which is annexed a tract by John E. Remsburg.

It Covers All the Ground

The many pretexts for the exemption of church property from taxation examined and exposed.

Price 25 Cents

Write for rates on quantities.
THE TRUTH SEEKER CO.

ETERNITY

World-War Thoughts on Life and Death, Religion, and the Theory of Evolution

By ERNST HAECKEL

(Professor at the University of Jena)

Author of "The History of Creation," "The Evolution of Man," "The Riddle of the Universe," etc.

Of highest importance are these latest thoughts of Professor Haeckel, which embody the ideas of a Monist philosopher and Humanitarian Freethinker on War, Religion, and the nature and origin of Man. The conclusions of the evolutionists on these questions are restated, emphasized and strengthened. Apart from severely scoring the hypocrisy of nations that profess to be followers of a Prince of Peace, and yet enter upon wars of conquest and make arms and munitions their trade, what the author has to say on the merits of the parties to the present war is given in an appendix. In the main he confines himself closely to the themes indicated—science, religion and humanity. He rejects utterly the Christian scheme of this world or any other.

Cloth, $1.25 net.

THE TRUTH SEEKER COMPANY

62 Vesey Street, New York

SELF-CONTRADICTIONS OF THE BIBLE. By W. H. Burr. One hundred and forty-four propositions embodying the most palpable and striking contradictions. Price 15 cents.

News of the Week.

Official announcement was made May 10 of the coming of a commission from Russia, the personnel of which will be announced later.

Columbia University conferred the degree of Doctor of Law May 10 upon Marshal Joffre, Mr. Balfour, M. Viviani and Lord Cunliffe.

Joseph Benson Foraker, former United States Senator from Ohio, lawyer, orator and soldier, died at his home in Cincinnati, May 10, aged seventy years.

Owing to the lack of safe overseas routes, the German mail service to Spain, Mexico, South America, Central America and the Orient was discontinued May 11.

For seven hours on May 9 a great fire raged on the imperial wharves at Wilhelmshaven, Germany. The submarine building department was seriously damaged.

Nine new regiments of army engineers, to be composed exclusively of highly trained railway men, will be the first American troops to be sent to Europe.

After a riotous secret session lasting throughout Thursday night, May 10, the House of Representatives of China refused to pass a resolution declaring war on Germany.

A war revenue bill designed to raise $1,800,000,000 by taxation during the coming year was approved finally in the House Ways and Means Committee May 8 by unanimous vote.

The Federal Shipping Board May 9 announced that it had purchased from American owners seven Austrian merchantmen held in American ports, totalling 52,621 tons, for $6,778,006.

The farmers of the Eastern Shore of Maryland are ready to ship two million barrels of early potatoes to the New York and Baltimore markets to help supply the present big demand.

A. J. Balfour brought his New York visit to a close May 13, by talking with Col. Theodore Roosevelt for more than three hours at Sagamore Hill, the home of Mr. Roosevelt at Oyster Bay, L. I.

Sixty of the seventy-six German merchant steamers which were in Portuguese ports when Portugal entered the war, and which were seized by the government, have been turned over to Great Britain.

Fire in the Cluff Ammunition works at Toronto, Can., exploded 39,000 five-pound shells and caused damage to the plant estimated at $300,000 May 12. Spontaneous combustion is believed to have caused the fire.

Marshal Joffre paid tribute to the memory of Lincoln at the emancipator's tomb at Springfield, Ill., May 7, and with the others of the French commission received an enthusiastic welcome to the capital of Illinois.

The new nave of the Cathedral of St. John the Divine, New York City, is to contain the tallest columns ever provided for any building in the world. They are to tower 100 feet and will be warm-colored granite.

Speedy measures to repatriate deported Belgian workmen, as well as all other workers in the German occupied sections of Poland and Lithuania, were decided upon by the main committee of the Reichstag May 9.

The secret of making optical glass of the sort used in field glasses, range finders and periscopes, a product for which this country hitherto has been dependent on Germany, has been discovered by the Bureau of Standards.

The Societe Generale, one of the largest Belgian banks, has been fined 250,000 marks by the German authorities. The fine was levied under the pretext that the bank was in correspondence with the Belgian Government.

Adjustment of all differences between the two houses of Congress on the selective draft army bill was reached May 10, the points in dispute being settled as follows: Ages of men subject to draft—Twenty-one to thirty, inclusive.

On his way to report to the Officers' Training Corps at Plattsburg, N. Y., Francis Bergen, a student in the Harvard Law School, was killed near Glens Falls, N. Y., May 11, when the automobile in which he was riding turned turtle.

British socialists and labor leaders decided May 9 to hold a conference of labor men and socialists of Allied countries and the United States as an offset to the socialist conference at Stockholm, which is being engineered by German influences.

An official announcement in regard to the result of a three days' conference by Swedish, Danish, and Norwegian Ministers says that the conferees determined unanimously that the three countries should maintain a policy of impartial neutrality.

Charles E. Vawter, former professor of physics at Virginia Polytechnic Institute, was adjudged not guilty May 9 of the murder of Stockton Heath, Jr., a wealthy young man, whom he shot to death in the Vawter home early on the morning of March 13.

The United States Postoffice Department has announced that hereafter all mail for the former Danish West Indies should be addressed to "Virgin Islands of the United States." Many American business men have made inquiries on this subject.

The British oil tank motor ship Sebastian, which was being towed by an American gunboat to a New England port with fire raging fiercely in her hold, sank May 10. Thomas Jones, a marine gunner attached to a government vessel which had the Sebastian in tow, was lost.

The American government May 9 assumed the immediate financial burden of Belgian relief by arranging to lend the French and Belgian governments jointly $75,000,000 to be expended by the American Belgian Relief Commission for food to go to Belgium and northern France.

While asserting May 9 that he welcomed criticism of any of his department's policies, Mr. Lansing, secretary of state, announced flatly that he will discharge any employee of the State Department who either criticizes those policies or furnishes news upon which criticism could be based.

All single night records were broken at the Metropolitan Opera House, New York, when total receipts reached $85,843.20 Wednesday night May 12, at the benefit performance in honor of Marshal Joffre. The entire sum will be turned over to the Marshal on his return from Boston.

Approximately 90,000 tons of allied shipping which has been tied up in the Gulf of Bothnia since the beginning of the war will be released by an agreement between Great Britain and Sweden perfected May 9. Sweden secures as its part of the bargain the release of its ships laden with foodstuffs detained in British harbors.

Mme. Schumann-Heink, the contralto, has brought suit against the United Street Street Railways Company of St. Louis for $95,000. The opera singer was riding in a taxicab on Feb. 23 last when it was struck by a street car. The petition states that Mme. Schumann-Heink had three ribs broken and that the injuries will affect her health permanently.

General Joffre, the great and kindly soldier who turned back the Germans at the Marne, saved France and gave to the free peoples of the world their chance to stand against tyranny, came to New York May 10 and received, under a glory of flags, such a tribute of admiration and affection as was never offered to a guest within the gates since New York was New York.

THE WAR.

Buenos Ayres newspapers declare that the government has positive information that the Argentine sailing ship Oriana has been sunk by a German submarine. The papers say the incident is graver than the sinking of the Monte Protegido, and demand that the government act.

Heavy fighting, very probably the beginning of an allied spring offensive, has commenced on the Macedonian front. The most important part has been taken by the British, who have captured trenches in the strongest part of the Bulgarian line, the centre, on a front of two miles after fierce fighting.

A scouting force consisting of light cruisers and destroyers from Harwich, under Commodore Tyrwhitt, the Admiralty announced today, while cruising between the Dutch and English coasts May 10 sighted a force of eleven German destroyers about 4 o'clock, Greenwich mean time, on a parallel course and to the southward.

Japan has placed her merchant fleet and a fast cruiser squadron at the disposal of the Allies.

Despatches from the Macedonian front May 12 showed a desperation in the fighting there incident to the Allied advance that is equalling anything seen on the western front.

According to a Central News despatch from Copenhagen the Norwegian Foreign Office has announced the sinking by German submarines of the steamships Capto and Natuna. The crews were rescued.

The Germans May 8 in the neighborhood of Fresnoy succeeded after heavy counter attacks in gaining a foothold in the British trenches northeast of the village. Later the British in a counter attack regained the lost ground.

The sinking of the Danish steamer Louisiana by a German submarine a few hours after she left Newcastle, England, for Boston on April 17, was reported to local agents in a cable message May 12 from Liverpool.

In a series of attacks May 12 the British troops captured several strong German positions, including one or two which have been sources of more or less trouble ever since the battle of Arras began.

The Russians in Mesopotamia are on the offensive and have forced crossings of the Diala River at two points northwest of Bagdad.

Strong counter attacks by the Germans and Bulgarians succeeded in gaining a foothold on Srka di Legen, west of the Vardar River, where the French stormed every position May 11.

Lectures and Meetings

The Sunrise Club.—The fifteenth dinner of the season takes place Monday evening May 21, at the Cafe Boulevard, 41st street and Broadway (entrance on 41st street), at 6.45 o'clock. Subject: "Billy Sunday's Invasion of the Public Schools—Un-American, Unjust, Perilous to Society, and Especially Menacing to the Church." Affirms: Henry Rowley; Denies: The Rev. Wm. Sheafe Chase. Dinner, $1.25, including tips. If you will attend, notify Edwin C. Walker, 211 W. 138th street. Telephone, Audubon 4295.

The Clarksburg (W. Va.) Rationalist Society holds its next meeting May 27 in the Court House at 2 P. M. The success and interest of this society so far indicates that it has a great future. All persons who are not afraid to think and who believe in the open mind should join this society, and help in the great work of freeing men's minds from superstition. A lecture course is now being prepared. Address G. A. Miller, Secy.-Treas., 644 S. 7th street, Clarksburg.

The Seattle Rationalist Society meets Saturday at 8 p. m. in Strand Hall, 1525 Fourth avenue, Seattle, Wash.; L. A. Wheeler, president, 1330 First avenue. THE TRUTH SEEKER and other Free-thought literature for sale at all meetings. Admission is free.

Tacoma Rationalist Society. meets every Sunday at 3 p. m. in Maccabees Hall, 1109 Broadway, Tacoma, Wash. S. T. Hammersmark, Secy., Colonial Hotel.

The Ferrer Association holds public meetings at the Ferrer Centre, 63 East 107th street, New York, every Saturday and Sunday evening.

May 21.—"William Blake," by Irwin Granich.

The Paterson Philosophical Society meets Sunday evenings at 8, at 202 Market st., over Garden Theater. Live subjects; interesting speakers. Frank Bamford, 111 Cliff st., secretary.

The Boston Freethought Society meets in Paine Memorial Hall, Appleton street, every Sunday at 3 P. M. J. P. Bland, B.D., is resident speaker, and THE TRUTH SEEKER is for sale at the door.

The Rationalist Society of Toledo, Ohio, meets in the Arcade Bldg., Room 133, St. Clair and Jackson sts., Wednesday evenings at 8.

The Chicago Freethought Society meets in Corinthian Hall, Masonic Temple, Sunday mornings, at 11 o'clock; H. Percy Ward, lecturer.

The Columbus Rationalist Association meets the second and fourth Tuesday evening of each month, 7.30 P. M., at the Hotel Vendome, Third street, opposite State House. O. C. Weatherby, president; Olin J. Ross, 23 East State street, Columbus, O., secretary.

The Freethought Congregation of Cedar Rapids, Iowa, meets every second Sunday of the month at the C. S. P. S. Hall, corner Eleventh Avenue and Third Street; Jos. J. Hajek, Speaker.

The Friendship Liberal League, (Inc.) of Philadelphia, meets every Sunday at 2.30 and 7.30, at 1417 Columbia avenue. Open platform. The Truth Seeker and liberal literature on sale. F. Garfield Bowers, secretary, 245 N. Ninth street.

The Milwaukee Rationalist Society meets every Friday evening in Convention Hall, Republican House. Joel Rubin, Pres., 9, 10 Cawker Bldg.

The Denver Rationalist Association meets the first and third Thursday of each month at 319 Kittredge Building; Olive Oliver, president.

The Church of This World, Rationalist. John Emerson Roberts, lecturer. Meetings every Sunday morning at 11 o'clock in Willis Wood Theatre, Kansas City, Mo. Mr. Roberts' services may be secured for wedding and funeral occasions. Address, 4011 Kenwood ave., Kansas City, Mo.

The Toledo Rationalist Society meets every Wednesday evening at 8, Room 133, Arcade Building, St. Clair and Jackson streets. W. M. Braun, secretary. Speakers, Dr. Rullison, J. Carl, J. Braun and K. Pauli.

The Detroit Society of Truth Seekers (Lithuanian) meets the second Sunday of every month at 2 P. M. in C. O. F. Hall, Chene, cor. Trombly st.; Karl Rutkus, organizer, 338 West End ave., Detroit, Mich.

The Detroit Freethought Association meets every Sunday afternoon at 2 o'clock in Washington Hall, 46 Grand River ave., West. Edward N. Deibler, secretary, 478 Thirty-third st., Detroit, Mich.

THE FREETHOUGHT BADGE PIN

Dedicated to all honest men and women—to those who can and are willing to reason—who constitute the grand army of progressive thinkers throughout the world.

An Emblem of Freedom and Progress

Represents no lodge, order or society, but is designed as a token of recognition for progressive minds of every shade of thought.

All claiming to be free from superstition, all who base their belief upon science and reason, should wear this emblem to speed the grand work of emancipating humanity from the thralldom of mental darkness.

This is conceded by artists and the trade to be the most beautiful Badge ever designed. Being a practical jeweler and designer of emblems of every description, as well as an enthusiastic worker in the cause of human progress, Mr. Wettstein has succeeded in combining in this badge the great want of this age and the future. It represents the Burning Torch of Reason, the Rising Sun of Science and Freethought, beautifully enameled in brilliant colors in contrast with the Night and Darkness of Superstition, enameled in black, and symbolizes the evolution of the world from the Night of Superstition to the Day of Freethought, Science and Reason.

"A pin whose torch and golden sheen,
Would grace the breast of Sheba's queen;
And will lend grace in coming time
To queens of beauty more sublime."
(Impromptu by Eliazur Wright.)

As a token of recognition among Liberals of every shade of thought, either at home or abroad, it is especially valuable.

Made in two styles and by best workmen in the most artistic and substantial manner

Considering amount of gold and artistic workmanship in the badge, no other badges in the world are sold so cheap. They will last for generations to come and increase in popularity and value until fear and superstition exist no more.

ROLLED GOLD...$1.00

SOLID GOLD..... 2.50

Address, The Truth Seeker Co.
62 Vesey Street - New York

The proportion of Infidels to Christians in the various State Prisons is given, from the official figures, in the pamphlet entitled

RELIGION and ROGUERY

What Our Prison Statistics Reveal as to the Close Relations in Which They Stand, and Answering the Question, "Who Are the Worthless, the Criminal and the Degenerate?"

By FRANKLIN STEINER

Second Edition, Revised, Enlarged and Brought Up to Date.

"Go, number Israel, from Beer sheba even to Dan, and bring the number of them to me, that I may know it."—I. Chronicles xxi, 2

Price 10 cents per copy, 12 copies for $1

THE TRUTH SEEKER CO.
62 Vesey Street New York

IRWIN GRANICH will speak on "WILLIAM BLAKE" at the Ferrer Centre, 63 East 107th Street, New York, on Monday evening, May 21, at 8.30 o'clock. Admission, 10 cents.

THE TRUTHSEEKER

A Freethought and Agnostic Newspaper.

Vol. 44.—No. 21.

PUBLISHED
WEEKLY

New York, May 26, 1917.

62 VESEY
STREET

$3.00 Per Year

PERSONAL IMMORTALITY.

Other Side of the Theory That the Soul of Man Survives Death of the Body.

BY RICHARD ELLSWORTH.

ALL religions are based, more or less, upon the idea that man possesses an "immortal soul" which exists apart from his physical body; but none of these religions offers us any evidence of that fact. For the evidence we are referred back to certain mysterious incidents that are supposed to have happened many centuries ago, and no additional or contemporary evidence is accorded. It is generally acknowledged by religious writers that belief in immortality does not admit of demonstration, but that it should not, on that account, be excluded from a legitimate place in human thought. In fact, many Christian teachers of today hope to gain converts to their eschatological creed by declaring that human immortality is incapable of demonstration, that absolute logical justification upon such a subject is impossible and even inconceivable. The discussion, they say, must therefore move in another sphere. Men must moderate their intellectual expectations, and be prepared to act here, as they do elsewhere, upon differing degrees of moral consideration.

It may be due to this fact of the utter inability of religion to demonstrate the existence of a human soul and its perpetuity after death, that the great majority of Christians, for instance, exhibit such a vague, dim and uncertain idea of the future life, and take no active, vital interest in the matter one way or the other. The ordinary religionist seldom if ever allows considerations of his personal immortality and finally enduring state to enter into his life at all; he accepts them, yet never allows them to interfere with or influence his daily life and his actions in the slightest degree. He completely fails to see that the idea of continued survival—of a future life—and of his making here and now the conditions of that life, must here and now shape his life and mould his ideas. He never allows the thought to be truly felt by himself, or to influence his life in the least. On Sundays, it is true, he attends church—more as a kind of social function or duty than because any truly religious spirit stirs him to go: but throughout the week his religion influences him and his life not a particle; he is blankly indifferent to both. Such a man has, in fact, been living the life of the materialist while professing to be a spiritualist (in the broadest sense of the term), and yet all the while he takes it for granted that he "has" a soul, and that the fact is obvious and indisputable, and becomes highly offended if anyone, in the honest search for Truth, ventures to doubt that fact, upon what he considers good ground. This is one of the many idiosyncrasies of a religious belief.

Now the reason why so many of the people accept a future life is, so it seems to me, because they have never considered the scientific and philosophical objections to it—those reasons which, to the scientific mind, are stumbling blocks in the way of its acceptance. If it can be shown that consciousness cannot persist apart from brain activity and a nervous system, then materialism has won its case, and no other interpretation of the universe is rendered necessary or possible. Materialism asserts that consciousness is bound up with a material brain and that, apart from such a brain, there can be no consciousness. If it does so persist, where is the evidence for that fact? The matter, then, resolves itself into this inquiry: Is the universe at base material or is it what is popularly known as spiritual? This question lies at the root of all moral law, no less than philosophy and science, and is the most important question before the world today, without a doubt. Upon the answer to it rests all future religion, for apart from the necromantic exhibitions of psychic research, there is no evidence whatever that the soul exists after the death of the body.

The first scientific testimony to be brought forward against the doctrine of personal immortality is the now almost universally accepted fact of Evolution. This great scientific truth is held by many thoughtful persons to produce the most convincing evidence for our non-acceptance of any future life in any form; for it is the teaching of evolution that mental life is directly traceable to and is but the higher development of the mental life of the lower organisms, from which it has ascended by a gradual chain, a series of steps in the evolutionary process. And the mental life may be traced in a continuous, almost unbroken chain, down, down the scale to the very lowest animal forms—aye, even into the vegetable world; and the vegetable life may be traced, ultimately, into the inorganic world—to simple chemical reaction; so that the position of many scientific men is that there is no reason to suppose that our mental life continues to exist, and that we are entitled to immortality, than that all animal and vegetable life, and even chemical action, is entitled to immortality. In this connection Haeckel remarks that "the child's consciousness develops long after its first year, and grows as gradually as any other psychic function; like these, it is bound up with the normal anatomic and chemical condition of its organs." In any case, this fundamental fact is now empirically established that the phronema (the real organ of the soul) forms a definite part of the cortex of the brain, and that without it there can be no reason, no mental life, no thought, and no knowledge.

The idea of personal immortality is not supported by reflection and careful investigation of the facts, but by an apparent obstinate wilfulness—not by science, but by faith only. "Physiology," says Carl Vogt, "declares itself decidedly and categorically against individual immortality, as against all theories in general which include the special existence of a soul. The soul does not enter into the fetus as the evil spirit does into the possessed, but it is produced by the development of the brain, just the same as muscular activity is produced by the development of the muscles, or secretion is produced by a development of the glands. The psychical activities begin to develop after birth; but it is also after birth that the brain gradually attains the material structure peculiar to it. In the course of life the psychical activities undergo decided changes, and cease altogether with the death of the organ." There is no real proof, and none has ever been found, either in the practices of religion or the seances of modern spiritism, which should induce us to believe that the soul of a dead person lives on in one shape or in another.

All the twaddle about the intrusion of a higher or spiritual world into ours, or of the existence of departed spirits, has been found to be unmitigated nonsense. No dead man has ever yet returned to the earth. There are neither table-turning nor other spirits. "Science," says F. A. Lange, "knows but one kind of spirit, the human." All this admits of no doubt in the eyes of the scientist who has trained himself by observation and experience of Nature; constant contact with Nature and her laws has imparted to him a deep conviction that these laws admit of no exception whatever. No doubt the majority of people, that is to say the great multitude, think otherwise, for they are always inclined to give more credence to one fool than to the sayings of seven wise men. There is no help for them but education. "The greatest thinker of his age may in one hour's illness lose all his intelligence; in advanced age he enters a second childhood, as helpless and simple as the first. With the decay of the body decays also the reason, and with the last breath it expires, the same as a lamp does without oil, flickering feebly." This is exactly the reverse of what would happen if, as so many think, the spirit were a thing independent of the body, and the spiritual powers increased in proportion as the body drew nearer to its dissolution. It is obvious, then, from the operations of Nature as witnessed by the law of Evolution, that every part of the human personality is the subject of inception, growth and decay, as much the higher as the lower elements; and that any idea of bodily structure or composition that cannot be made to conform to this well-established law is imaginative and without any concordant reality. The medieval idea that an "immortal soul" was infused by God into the human body at a certain time in its fetal development is an absurdity of religion, and cannot for a moment be considered as having any basis in fact.

The second objection to the psychic theory, that man possesses an imperishable soul, is found in the fact that our mental life is, beyond a doubt, intimately bound up and associated with cerebral changes; i. e., those oft-recurring nervous changes that take place in the brain substance whenever we think. Among the individual parts of the brain the gray matter, or the peculiar seat of mental processes, is comparatively the richest in blood, for these processes require the most rapid metabolism (tissue construction) and the most intense oxidation. Hence every disturbance in this necessary interchange between the blood and the substance of the brain is at once attended with a disturbance of consciousness or other mental activities. Mix poison with the blood of any individual and note how quickly his mental life will become unbalanced—even cease altogether; while we know that, in many types of disease, these same phenomena of mental derangement occur. If the mind, as spiritualists contend, be a thing independent or self-existent, and controlling or utilizing matter, why is it so little able to defend itself against and repel these attacks? Why does it yield or succumb to the commingling of a few drops of blood with the substance of the brain, a sunstroke, a few inhalations of chloroform, a few glasses of wine, or a few drops of opium, prussic acid, or other poison?

All anthropology, the whole science of man, is one continued proof of the inseparability of the ideas of brain and mind. Let philosophical psychologists talk as they may about the autonomy of the human mind and its independence of its material substratum, their utterances will always appear as idle tales in the light of demonstrated facts. "Nature," it is said, "works with infinitely small atoms, and therefore can form a mechanical contrivance in a very small space which can play a million of the most varied tunes, which are exactly calculated for and fitted to a million wants that may possibly arise in the course of a man's life." If the believer contends that the mind or soul is too grand a product to be the result of the mere functioning of a bodily organ called the brain, what is his opinion of that marvelous force that surpasses all imagination, viz., that of the animal or human seed, which, "by a single organized cell of such minuteness that it can be seen only through a microscope, is able to control to a certain extent the whole of the physical and psychical life of that which has been begotten, by the aid of the forces or tendencies of motion communicated to it by the begetter. And what this one cell can do, why should not thousands of millions of other similar or cognate forms be also able to do, though in a different way, being connected together in the most wondrous union and composition." The word "mind" is in reality nothing more than a collective term and a comprehensive expression for the whole of the activities of the brain and its several parts or organs; and while "in the brain lies the temple of the highest that is of interest to us," it is not easy to see the overwhelming superiority of the product of cerebral activity over the result of the seminal cell, which issues in a complete human being as we see man in everyday life.

Another objection to the notion that the mind possesses a life independent of the body, and one which is highly convincing to many minds, is the fact that we can, by surgical operation, remove a certain portion of the brain-substance and with its removal will vanish a certain section or part of our mental life. Piece by piece, section by section, as the physical and obviously material brain is removed, so bit by bit, and little by little, the mental life disappears, until not a vestige of it remains. All this most certainly tends to show that our conscious existence is absolutely dependent upon our very material brain. What stronger proof of the connection between mind and brain can there exist than that of the anatomist's scalpel, cutting the mind away by piece-meal? It is well known that physical lesions or injuries of the brain often cause remarkable psychical effects. Men whose brains have become injured by a fall or as the result of a blow from a heavy instrument, have been known to exhibit marked changed conditions of mind and of character as a result of the infliction. Inflammation of the brain brings on delusions and insanity; effusion of blood on the brain causes stupefaction and complete unconsciousness, pressure on the brain occasions mental weakness, idiocy, etc. It is recorded in the proceedings of the Massachusetts Medical Society that a certain American, a blaster, had an iron rod driven through his head by a premature explosion while he was tamping. The rod destroyed a considerable portion of the left cerebral hemisphere. After a long illness he recovered, but his mind and character were so changed that his friends said of him that he was no longer his former self. The balance between his mental capacities and his animal propensities was destroyed. He left his employment and, having led the life of a vagrant, died twelve and a half years after the injury. This is by no means an uncommon case, and illustrates, as only facts can, the close intimacy that exists between the physical organ which we call brain, and the fruits of its healthful exercise which are known to us as thoughts and consciousness.

Finally, there is the objection that thought and cerebral changes are so inseparably united that the one cannot possibly exist without the other. For every thought we think, for every mood, emotion or fact of consciousness, there is, corresponding to it, a certain definite change in the brain tissue; and that that correspondence and correlation has now been established beyond doubt, there can be no question. We must accept it as a proved fact, whatever view we adopt of our mental life and the possibility of its persistence. This being the case, the materialist asks: "Since this equivalence and correlation is always present, what proof is there that mental states or so-called consciousness can exist apart from such cerebral changes? That is, when the brain ceases to exercise its functions, as it most certainly does at death, what proof is there that our mental life continues to exist; in fact, how can it, since, in this life, it is always bound up with and inseparable from these cerebral changes?" In fact the whole question can be resolved into this: When the brain ceases to exercise its functions, what evidence have we that the consciousness continues to exist? And if we have no such evidence, then the presumption is certainly all against our accepting such a thing as a future life of any sort; for, since there is no positive evidence that such is the case, and since consciousness cannot exist apart from the functioning of nerve-tissue, then the idea of a future life must remain an unproved dream, a figment of the imagination, which the man of logical thought must consequently reject. When the poet cries out against God.

"Thou hast fed one rose with dust of many men," which of us, in a scientific age, can help saying in his heart, "Yes, that is the truth?"

What has the believer in personal immortality to answer to these arguments? The reader should bear in mind that the treatment given to this subject by religionists today is very different from that made use of by Christian apologists of a century earlier. A distinction is now being made between proving the immortality of the soul as a fact of nature and proving it in such a sense that the proof will have a value for religion. We cannot prove the immortality of man, says the modern religious controversialist, in any sense in which immortality has a value for religion, by inductive reasoning upon data obtained by observation or experiment. The attempts of occultists and psychical researchers to furnish empirical evidence for "human survival" may be useful as calling our attention to obscure and interesting facts of psychology, but for the purpose of religious faith they must always remain worthless. We may say with equal confidence, adds the modern Christian believer, that no such proof, if we had one, would ever establish the conclusion we really want. What we want is to be assured that the life to come, for the man who has done his best here, is an ascending life, a life nearer to God. No demonstration, if one could be given, of the mere indestructibility of the human soul could bring us one step nearer to this conclusion. If we knew that our souls were indestructible, and knew no more, we should have no good reason to feel sure that our doom in the "world to come" might not be to grow continually duller of understanding, coarser and feebler in character, more and more insensible to beauty. Our immortality might prove to be a curse instead of a blessing.

It is plain from this reasoning that Christians of a devotional type turn away with scorn from any special proof of the mind's existence after death as given by the societies of pseudo-science known as organizations for Psychical Research. Christianity today offers no proof whatever for the dogma of personal immortality. The argument upon which it bases its hopes the writer of this article may consider at a later day.

As a matter of fact the church, while it requires its members to hold the belief in the doctrine of the life to come, does not require them to hold that any proof of its truth has ever been given or even that such a theoretical proof is possible. And herein lies the strength of the Rationalist's position. It is true, the Roman Catholic church, with its characteristic pretense at rationalism, has gone somewhat further; at the Fifth Lateran Council, under Leo X., the doctrine that the immortality of the soul can be known only by revelation was formally condemned, and Christian philosophers commanded to refute the arguments of those who held this position. But even the Roman church does not require its members to believe that immortality actually has been "proved by natural reason." The proposition that "human reason" tends to establish the immortality of the soul was condemned at the eighth sitting of the Council on November 11, 1513. It is open to the most orthodox neo-scholastic to hold that every attempted "proof" which has yet been put forward by divines or philosophers is fallacious, and even, apparently, that every future attempt at "proof" may be equally unsatisfactory.

Since religion has failed to prove the reality of the life after death, it is held by a certain type of experimenters that if it is proved at all it must be done by a phase of so-called science known as the Science of Psychical Research. In other words, the claim is made that if immortality is to be proved, the man of science—that is, the true scientist—must be met upon his own ground, and definite facts and evidence produced which will offset those advanced by the materialist—such as will definitely establish upon scientific grounds, the possibility of man's survival of bodily death; and this evidence can come only from such facts as will tend to show that consciousness does continue to exist after death—where most certainly there is no brain functioning for it to be associated with. If, therefore, these experimenters say, we can produce certain facts and evidence which seem to prove the operations of a consciousness actively at work, and most certainly not connected with any material brain, then we shall have the right kind of evidence to take before the materialist, and we can say to him: "Here is the evidence you seek; here are certain recorded facts that tend to show that consciousness can exist apart from brain-function, and consequently that immortality is not only possible, but certain and demonstrable."

The means adopted by psychical research for the realization of this interesting adventure are certain so-called supernormal mental states and conditions, such as trance-mediumship, clairvoyance, telepathy, dreams, apparitions, haunted houses and the like. Such phenomena as these, we are assured, when carefully studied, have supplied the investigators with an abundance of information and of facts which, while they bear out the spiritistic interpretation, certainly seem hard to reconcile with the materialistic hypothesis. All this sort of thing carries with it a peculiar interest and even delight for many credulous people; but the question to be answered amid this great array of phantasmagoria is, what are the grounds for believing in the existence of spirit or a spirit world? Where did the idea come from which enabled man to attach the word spirit to these supposed strange occurrences? It is perfectly plain that the man who thought he saw a spirit must have had the word with some idea of its meaning in his mind before the apparition showed itself, otherwise he never would have applied with such a readiness of thought a term to something which he had never seen before, and for which he could find no other word that would in any way accommodate itself to the fact save the theological expression "spirit."

Now, as a matter of fact, the word "spirit," which is spoken so glibly by a multitude of people the world over, has never been defined. It is impossible to find a man anywhere who can tell us even in a partial way the characteristic attribute of the object which this illusive word is supposed to connote. The obligation of proving the reality of spirit rests with those who believe in it, and not with those who find it impossible to form any mental concept on the basis of the word. When a person applies the term spirit or ghost to some vision of a diseased or highly imaginative mind, he is applying a term which cannot possibly mean to him anything of which he can form even a mental picture, for he himself does not know and he cannot find anyone else that knows what is meant by spirit, or spiritual life, or spiritual world. "It is clear," as Charles Bradlaugh says, "that there is no identity between life and soul; life commences, varies, and ceases, in accordance with the growth, decay, and dissolution of the body. The orthodox contention for the soul must be that its existence is independent of the body, and this shows that soul is not life. Nor is there any identity between mind and soul. All perception is dependent on the (bodily) perceptive ability and its exercise. All thought has some action of the bodily organism for its immediate antecedent and accompaniment. As the soul is not life, is not mind, and cannot be body, what is it? To call it spirit, and to leave the word spirit undefined, is to do nothing."

Owing to the fact that a few men of some prominence in this country and Europe have lent their names to a study of supposed spiritualistic phenomena, a fresh enthusiasm has been added to so-called spiritualism without in any reliable degree increasing the store of information on the subject which men possessed at the time the Fox sisters gained some notoriety for themselves by their performances at Hydesville, N. Y. Scores of books are published every year purporting to add some new facts to the subject while showing the unreasonableness and futility of much that had been formerly considered well authenticated; and still the whole subject, even from the standpoint of the writers of these books, remains today wrapped as securely in a veil of mystery and uncertainty as in the days of the witch of Endor. Every new "medium" that appears in any particular locality awakens at once a keen interest notwithstanding the fact that every medium that preceded her ended her career more or less discredited by those who admired and advertised her wondrous powers. It cannot be said that the extensive investigations of the Society for Psychical Research have settled any controverted point in this age-long discussion; nor will this ever be accomplished by men or by any organization, until men make known to the world the exact connotation of that much-used and much-abused word, "spirit."

The primary cause for all this nonsense about seances, spirits and mediums is that men are not sufficiently careful to ponder the wonderful operations of which matter is capable, or to reflect on the changes effected by it which are continually before their eyes. "Are the properties of a chemical compound less mysterious essentially because of the familiarity with which we handle them? Consider the seed dropped into the ground; it swells with germinating energy, bursts its integuments, sends upward a delicate shoot, which grows into a stem, putting forth in due season its leaves and flowers. And yet all these processes are operations of matter, for it is not thought necessary to assume an immaterial or spiritual plan which effects its purposes through the agency of the material structure which we observe. Surely there are here exhibited properties of matter wonderful enough to satisfy anyone of the powers that may be inherent in it." When men learn to appreciate duly the marvelous potentialities hidden in the quiet operations of the vegetable and lower animal kingdoms, they will find no need to resort to some supposititious spiritual force to explain the mental conditions of thought and consciousness; for they will readily perceive that these latter differ from the former, not because of a difference in origin and a future immortality, but simply because thought and consciousness are the highest and fairest blossoms of all terrestrial organization.

KEEPING A SABBATH HOLY.

The Minister Comes to Woo and Stays to Be Worsted in Debate.

BY ATWOOD MANVILLE
II.

The Rev. Mr. Jenkins called about 4:30, not greatly to Janet's surprise or distaste, and the conversation soon became very personal.

"Miss Wanston—Janet—you must have seen how much I admire you," ventured Mr. Jenkins, "You must know that of all the ladies I have met since I received my present call—and a clergyman is thrown chiefly with ladies—none has ever touched my heart as you have done. Is it too much to hope that such a feeling is reciprocated?"

Janet did not hesitate a minute, but launched right out, in a matter of fact way, to explain that she respected him immensely and that she could not tell but that respect might grow into something stronger, but that she could never marry a man, or even think of doing so, until she had discussed many intimate subjects seriously to see if their ideas were similar.

"Then you do not love me?" said the disconsolate lover.

"No," said Janet. "I have never been in love, and yet I do want to get married some time and have children; but after talks with Uncle Bob I determined that whenever a man asked me to marry him, I should find out first on what points we were going to differ most and then see if we could take the risk."

"Your uncle is a dangerous man and not a fit confidant for a young girl," preached the clergyman.

"Oh," said Janet, "I love Uncle Bob; he is so honest. Now you believe in discussing every subject until a conclusion is reached, don't you?"

"Why—er—yes, of course," said Mr. Jenkins.

"I knew you would. You could not expect a man to be a really true and good man unless he was willing to look facts in the face, could you? Now let's talk about what we really are. I am afraid I am not very good on theology and I suppose that you are very fond of it."

"My dear child" said Mr. Jenkins, taking her hand, "it is not theology but religion that matters."

"But Uncle Bob says that a person can live a moral life without religion," protested Janet, withdrawing her hand.

"It is possible, but more difficult. I think that when you have been removed from the heretical influence, you will come out all right. We all have our doubts at times, but the experience of the world has shown Christianity to be true."

"As you are a teacher of religion, I suppose you must be right," admitted Janet, but I have never known Uncle Bob to dodge any question and I want to hear you both debate religion before I decide."

"That is a strange test to which to put a lover, but I accept the challenge gladly and hope to prove my position. I am not one who thinks that the Bible is not to be criticised; it is God's word and can not be discredited," said Mr. Jenkins confidently.

Their conversation wandered to various topics and they were in such accord on everything that when 6:30 came they were surprised that it was so late. Mrs. Wanston was obliged to ask the reverend gentleman to stay and have supper with them, and he accepted. Sunday suppers were a delight to the whole family, and it made anyone feel intimate to be included; for the waitress and chambermaid both went out and the cook brought in the dishes and put them on the table so that the family could serve themselves.

The children were subdued by the presence of the rector, and Harry sullenly refused to answer when asked what sort of day he had had. Elsie said nothing either, but when the finger bowls were brought by Janet, the little girl dipped her finger in and crossed herself, much to her mother's mortification. Mr. Jenkins looked amused and Mrs. Wanston was obliged to explain that the servants must have taken Elsie to church sometime without her knowledge.

After supper, Mrs. Wanston asked the minister to conduct family prayers, and he expressed satisfaction that the custom had not entirely disappeared. He picked up the Bible and asked if anyone had any suggestion to make for the passage to be read. Sandford mentioned the thirty-eighth chapter of Genesis and the clergyman began, but stopped before finishing the second verse, saying that it was not suitable. "Then read the fourteenth chapter of Deuteronomy, beginning at the twenty-first verse," said Sandford. Mr. Jenkins scanned the verse carefully and, seeing nothing improper, read: "Ye shall not eat of anything that dieth of itself; thou shalt give it unto the stranger that is in thy gates, that he may eat it; or thou mayest sell it unto an alien: for thou art an holy people unto the Lord thy God."

The religious instruction over, Harry whispered loudly to his mother, "Let's play cards," and Mrs. Wanston had to explain that he meant the Bible game of cards, like "Authors." Janet said that it was not fair to bring most people into a game the family were accustomed to, but that with Mr. Jenkins it would be all right. She proved to be correct, for he was more successful than any of them, knowing the father-in-law of Moses and the difference between Rehoboam and Jeroboam, etc. Then Harry suggested that the one who answered the question most promptly should get the card. This made the game hilarious, for when the questioner read as far as "Who climbed" . . . Harry, or Elsie or Janet, or all of them would howl "Zaccheus." It was the first fun that Harry had enjoyed all day, but Mrs. Wanston soon sent both children to bed, and prepared to have a good talk with the minister. Sandford started to leave, but Janet detained him, saying that Mr. Jenkins wanted to have a debate on religion. None of the others could believe their ears until Mr. Jenkins confirmed the statement. It was agreed that each disputant should ask ten questions and that the other should answer as briefly as possible, and that the three listeners should be the judges.

SANDFORD. Is the Bible the word of God in a different sense from any other book?

JENKINS. Certainly.

SANDFORD. Presupposing that you do not believe the story of Jonah and the whale, nor, therefore, that all of the Bible is literally true, can you separate the passages that are literally true from the allegorical?

JENKINS. Not exactly.

SANDFORD. Then the truth of each passage must be determined by its probability and not be considered true merely because it is in the Bible?

JENKINS. The Bible is true as a whole. The church is to teach and the Bible to prove.

SANDFORD. Do you believe that God, or "the Lord," described in the Old Testament, with "hands," "shoulders," "back parts," etc., is a true description of the true God?

JENKINS. Jehovah embodies the best idea that men then had of a Divine Providence.

SANDFORD. Then man made God in his image, instead of God having created man in his image?

JENKINS. That is a quibble.

JANET. You have not answered, Mr. Jenkins.

JENKINS. The Old Testament must be read with sympathy. It can not be dissected and every word construed by itself.

SANDFORD. Who wrote the four gospels and when?

JENKINS. John Mark wrote the first gospel, and the others took much of their material from that and from other sources. Matthew and Luke may have been eye-witnesses, but John was not. None of the gospels was written before 63 A. D. and John's not until more than sixty years after the ascension.

SANDFORD. And you admit, I presume, that none of the historians who wrote during the years 25 to 35 A. D. such as Josephus, Tacitus, Pliny and thirty others, gave any account of Jesus' ministry?

JENKINS. An occasional mention, but no account. However, the four gospels are sufficient.

SANDFORD. How do you explain the difference in the genealogies of Christ as given in the first chapter of Matthew and the third chapter of Luke?

JENKINS. Some say that one of the genealogies is that of Mary.

SANDFORD. Are not Matthew and Luke the only evangelists who describe the virgin birth, and do they not both give the descent of Jesus from David through Joseph, his earthly father?

JENKINS. Yes.

MR. WANSTON. Only one more question, Bob.

SANDFORD. Which of these Christian doctrines do you believe: the virgin birth; miracles; atonement; resurrection; trinity, and ascension?

JENKINS. That is hardly a fair question. My personal belief and the creed of the church may differ on minor points, but the whole idea of redemption from sin by leading a religious life is certain.

JANET. But you have not answered.

JENKINS. Well, I think it quite likely that all of them may have been true. You must not take them too literally. What difference does it make provided we attain the desired end?

JANET. Do you not teach all those doctrines?

JENKINS. Yes, my church does.

JANET. And yet you do not believe them?

JENKINS. Ah—well—you see—

MR. WANSTON. It is your turn to ask questions now, Mr. Jenkins. You can give Sandford a bad quarter of an hour.

JENKINS. I am afraid it is a little late. I really think I must be going.

JANET. Good-night, Mr. Jenkins. I think we understand each other better.

A Doctor's View of a Public Disgrace.

At the beginning of my medical career I was in the habit of tasting all drugs and chemicals intended for internal use. I considered it my duty to know how the things tasted which I was going to administer to human beings. I saved my patients some horrible combinations which were in common vogue in those days—and still are now—but the result was not always pleasant for me. I remember I tasted some compound syrup of squills. I did not take enough to induce vomiting, but it kept me in a continuous state of nausea for about twenty-four hours. It was a nasty, sickening feeling, not painful, but worse than actual pain.

Well, I have been in a condition of mental nausea ever since that superblatant blatherskite, Billy Sunday, came to town. He is one of the worst blots on the country's escutcheon. He is one of America's worst disgraces, and we surely have many disgraceful things to answer for. If you think I am attaching undue importance to the Billy Sunday phenomenon, you are mistaken. It is a phenomenon of the most sinister significance. Of course there have been revivalists before, and every decade had its vulgar paranoiacs who were trying to debauch the people with their coarse brew of religious booze. But these vulgar blatherskites were not supported by the regular churches, they were not approved and advertised by the city and state officials, and were not paid visits by our elite citizens, by ex-presidents and billionaires.

And it fills one—at least it fills me—with unutterable sadness to see decent, well-meaning and usually sane citizens, such as William Jay Schiefelin and John D. Rockefeller, Jr., lend their moral and financial support to such a disgraceful phenomenon as Billy Sunday.

They tell me, the Sunday apologists, that he redeems a good many people from drink. I do not believe it. I do not believe that this redemption is more than temporary—lasting just as long as the attack of the induced hysteria lasts. But even if it were true, if the redemption from drink were permanent, I believe I would almost rather see people drunk on real booze than have them debauched with hysterical emotional booze, and have them frightened out of their meagre wits by the damnable lies of a hell which exists only in the coarse uncultured mind of a Billy Sunday and his like. Not only to permit but to encourage the public preaching of punishment by hell fire in the second decade of the twentieth century—to what lower depths can we descend?

Yes, the whole Billy Sunday phenomenon fills me with disgust, with nausea, with anger and with unutterable sadness. Is a world which approves of Billy Sunday worth saving, worth fighting for?

As to our newspapers and their lickspittle attitude towards Billy, the less said the better. My language might become really unprintable. Moneta non olet, and for money they will do anything. They will lynch or hang an innocent person, they will, at the behest of the financial powers, force a nation into a bloody war, and they will metamorphose an ignorant paranoiac clown into a magnetic orator.—WILLIAM J. ROBINSON, PH. D., M. D., Editor Critic and Guide.

The mistranslations and the interpolations in the Bible are not trivial things; men do not make counterfeits for centimes. In one chapter woman is said to have been made from the rib of Adam. The sense of the original is that woman was made from the female side of Adam. Nothing is said of a rib. Yet by that rib error woman has been degraded through the Christian era. In Mark xvi, 15, Jesus is represented as saying "Go ye into all the world and preach the gospel to every creature." This text is now known and admitted by all Christian scholars to be spurious; yet on that spurious text the whole missionary system is founded, foreign races are invaded by a gun-powder gospel and receive what the old crusader called "the curse of sweet Jesus."—M. D. Conway.

Thousands of people have died for false religions and in honor of false gods. The heroism did not prove the truth of the religion, but it did prove the sincerity of their convictions.—R. G. Ingersoll.

THE TRUTH SEEKER.

FOUNDED BY D. M. BENNETT, 1873
 CONTINUED BY E. M. MACDONALD, 1883-1909
 G. E. MACDONALD Editor
 L. K. WASHBURN Editorial Contributor
 Sixty-two Vesey Street, New York, N. Y.
 Post Office Box 1610.

SATURDAY - - - MAY 26, 1917

Does anyone ever speak of a good wolf, of a nice tiger, or a sweet rattlesnake? A church is known by its history, not by its professions. Judge Romanism by what it has done for the last thousand years, not by what it is forced to do today.

It is a crime to murder the mind as well as the body. Beat that notion into the heads of Roman Catholics, and an emancipation proclamation would not be needed to free the slaves of Rome, for every Roman Catholic is a person with a dead brain.

When we realize that what we read is mostly the opinions of the men or women who do the writing, we learn how little there is in the world that can be called authoritative. And there is another thing we learn, and that is that the past was the same as the present, without any higher authority than the opinions of men. The highest authority is now and ever has been the opinion of the man who knows the most.

Just where is this "right path" that religious persons say human beings have so far wandered from? Does it lead to anything better than the home? Which way does it go? The right path a hundred years ago may be the wrong path today, and the right path now may be grown up to vicious needs a century hence. Is there any everlastingly "right path"? If so, what is it and where is it? Religion, like everything else, goes a thousand ways, and perhaps has got outside the "right path."

An evening paper recently referred to the kaiser's "alleged partnership with the Deity" as "purely imaginary and monstrously absurd." Just so, and so is the cardinal's alleged partnership with God. And so is everybody's alleged partnership with deity. All purely imaginary. There is no such partnership anywhere by anybody. But the kaiser's claim is no more absurd than that of Cardinal O'Connell. Put that down, and speak and act accordingly. There is too much dealing with God with no results.

The term "Holy Writ" is applied to the Bible or any portion thereof; but we hold that it is time to act and speak according to our knowledge and not according to a superstitious faith. Nothing has ever been written by man that is holy in a secular sense, and nothing has ever been written by God, the Christian to the contrary notwithstanding. There is no word so abused as the word "holy." It is used to cover up too much of what is unholy. I always wish to go behind the word. What is termed "holy" by religion is generally afraid of the light of secularism.

If the Bible is the word of God, then God could say as silly things as man can say. God says in Exodus xx, 4: "Thou shalt not make unto thee any likeness of anything that is in heaven above," etc. Now, we would respectfully remark that that command is superfluous and foolish, for the reason that no one could think of doing such a thing. And the rest of the command is worse, if anything—"or that is in the water under the earth." Where is the water under the earth? You don't know. I don't know. I never heard of any water under the earth. God is just as ignorant as man, just as foolish as his maker.

Prayer.

I started out to find just where prayer was a help to man. I stopped first at the office of a physician, and I put the question to him plainly. I said: Doctor, did you get any benefit from prayer in the practice of your profession? He looked at me with a sort of "what are you giving us?" expression, and replied: Never. There was no chance for a discussion on the subject, so, with a button-up-your-coat-quickly act, I departed.

Next I went to a lawyer's office, and I said to the legal advocate: Pardon me, but do you find any assistance in your profession in prayer? He tipped back in his chair, crossed his legs and asked me rather a hard question for a man to answer without being well acquainted. It was this. Do you take me for a damned fool? I felt that I had received no encouragement in my quest, and I accordingly withdrew without saying anything that would disturb his peace of mind.

I then noticed an electrician at work putting up some wires and I ventured to address him. I said: May I inquire if you ever resort to prayer to help you when you are at work at your trade? He looked at me as though I belonged in a lunatic asylum, and said: How long do you think it would take a prayer to wire this building? I am not good at mathematics, but I scented danger near, so I hastily took myself to a safe distance from any possible shock.

I walked down the hill from the building where the electrician was at work, and saw a team standing in the street with a crowd of men and boys around it. The horse was sweating profusely, the driver was evidently angry and the situation generally was calculated to call for help. I thought to myself: Here is a chance to pursue my inquiry. So I got quite close to the angry driver, and after gaining his attention said to him in a gentle voice, but loud enough to be heard by the surrounding crowd: Have you tried prayer, my friend, to help in getting your load up the hill? I shall never forget his disgusted countenance as he looked at me and remarked: Go to hell. I quickly left the scene, somewhat disappointed in my attempt to learn if prayer helped man in any way. But I said to myself: Why do persons pray, if prayer is not answered, if praying does no good?

I resolved to call upon a clergyman, and get his views in the matter, so I went to the house of a popular preacher and made my business known to him. He looked at me for a moment to see if I was serious, and then said: It depends upon what you mean by prayer. Of course, you cannot get any physical help by praying for it. God is not a policeman, a day laborer, or a mechanic. Prayer will not get you a suit of clothes nor save you from starvation. The most that I can say to you is this: It helps a man to pray, but how much it helps depends upon yourself. I would not advise you to depend upon prayer to get a living.

But you depend upon it, I said.

This was enough to cure me. I came to the conclusion that there was no place on the earth for sincere prayer. L. K. W.

God and Evil.

Despite the fact that Germany, the most practical nation in Europe, had been making every preparation, and her people had taken upon themselves an immense burden of taxation in order to be ready for a bid for world domination, many persisted in maintaining that war could never come. It seemed incredible that a world in which the humanizing influences of popular education were making such progress, wherein men were so closely bound together by facilities of travel and the bonds of commerce and finance, could ever allow itself to be dissolved in the horrors of universal strife. People here acted as though peace was assured for all time, in the belief that the material progress of the world would inevitably tend to make a great catastrophe impossible.

And now that the catastrophe has come and men's hearts are failing them for fear, is it to be wondered that there is a cry that God has proven a delusion, that there can be no divine government in a world like ours, and that a calamity which threatens to engulf the civilization of centuries is a proof of the falsity of all that they have been taught?

Such is the case, stated as it may be supposed to present itself to the average man. To adopt a greater mildness of language, such as a partial believer might use, we may say that the god in whom man trusted has disappointed him. He expected God to be on the side of regular, steady progress, advanced by improved education, increasing knowledge, the spread of democratic institutions, the fostering of the amenities of life, better surroundings for the working classes, and a general understanding between nations by mutual intercourse. And suddenly, with only a few hours of warning, he found that all progress was arrested, the passions of a primitive age had broken out, with the greater fury because long restrained, and human society seemed to be plunging back to the chaos from which it appeared long ago to have emerged. Men trusted in a god of progress—one who would cooperate with them in the development of those conditions which make for the peace and happiness of mankind; but amid the welter of a world-war, which has outraged every human sense of truth and justice, in which there has not appeared the dimmest evidence of divine interposition, they declared that such a god could not exist.

To answer such people by saying that it is well that they should be reminded that the experience of mankind is against the presupposition that progress is steady and uniform, and that the facts of history are against such an idea, is only to give expression to what is manifestly a truism. The providence of God in history is in no way influenced by this fact. It is also perfectly true that material progress does not necessarily bring about a moral advance. There is no doubt that the conditions of life would be happier than they are if men were better; for then civilization would have a deeper meaning. The great test of progress, doubtless, is not so much mechanical or scientific discovery, as happiness resting on virtue. But allowing all this, is it just to the race to declare that, so far as we can see, humanity has failed in this respect, and that it will continue to fail unless it place its confidence thoroughly in God, and in everything be guided by his gracious will? We are all willing to grant that the war is after all the outbreak of a fire which has long been smouldering. Its horrors have in a terribly dramatic form brought home to the world the fact that the gravest imaginable moral evils exist. The ruthlessness which is its marked feature, together with the employment of every devilish cruelty science has placed within man's reach, only reveal how deep-rooted is our callous disregard for others in the pursuit of wealth whether by nations or individuals. Every thoughtful man is aware of the fact that, slow as is the advance in science, progress in morality is even slower. For the quest of goodness is longer and harder than the mastery of Nature.

Now all this is obvious enough, but at the same time man is getting tired of the obloquy which is constantly cast upon him by the pious religionist in order to exalt the moral purity and goodness of his deity.

It is a pertinent question to ask at this time what part in the evil of the world is played by the Jehovah—God of the Jews and the Christians. If God is all-wise, why does he not foresee and avert the evils which are afflicting the world? If he is all-loving, how can he see mankind, of which he has revealed himself to be the father, enduring such countless and, perhaps, unmerited, sufferings? If he is almighty, why does he permit such intolerable tyranny and cruelty as we see on every side? The answer to these and similar questions given by the religionist is always in the line of the ultimate vindication of God. If we do our part manfully, we are told, the final issue will be for the best. Doubtless this is true, not from any desire of man to vindicate the "inscrutable ways" of God, but because the best in man has forged its way to the ascendancy, and accomplished what an imaginary divinity was powerless to perform. The achievement of the best through human effort—which is the only power we see exercised today—will end, as it necessarily must, in the vindication of a righteous humanity and not in the vindication of a god of questionable morality.

Bishop Brent, episcopal bishop of the Philippines, in a sermon delivered before the British War Commission on Sunday, May 13, in the cathedral of St. John the Divine, New York, is reported to have made this statement: "War has come to us from God as a scourge to drive those to him who refused to come on his loving invitation."

Will anyone now longer question the part played by God in the evil doings of the world? The very thought of God's being responsible for the millions who have died upon that modern field of blood to accomplish no greater purpose than to drive men to him, is so staggering in the intensity of its immorality, that it is most amazing that any gentleman, not to speak of a Christian bishop, would dare to give expression to such a thought in the presence of a thoughtful and refined audience. The kaiser, now, is truly but the instrument of a kind and loving God, who was so lightly esteemed among the best of his children that he found it necessary to kill off several millions of them in order, perhaps, to recover the love of a few superstitious persons, and perhaps, here and there win a few new recruits. The apologies of the world are due to the kaiser and all his compatriots for their part in this cruel strife, for it has been now authenticated that it was God who was the instigator of all this cruelty and vandalism, and the emperor of Germany was only his faithful and obedient servant. Truly the "ways of God are past finding out."

Newspapers and Government.

American newspaperdom, generally called the Press, owes its development to cheap postage; and to the press, as much as to anything else, is due the fact that the percentage of illiteracy in America is small.

Because of the press, and the opinion and information it disseminates by means of the mails, nobody can fool all of the people all of the time.

The press, fostered by cheap postage, discourages sectionalism and gives us—

"One flag, one land, one heart, one hand,
One nation, evermore."

Cheap postage has created the circulation of periodicals, papers and magazines; it has been proposed by the Committee of Ways and Means at Washington to destroy the press and its circulation by dear postage. What the foresight of Congress has built up, Congress is asked to tear down.

The bill presented by the Ways and Means Committee would increase the cost of distributing periodicals through the mails from 100 to 600 per cent., according to the estimate of Mr. Don C. Seitz of the New York World, who spoke for the newspapers before the Senate Finance Committee last week. The new rates are more than prohibitive or confiscatory—they are annihilative.

The feature of the new measure is that it puts newspapers in the parcel post division and makes the publisher pay from 5 to 12 cents for the service he now gets for 1 cent.

THE TRUTH SEEKER, like other weekly papers of general circulation, would never have been begun under such conditions, nor is there much hope that it could be continued under them.

The newspaper men are not objecting to a tax based upon their property and earnings. Mr. Seitz, on behalf of the newspapers of New York, offered the government all of the profits of the publishers during the war in lieu of the rise in postal rates.

In defense of the extortion it is said that there are hundreds or thousands of sheets now enjoying second class postal rates that ought to suspend. That is true only if better papers take their place, because any paper is better than none, since it helps to preserve the habit of reading and thus in large or small degree stimulates and fertilizes the mind.

But the law will hit the best as hard as it hits the worst of the periodicals.

There are two ways of maintaining the state—one is by intelligence, which the newspapers foster; and the other is by force, by pretorianism, by means of an army with a priestly annex. For such a form of government as ours the newspapers are the mouthpieces. Better than the government can afford to hamper the circulation of the newspapers it might afford to buy or commandeer a column per week or month in every publication to state its cause and defend its acts. It has no other means of communicating with citizens.

Without the newspaper the carrier on the rural route would travel with an empty sack. Speaking of the relations of the postoffice to the pioneer, Ingersoll said (and his remarks apply to the farmer and all residents outside large cities):

"The postoffice is the only blessing he has. Every other visitor that comes from the general government wants taxes. The postoffice department is the only evidence we possess of national beneficence. It is the only thing that comes from the general government that has not a warrant, that does not intend to arrest us."

We have no other contact with the United States government, and no evidence that we have a general government, except through the postman, who hands us all that we ever get in the form of a benefit from the administration at Washington.

In some rural districts the carrier is known as "Uncle Sam." He represents the nation; and rather than diminish the number and frequency of his calls, as this law would do, the government would better carry newspapers at the lowest rates, at a loss, or even free.

The postoffice, singularly, is the only department that is expected to pay a profit, and yet it is the only one that to the people represents the beneficence of government!

Nothing could be more unwise, in a government that wants the people to be its friends, than to cut off communication with them through the carrier and the newspaper he brings.

What Are the Facts?

From the office of the Irish Worker, with which is incorporated the Harp and the Workers' Republic, Jim Larkin editor and manager, we receive the following letter, according to it the prominence it merits:

"TO THE EDITOR OF THE TRUTH SEEKER: The present war has been raging for nigh on three years, tremendous forces are being used on both sides. So far we are told over $20,000,000,000 have been expended, and for what very few of us seem to know. Many theories have been put forward as to the cause of this present tragedy, but none so ridiculous as that put forward by your contributor Sam Atkinson. In his lecture April 22d, 1917, delivered in Chicago, he states:

"When the Serbian Government had fifteen articles submitted to them, and but forty-eight hours to decide, they agreed within twenty-four hours to about fourteen, but asked for an extension of time for the fifteenth. The fifteenth article was introduced by the Roman Catholic church to further its power."

"He draws the inference that the non-acceptance of this fifteenth article by the Serbian Government was the cause of war being declared. Fancy anyone, especially a Free-thinker (?) putting forward such an idea in the twentieth century? As one who has been educated in the Roman Catholic church, it makes one smile to see and hear some of the Anti-Catholic piffle put forward by so-called Rationalist (?) lecturers. Men who get up and claim they know things, because they have read the sciences. Yet they tell you of the danger of the Roman church conquering America, this they talk of in an age where we have reached such a high stage of industrial development, where men like Morgan wield more power than a dozen Napoleons. If some of your lecturers, more especially Atkinson, would get that Anti-Catholic idea out of their head and replace it with some real sound educational stuff, then they might be of use to the people. But at the present time they are fooling themselves, and their auditors. A famous American President once said, 'You can fool all the people some of the time, you can fool some of the people all the time, but you cannot fool all the people all the time.'"

"I would like to know more about this fifteenth article, that is if my good friend Atkinson has no objections. It is the first time I have heard of this article, or set of articles, and I am always willing to learn, or be taught."

"Yours for freedom,

"JACK CARNEY, Associate Editor."

In Austria's ultimatum to Serbia there was a demand to which the Serbian government could not immediately accede. The gist of it was that Austrian courts should have jurisdiction in Serbia to prosecute Serbians who plotted against Austrian rule in that country. The demand would be paralleled if Great Britain should ask the United States to let her have and try Irish Home Rulers who are American citizens. Such a demand from England, acceded to, might insure the extradition and hanging of Mr. Larkin, editor of the Irish Worker, for being mixed up in the Dublin rising of last year.

We leave Mr. Atkinson to say what demand of Austria on Serbia he had in mind when he made the statement quoted by Mr. Carney. There was one that might have contributed to the precipitation of the war. In 1914, through some unknown pressure, the Roman Catholic church was established by a concordat in Serbia, whose population is ninety per cent. Greek Catholic or Orthodox. A few weeks after this imposition, which it is assumed Austria was in part responsible for, the Austrian archduke, visiting Serbia for the purpose of impressing the Serbian people with the fact that his country bossed them, was assassinated. A Washington paper named Religious Liberty argued itself to the conclusion that setting up Roman Catholicism in Orthodox Serbia caused the assassination, or the insurgency which led to it, and that therefore the Roman Catholic church caused the war. We republished his argument on April 22, 1914, with the comment that if it was sound "the misguided Serbian youth pulled the trigger, but the gun was loaded in Rome." It is possible that this thought was present in the mind of the Chicago lecturer whose address we printed on April 22 of this year.

The "set of articles" of which Mr. Carney has never heard were widely published at the time of the declaration of war. His freedom from apprehension about the fate of America at the hands of Rome is characteristic of the Catholic. No Catholic would worry any more over that than we should over the prospect of America's being secularized. In each case it is a consummation to be wished.

Remittances Invited.

We are sending bills to subscribers whose payments are in arrears. The hope is that those who receive the bills will immediately respond, because the amounts due are needed to keep THE TRUTH SEEKER going to them and to others.

Worsening trade conditions are now such that the business of the Truth Seeker Company is carried on at a loss, and week by week the disparity between receipts and expenses becomes more noticeable. Continuance depends upon due payment of subscriptions, which is more vital just now than ever before, owing to the increased cost of producing books and papers. The income must be kept up, or there will be nothing to do but suspend. The business is loaded to near the breaking-point, and relief can come only through subscriptions and sales, with possible gifts and gratuities from the financially able. Some have the agreeable habit of paying two years in advance. That helps. The practice could be extended to advantage. Some add a book order, which we can fill at a small profit; that is another way of aiding THE TRUTH SEEKER. Occasionally a few extra dollars are thrown in, to be used where they will do the most good. That is clear gain.

Delinquent subscribers who receive the bills we are mailing them are urgently requested to remit, and besides that they are invited to extend their subscriptions. Others, whose subscriptions have not yet expired, will save us the cost and embarrassment of asking them for money if they will come forward with their renewals unsolicited.

All readers are deputized as agents for procuring new subscribers. They can do the cause a good turn by increasing our circulation. By sending us the names of Freethinkers not on the list they will add to our obligation to them. If every friend of the paper will take thought how he can best contribute to its support and continuance, and then act accordingly, all the difficulties that occasion us worry would be overcome, and the problem how to turn delinquencies into receipts would be solved.

Think it over.

Some of our magistrates are of the opinion that men of military age convicted of offenses less serious than those for which they would be expelled from the army should have the choice of enlistment instead of jail. Could not the clerical delinquents among them be conscripted as chaplains?

LIFE, DEATH AND RELIGION.

Ideals Not Religious that Give Men Courage to Live and Die for Them.

BY ALFRED LOISY.

II.

Our war-apologists do not keep at this high level. They do not claim immortality as something due to the man who has consciously, sincerely and profoundly willed the good: the man who has, so to say, identified himself with it, so that it might seem that he ought to be associated forever with the fortune of his ideal, living forever if his ideal so lives, behind the frame of the visible world, in the world of invisible principles and causes, as an illimitable reality. From this point of view personal immortality seems so small a thing, and of so little consequence, that William James, like the great mystics of earlier times, smiles at the notion of "disinterestedness." Those who would now illumine for us the mystery of death are rather preoccupied with themselves. They tell us that the belief in immortality in the Catholic sense—that is to say, in the sense in which they choose to understand the Catholic teaching about the destiny of man—can alone prepare men for the fulfilment of their duties at the present time, when they have to expose their lives on the battle-field. A faith which thus adapts man to his actual needs would be its own vindication. Whence it follows—and our apologists press this upon us openly and insolently—that Catholics alone today know how to die.

Let us first repeat that they are themselves not very Catholic in their ideas. The church does not prove the immortality of the soul as they do. It asserts it on the ground of the revelation contained in the scriptures and interpreted by the apostolic tradition. This revelation, which looks to the eternal reward of the good and the eternal punishment of the wicked, declares that both will rise again in their flesh at the end of time. The belief in the resurrection of the body and the last judgment is based upon, and can only be based upon, revelation. It has nothing to say to Pragmatism, and our apologists are silent about it. But the church believes also in the immortality of the soul, and its theologians give us philosophic proof of this immortality by asserting that the soul is spiritual, and that this makes it indestructible in its personality; so, at least, they say. As regards the lot of the eternal soul and man, the justice of God, they tell us, does not allow us to suppose that the personality of the human being should disappear at death, seeing that in this life neither are the good rewarded nor the wicked punished. God reserves in his eternal world the rewards and punishments which they deserve. The fate of sinners is definitively settled at death; for them there is a hell. The perfectly just go straight to the presence of God. For the imperfectly just, and the sinners who have repented and are insufficiently purified, there is a temporary place of purification, where they may be comforted by the prayers and good works which the living faithful offer up to their intention. Their final salvation is just as assured as the damnation of sinners is unalterable.

These strong doctrines, which are alien to Pragmatism, are scarcely less agreeable to a religion of the drawing-room and the novel. Hence our self-appointed apologists adopt very little of them and leave a good deal aside. God and his absolute justice, hell and resurrection, are rather too heavy for their mental atmosphere, too lacking in subtlety for their imaginations. They need a less rigid and severe theology, a divine justice of a flexible character, an immortality which can easily be understood; because they will not seek to define precisely a pretty dream, the whole morality of which consists in the hope that he who accepts death will survive the grave—as if the essential, fundamental, honorable and true ground of sacrifice were not duty, and it could be inspired only by a feeling of self-interest—and in the sentimental idea of a ransom, a spiritual accountancy, which, for instance, allows a believing lover to offer his life (the life he has given to his country) as a sacrifice for the salvation of some unbelieving woman of whom during life he could not be the happy spouse; and the charitable actions of this woman, who has no belief, may be held to give comfort, in the eternal obscurity where he suffers, to the skeptical or materialistic husband who has taken his life in order to put an end to his sufferings.

He is a very generous man who can recognize the ancient Catholic faith in this pale, languid notion! Hardly the shadow of it remains. These men are playing with a vague idea—that the belief in a future life nerves us to perform our present duty—and a still vaguer sentiment—the wish to be useful even in death to those one loves. And in this way they imagine that they have put upon a solid foundation the teaching of the church—a church which rather speaks of an eternal heaven and hell, and of a Christ who will come at the end of time to judge the living and the dead. They have judiciously suppressed those disagreeable subjects, hell and irrevocable judgment, and they ground their fanciful theory upon a hope which is flattering to the desires; they talk of a sacrifice which is almost a society-game, while round about us thousands of men die and sacrifice themselves for good, in such sentiments that this colorless apology for a perverted belief becomes almost an indecent pleasantry both as regards the real faithful and the unbelievers.

For the true believer does not exactly sacrifice himself with a view of obtaining an eternal reward. He sacrifices himself, as good and honest men have done ever since there were such on the earth, from a sentiment of what appears to him to be his duty. True sacrifice excludes self-interest: a man is sacrificed, or devotes himself, to a general and collective interest. This voluntary sacrifice presupposes the more or less conscious feeling of an obligation toward the community which profits by it. This kind of sacrifice, instead of looking for rewards, implies personal disinterestedness; the hope it embodies does not concern the man himself, but the public good, the advantage of the community for whose sake he sacrifices himself. It is palpably absurd to speak of a sacrifice which is directly interested, since personal sacrifice must be incompatible with personal interest; otherwise there would be, not a sacrifice, but a bargain.

In reality death has but one meaning, a perfectly clear meaning; it is an end. Death is the cessation of life, and of itself it wins no prize. It means a loss, often a lamentable and profound loss, when it passes like a scythe among young men in the flower of their age who might have become parents. Death, as such, being only destruction, serves no purpose and produces nothing. The real sacrifice, the true sacred action, is not in the death, but in the devotion. It is the generous devotion with which a man exposes his life that is effective and fruitful. It is for his country that he gives it, or consecrates his life to the extent of exposing it.

What is the good of lowering this simple and real devotion, which we witness every day, to the level of a petty spiritual bargain, which, to take the most lenient view of it, amounts to no more than a very special form of devotion, not the common faith and practice of the Catholic church? For it is the novelist, not the church, who thus represents death, in order to make it, in defiance of good feeling, a sort of voluntary immolation which might be applied like an indulgence, according to the dying person's intention, to the subject he chooses.

It is clear enough that the majority of our people do not require us to explain a mystery which, to their minds, does not exist. They know well who appeals to their devotion and for whom they offer it. They have a sounder and more solid idea of life and death than this bastard representation of the old faith. They employ their lives, and they expose them, in order to preserve the liberty and the tradition of their country, the future of their homes and fatherland. They do not sacrifice themselves for material interests or personal interests. Interest might very well calculate; and it would not be impossible to devise ways of saving the material interests, without the honor, the traditions and the soul of their country. In a national war men do not die for personal interests, for the first interest of each would be to save his own head. The world is nothing to the man who loses his life, says the gospel. Here it is that the saying is truly fulfilled: "He who loseth his life gaineth it, and whosoever gaineth it loseth it," precisely because there is here question of something more than interest. The ideal is lost when life is saved out of regard for one's personal preservation; life lost for the ideal is saved when the ideal is safe; and the ideal is safe when the country which guards it is saved.

But we have still something to say about the supposed power of the Catholic belief in immortality to be alone capable of spurring a man to duty and sacrifice.

In the first place any person has a right to ask if devotion to the common weal was born with Christianity; if antiquity has not furnished some noble examples of it, which may not have been inspired by the Christian faith. It is a historical fact that this devotion has arisen, and has grown larger and deeper, with the development of civilization itself, which has been maintained by it. In all ages and climes, individuals have exposed their lives for the common good, and the zeal with which they did so did not depend, as a rule, upon the importance which they attached to belief in a world beyond the grave. This belief was, in many civilizations, very vague, and we may say that at no time, not even in a Christian community, did it ever succeed in making death, in practice, a desirable thing. How many Catholics are there today who are relieved of all fear of death, and made eager for its approach, by their belief in immortality? Is it not true that, as a rule, men meet death without thinking much about it? During life they are constantly exposed involuntarily to it. Is it not true that many have, in all ages, risked their lives in some impulse of natural zeal and courage that needed no sustenance from any hope of eternity? And is it not true that the others, those whose courage is based upon reflection, risk their lives out of some feeling of moral necessity, and, as they put it, in order to do their duty, without any further thought? Our modern apologists forget that, if the gospel is believed, Jesus himself, at Gethsemane, overcame the fear of death, not by reflection upon his own future glory, but by thinking of the will of God. There is no place here for immortality, except as a by no means indispensable source of encouragement. A man may die, and die very nobly, with a different philosophy of life, or without any philosophy at all of the beyond.

No one will question that the believer has found strength, and even finds it today, in his faith in immortality. But as the strength comes of the faith, not so much of the particular belief in immortality, a different faith might give the same strength to a man who did not believe in immortality. Men have always needed faith, and have always been sustained by the faith which their need inspired; which did not prevent them from gradually abandoning the forms and symbols of faith which the development of their experience and their reason did not suffer them to retain. The savage believes in magic as long as no one shows him the futility of it. The polytheist believes in his gods until he discovers their emptiness. The ideas of men as to what lies beyond death have been just as varied and contradictory as their ideas as to the nature of things. We know how the Catholic system of eternal hopes was built up, and that its history is far from being a proof of its truth. It can no longer be of any moral value to the man who can no longer see in it anything but a poem of death: a poem more elaborate and detailed, but not more certain, than that of other religions which Christianity regards as false.

It was neither from actual experience nor from a supernatural revelation that man first got the idea that he survives the grave. It was because the very nature and feebleness of his mind did not permit him to think that his companions had ceased to exist, nor to imagine in his own mind that he could cease to exist. The dead who were forgotten existed no longer: the dead who were borne in mind could not be thought annihilated. What had become of them was a matter of timid conjecture, for it was thought that they had gone against their will, in virtue of some evil spell. They were believed to be angry and dangerous. Funeral rites are in their origin precautions taken against the dead, to prevent them from doing harm to the living, rather than tender attentions to beloved relatives. In this stage the idea of survival had no element of consolation; it was rather depressing and demoralizing.

But man did not remain in this stage. The men who had been, while they lived, stronger than their fellows, those who had been chiefs or wizards, possessed of special powers, were believed still to be the more active beyond the grave. Their shades had to be appeased, since they were abler than the others to do evil or good. It was a very widespread belief that the dead had some share in the work of nature: in the regulation of the rain, the rebirth of vegetation, the procreation of animals and men. They were therefore associated with the spirits of nature, and indeed so closely that it is often difficult for the historian to disentangle them. But in what form did they persist? No one asked, and it was especially this which enabled men to believe that they did persist. They were not men of flesh and blood, because it was known that their bodies had fallen into corruption. They must be thin shades, something like fugitive breaths. One could not understand what it was, but it was they.

Greek speculation decided that they were spirits or souls, the temporary inhabitants of a material body, where they were, so to say, incarcerated until the hand of death set them free. Death affected only the body. These daughters of heaven might live on in the world of the gods. Those especially had most hope of entering this happy world who had known the redeeming initiations founded by the deities of the mysteries—the ancient gods of vegetation and rebirth. For, since these gods had themselves endured death and triumphed over it, they would generously admit their devotees to their happiness. It was a system of grace and redemption, and under its influence the belief in the immortality of the individual gained strength. Dionysos and the goddesses of Eleusis assure their clients of eternal bliss; so, at a later date, would Cybele, the great mother of Phrygia, Isis of Egypt, and the Persian Mithra. No one asked evidence of this belief. People believed it for the sake of the consolation it afforded.

A contribution by Alfred Loisy, Modernist, to "Talks of Noncombatants on the War" (Entretiens des non-combattants durant la guerre). Translated for THE TRUTH SEEKER by Joseph McCabe.

It is a curious fact, and one which in some measure tells against the supposed impossibility of meeting duty without a belief in immortality, that the prophets and sacred books of the Jews, regarding the cult of the dead as an injury to God, do not give the least place in their teaching to this eternal hope. They, it is true, proclaim that God is just, rigorously just; that he never fails to reward the good in this world and punish the wicked. This religious position can be held only while a people is happy, and, since there is hardly any happy people, and the Jewish people was more unhappy than others, it itself altered the faith which its reformers had sought to impose upon it. They had foretold that God would rule over a just Israel and protect it against its enemies. The Jews themselves, probably finding inspiration in Persian beliefs, declared in the pseudonymous "Daniel," during the reign of Antiochus Epiphanes, that the Kingdom of God would come, and that the righteous dead would rise again and remain forever on the earth with the righteous living.

The Kingdom of God came not, nor was there a resurrection; but men did not cease to believe, and during the period of growing effervescence which stretches from the year of the death of Herod (4 B. C.) to the great rebellion and destruction of Jerusalem in the year 70, the hope of the Jews found new prophets. Jesus of Nazareth was one of these. He also declared that the Kingdom of God was at hand, that men were about to be judged, that the just would rise again. Prince designate of the kingdom of the elect, he was condemned by Pilate as an aspirant to royal power in Judea. He died, and his disciples declared that he was the first to rise again, and that he would come back to preside at the general resurrection and the reign of justice which he had foretold. His followers made proselytes. New missionaries, of whom the most famous was Paul of Tarsus, expounded their hope to pagans as well as Jews, representing the dead and risen Christ as the intermediary of universal salvation, the Savior, by faith and communion in whom men entered into eternal happiness.

Thus the hope of the Jews encountered the hope of the pagan mysteries, and the two gradually intermingled to such an extent that the Greek hope fills the space left empty by the prospect—which slowly becomes more and more remote—of the Jewish hope, with its general judgment and resurrection of the dead. Christianity was established. It drew its sustenance from this combination of the prophetic belief in a reign of justice, the Jewish belief in the resurrection of the dead, the Hellenic belief in the immortality of the soul; and the imagination of Christians for ages has worked upon this synthesis.

We see clearly how this faith was built up and maintained and what purpose it served. But it is also enough to look at its history to see that it rests upon a foundation quite different from experience and reason. It depends on nothing but itself, if one may venture to say so; it is suspended in the air, and is maintained solely by the hold it has upon the faithful. From beginning to end—from that idea of survival which disturbs rather than comforts the former companions of the dead, amongst uncivilized peoples, down to the idea of a divine felicity in which the Christian finds hope during days of trial and consolation for the loss of his dear ones—it is impossible for the historian, with the aid of the psychologist and the philosopher, to find in it anything more than a dream and an ideal which time has elaborated.

It is easy to say that this belief fits man to meet life and duty, and that therefore the practical truth gives a presumption in favor of the absolute truth. Besides the reserves we have already made—that the faith in question is not the essential reason of the devotion, and that its relative usefulness may be set off by other matters, as has been the case always with non-Christian peoples and individuals—we may now add that this usefulness does not exist except in virtue of a faith which by no means recommends itself to any who examine it closely and discusses it without prejudice. [Continued.]

God and My Neighbors.

The story of Uzzah's slaughter by Jehovah, when the man innocently and probably involuntarily put forth his hand to keep the ark from being upset and so touched the holy box in which the god was being carried (1 Chron. xiii), was serviceable in upholding a monopoly. Levites, a numerous body of parasites, claimed a monopoly of ark-handling. The story of Uzzah was worth money to them. Uzzah, a non-Levite, touched the holy box, and see what happened to him!

Conservatives are fond of asserting that existing customs and conditions are deserving of respect as they represent the results of the experience of many generations, that under the laws of evolution such customs and conditions represent the survival of the fittest.

But one who makes such a claim for customs and conditions in America would be likely to condemn those of a quite different civilization, China, for example. Yet the Chinese have had plenty of experience. And the Chinese have carried conservatism to an extreme.

No; it is not true that whatever is, is right. Everywhere are interests based on the established. These work strongly to perpetuate existing conditions, without regard to rightness or wrongness.

In his novel, "Tono-Bungay," H. G. Wells represents one of his characters as having made a great discovery, namely, that there is practically no Mrs. Grundy, that the real trouble is caused by Mr. Grundy, and that Mrs. Grundy is a quite inoffensive person. It is Mr. Grundy that smells out all the naughtiness. He tells Mrs. Grundy that things are shocking and she's shocked, pink and breathless. Then she—a rake at heart—goes about trying to conceal her profound sense of guilt behind a haughty expression.

And Wells's character finds that Mr. Grundy is in our blood, in yours and mine.

In the local daily are what are called "some telling shots" from the Rev. Billy.

"The woman who scrubs your floors, if she is a Christian, is a better woman than you are, if you are not a Christian." Not necessarily so, Bill.

"It is foolish to gallop a mile or two to get a hug or two." You know, Bill, that it is harder for an ordinary cuss to get a hug than for the preachers.

"There'll be no hypocrites in heaven; so, if you don't want to associate in future with the people you detest, come into the church now." Do you mean, Bill, that if one comes right into the church and associates with the hypocrites there, he won't have to go cheek by jowl with 'em in the Sweet Bimeby?

"If Christ's coming were delayed until all Boston was converted, he might not get here for 100,000,000 years." He probably won't get here nearly as soon as that, Bill.

Abe Martin in the Indianapolis News says: "If there's anything mean in a feller, a little authority'll bring it out."

It is reported that some very refined ladies of the dry sort are inexpressibly shocked by the nudity of the goddess of liberty on the new quarters and suggest that Uncle Sam put more clothes on that young woman right away.

A Roman Catholic lady lately deceased takes no chances, but fixes things so that she'll not have to stay long in purgatory, maybe'll only have a peep at it. She leaves $500 to one of the holy fathers for masses.

So much depends upon one's point of view! 'Tis a Sunday in July. Norah and I think we have spent it pleasantly, profitably and worthily. We did our regular morning's work, then I read and wrote a bit while Norah swept and dusted. Then I went out to mow weeds; Norah sat down to read. Later she came out and invited me to help her do a little hoeing. After this was done, she went in to get the dinner while I mowed some more weeds. After dinner more reading and writing, followed by more hoeing. Then we rested while she read and I wrote. Now the Jerseys are milked, the animals and we have had supper, and for us there is more reading and writing before sleep ends the day.

Pete and Prudence Alice had company, and spent the day in a way highly respectable, not to say godly. After breakfast Pete and one of his guests drove into town for ice. Then they made ice-cream, and had a most delightful time eating it. Pete takes his guests around to look at his crops and his work, for he is a good farmer and a mechanical genius as well. The guests are city people who are politely interested in the crops, but the ice-cream touches their souls. They pass the day resting, talking, eating. Their talk might seem trivial to you and me. Probably ours would bore them heavily. Pete is a man of action. To sit around and read does not attract him, though he once read an Alger book. But Pete is an all 'round good fellow, and when things break down for me he can always, and does, fix them up. And he is just as well satisfied with his way of spending Sunday as am I with mine, for we are both confirmed egotists.

Our young people need to be taught to respect the rights of the minority. Their attention should be called to the immorality and suicidal folly of punishing one concerning matters which are solely his own business.

In our recent wet-and-dry contest men did not hesitate to injure those of the opposite side by the use of the boycott. And it is a significant fact that when I talk with a dry man he condemns the use of the boycott by the wets but has seemingly no objection to its use by his own faction.

Mrs. V. deplors the fact that Sunday laws oppress her sect, that the stronger Christian sects do not treat her chosen one well. But what would her sect do, were it strong in wealth and numbers?

I discuss with a bright young man, a high school senior, a measure that to me seems most unjust to non-Christian and Roman Catholic students. Says he, "But this is a Christian country. We are ruled by the majority." And when I present a plea for the rights of the minority, he says, "That certainly sounds reasonable and fair, but I never heard anyone talk like that before."

One of our citizens has a grand and worthy thought: Tear down the churches. Build one large building with auditorium, dance hall, reading rooms, theater, gymnasium, etc. Have all kinds of good lectures, concerts, plays, etc. Here would be education, recreation, uplift.

But this man's pilgrimage is earthward, and he is a thinker. Most, especially women, hate to be put to the trouble of thinking. Men exhaust themselves thinking how to manage to keep the pot a-boiling. Women amuse themselves with feeling. Thinking is a bore.

It seems to me sometimes that so-called religion appeals especially to the meanest people, to those who are not very sharp mentally and who want to get something for nothing. This is not true as regards all the religious, but I find so many of the religious belonging to this class that I prefer to deal with those who are not overly religious.

ROBINSON CRUSOE.

Salvation Army Trade.

The Salvation Army is willing to be known as a charitable organization, but it is not and does not profess to be when telling the truth about itself. It is religious and commercial, and has no philanthropic purpose. A writer in Pearson's Magazine for June says:

Of course you have seen Salvation Army wagons on the streets. An elderly gentleman usually occupies the driver's seat. The horse moves on slowly and solemnly as if to the air of a very slow litany. The wagon is loaded with papers and books, with pieces of old furniture, and with bundles of clothing. The wagon proceeds from door to door. The horse stops. The old gentleman descends from his seat, rings the bell of the house and asks:

"Any old things for the Salvation Army?"

You have heard a good deal of the Salvation Army, and so you don't hesitate to turn over some things you cannot use to the wagon. The elderly gentleman in Salvation uniform takes everything he can get hold of. You, of course, think that the magazines are sent to hospitals to be read by the poor lonesome patients, that the clothes are distributed among the needy, and the furniture given to some wretched families who have no beds to sleep on or to others whose hard-hearted landlord deprived them of chairs and tables. Let us take a walk to one of the many industrial homes of the Salvation Army when the wagons come in, and the things are assorted and assigned to the different departments, and you will see what a gross mistake you made by assuming that your gifts are given away. They go to the needy all right, perhaps to the neediest of the needy, but for cash exclusively and no credit is granted.

Books and magazines are turned over at once to the book department, which conducts a book store on Fourteenth Street near Union Square, not in the name of the Salvation Army, but in the name of the Reliance Book Store. Its employees are experienced booksellers who do not wear the Salvation uniform. In fact, every possible indication that that store belongs to the Salvation Army is carefully concealed. Magazines are here sold wholesale to other dealers or retail to you or to me or to anybody. The magazines given to the Salvation Army by charitable people are sold for from five to fifteen cents each. A very well-equipped rare book department attracts collectors from all over the city; "Book Prices Current" is the guide for the sales prices. School books are sold in great quantities. I believe the profit of this shop to be far greater than of any other book shop in the city, as its proprietors do not need to pay for the books they are selling.

There seems to be a good deal of hypocrisy in concealing the fact that the Salvation Army owns the Reliance Book Store. Why not put a sign out that would tell everyone that the books and magazines sold have been received as gifts for the poor and sick by the Salvation Army.

The so-called industrial homes sustain furniture factories where skilled labor is employed to rejuvenate furniture collected by the wagons. Antique furniture dealers have the pick of the really valuable things and hundreds of dollars are often paid for something which has been carted away as junk by the Salvation Army's ragman.

The "Salvation Army Department Store," a sort of a systematized and orderly looking junk shop, contains and displays everything to fit out men and women from head to foot. The things are scrupulously clean but sold at far higher prices than in the shops of our friends on Baxter street.

The buyers who come here are mostly people recently picked up by the Salvation Army and employed in some of their shops. They are not treated with the courtesy due to a customer but with the brutality of a charity worker.

It will not be out of place to interject here a few words about the methods employed by the Salvation Army in recruiting its shopmen. They are unfortunate people out of work without a home, down-and-out in spirit, perhaps just released from hospital or prison. They receive some food, a bed remembered with a shudder in years to come and they receive a few pennies for work which represents many dollars to the Army. Mental and physical constraint is constantly exercised over them. The discipline of a Salvation Army Industrial Home is very similar to the prison rules of twenty-five years ago. All these broken down men to whom the Salvation Army "grants a temporary home" were originally promised regular work and employment through friends of the army. Naturally it is in the interest of the Army to keep them as long as possible, especially if they happen to be good workmen and only such men are really welcomed with open arms. They will not receive the promised employment as long the Army can possibly keep them in its own shops. To quit the "home" is synonymous with an escape from prison and usually they are worse off if they quit the Salvation Army than before they went in. The few cents they earned they were compelled to spend in small purchases in the Salvation Army Department Store. Thus the Salvation Army robs unfortunate men and women of the last shred of their faith in humanity.

War As It Is.

The powers that be have issued innumerable warnings that we are on the verge of a food famine. The destruction of shipping, and the diversion of labor from the work of agriculture to that of manufacturing material for war has involved of necessity a shortage of food, and may end in acute want. And there are prophecies that the food supply may be the ultimate factor in the settlement of the war. If Germany can force starvation on the Allies before the Allies can force starvation on Germany, then terms acceptable to the Central Powers may be arranged. If the reverse, then the Allies may be able to force upon Germany and her Allies whatever terms are thought advisable. To such a pass has this business of "glorious war" come. The course of events have stripped war of its last semblance of greatness, and shown it to be the barbarous, brutal, even cowardly thing it really is. Victory may be determined by the starvation of old men and infants, women and children. For, make no mistake, if starvation be the decisive and deciding factor, it is these who will suffer first and most. So long as food can be obtained, it will be supplied to the fighting men first. The fitness of the fighting line must be maintained at all costs. And it requires little insight to perceive that in this attempted all-round food blockade it is by the starvation of the old and the young, the weak and the sick, that an issue is sought. So much for the chivalry of modern war, stripped of its false glamor and meretricious glitter.—London Freethinker.

NOTES AT LARGE.

The clergy are already busy working for the exemption of their class, ordained and unordained, from military duty in any capacity except that of chaplain. The lay citizen may be slow in volunteering, but there will be no vacancies on the roster of chaplains. We do not imagine that the "Holy Joes" are much in favor with army and navy officers. The controversy between the late General Funston and a Texas Baptist minister who wanted to save the souls of his men was enlightening. The officers of the Civil War were besieged to give places to parsons. In 1895 Harper's Weekly printed one of Gen. W. T. Sherman's letters on the chaplain question. The general wrote to a man who was trying to work a brother into a place:

"My Dear Sir: Yours of July 24 is received, and if your brother, the Rev...., of Illinois, will make this application to the secretary of war for a chaplaincy in the army, and send me his papers, I will indorse and lay them before the secretary for the action of the President, who alone always makes these appointments.

"I never give original letters to the President or secretary of war, because it would be wrong for me to do so, as they might refer several applicants to me for selection, and I would seem to be committed to the one holding my letter. I think there are several hundred applicants now, each one of whom is stronger in the faith than St. Paul, and most of whom, before appointment, are anxious to be martyrs; but once appointed and confirmed they object to our frontier posts because they are ill-adapted to raising a large family of small children.

"Of course the whole system is now a farce and meant to be so. If Congress wanted the army to have the influence of religion, it would allow the commanding officer of each post remote from civilization to hire and pay for a minister while employed, like surgeons. Of such posts there are nearly a hundred, whereas the chaplains are limited to thirty, say half of whom are sick, or don't like the isolation of Texas, Arizona, etc. Of course there are no vacancies now, and they are gobbled up as soon as the telegraph announces a death—there are no resignations—and so greedy are the applicants that they will not even wait for the funeral.

"If your brother wants to join in this scramble to become a martyr, let him send me his papers, and I will see they are filed; and then let him have some senator or member of Congress to rush to the President the moment he learns a chaplain is 'in extremis.' Very truly yours,

"W. T. SHERMAN."

When General Sherman wrote (his letter is undated in the reprint), there were but thirty chaplains. Now there are three times that number in army and navy, and of course they will be multiplied as the forces are enlarged. The pay and rank have also been advanced until now those who have been a few years in the service have the rank equal to, say, that of a major in the army or commander in the navy, with pay and pension raised accordingly. They are sometimes accorded such lengthened leave of absence that they may at the same time live at home and fill a local pulpit. One situation mentioned by General Sherman has not changed—"the whole system is now a farce and meant to be so." In the interest, possibly, of reform, President Taft made a ruling that any candidate for a chaplaincy must be recommended by a church of his denomination—thus establishing a religious test expressly forbidden by the Constitution of the United States; but it is still a scramble. Chaplains ought to be admitted to the army and navy only on certain conditions. First, there should be a demand for them by the enlisted men or crews of warships; second, no rank or pay should be given them by the government; third, the churches (untaxed) who recommend them should pay their salaries, as they provide for other missionaries.

The question is often asked, "In what way is scientific research more certain than religious divination?" The correctness of the latter can be proved only by results; and so far as human judgment goes, which is the only standard we can rely on, it has often proved to be entirely wrong—entirely wrong in ethics, in hygiene, and as a producer and insurer of human happiness (the only goal most men care to aim at). Science, on the other hand, proceeds from one proved fact to another. It often makes mistakes, but it is humbly ready to correct its errors, and the volume of truth as an outcome of scientific research increases at the rate of compound interest. Everything is based, of course, on the test of the human senses—the only moderately certain test that we can go by. Chief of all these senses for finding out the secrets of the Universe is the sight; hearing, smelling, tasting, feeling can be applied only to the things of this world. By means of our optic nerves, applied to ever more and more perfected human instruments, we can magnify the planets and the moon, find new satellites, weigh the sun, determine the chemical composition of the stars and nebulae, and time the passage of light.

These marvelous researches of the human eye, so far, though they have sounded the depths of the Universe, have found no God. We may adopt all sorts of plausible arguments from the new facts known to us; we may reason from one earthly analogy to another. All these guesses are permissible; all these theories should not be refused publication. But they should oppress no one, and bind no intelligence which they cannot convince. Religion, as the conception of a heavenly being, or heavenly beings, hovering above the earth and concerning themselves greatly with the affairs of Man, has been abolished for all thoughtful and educated people by the discoveries of Science. Perhaps, however, we should not say "abolished," as being too final; we should prefer to say that such theories have been put entirely in the background as unimportant compared with the awful problems which affect the welfare and progress of humanity on this planet. Religion must, as Cotter Morison said in 1887, henceforth take a new form: it must be the Service of Man; not the acclaiming, the adulation, the beseeching of a God of whom, from a positive point of view, we know absolutely nothing: a God that originated first as a tribal deity of a predatory desert tribe, and then, through the purer-minded Jews of the centuries immediately preceding the Christian era, expanded into the sole ruler of the Universe; but a Universe consisting entirely of an earth domed by a solid firmament and served by sun and moon. The work of Science has revealed a new heavens and a new earth wholly undreamed of in the religion of yesterday, and this is why scientific research is more certain than religious divination, and why the religion of the past is now but an interesting memory.

Our distinguished visitor, Mr. Joseph McCabe, sees New York as it is so far as organized Freethought, or other show of interest in Freethought, is concerned. Writing "Under the Stars and Stripes" in the Literary Guide (London), he says:

"Yet America is, at first glance, one of the most disappointing of great civilizations from the Rationalist point of view. There is, I believe, no Rationalist society in New York. A tiny body with some shade of liberal title works in obscurity and impecuniosity. THE TRUTH SEEKER issues weekly from the sombre room in Vesey street, where, flanked by vendors of cheap fruit and vegetables, Mr. Macdonald prepares his counterblast to the thousands of prosperous pulpits."

Thus we are pictured as others see us. We have no Rationalist propaganda in New York because, as we view the situation, the right man or men to organize and carry it on have not appeared, but much credit is due the "tiny body" that works in obscurity and impecuniosity for keeping the light from going out altogether. As to this office, all rooms are sombre in a sunless spring, and the Underwood Typewriter Company has not helped dispel the gloom for us by erecting a twelve-story building across the street. The vendors of fruits and vegetables on our flank may be explained by the propinquity of Washington Market, but a block away, where, we assume, the products of the farm and orchard are cheap compared with London prices. Ours is a block of flowers and seeds, pictures and books. (At no great distance one may purchase seeds from the descendants of the Scotch psalm singer, Grant Thorburn, who, as Conway said, fathered Cheetham's slanders of Paine after Cheetham had become too infamous to quote.) Mr. McCabe does not account for the "living paradox" of no Rationalist propaganda by platform in New York on the theory that America has been secularized; nor do we advance that notion. On the other hand, we should say that the difficulty of the situation is created by and is due to clerical strength and influence everywhere entrenched. There are no prominent public men here, as in some other places, who announce and advocate the Rationalist idea. The situation might be changed, we think, by the right sort of leadership and lectureship.

A very interesting occurrence for Rationalists took place in the House of Lords in London on May 14, when by a majority vote of four to one it was decided that the Christian religion could be subverted legally by reverent and sincere methods. The case was as follows: A legacy was left to the Secular Society, Ltd., the main object of which is "to promote the principle that human conduct should be based upon natural knowledge, not upon supernatural belief, and also that human welfare in this world is the proper end of all thought and action." The trial court and also the court of appeal upheld the validity of the bequest. The contention was that the society existed for the purpose of subverting the Christian religion, and was therefore an illegal corporation. The lord chancellor ruled that Christianity was part of the law of the land, and that a change could be effected only by statute and not by legal decision. He thought appeals should be allowed. Lord Dunedin held that the object of the society could be followed without the crime of blasphemy. No other statute was called into question, he said. Lord Parker agreed with the quotation from Justice Coleridge that there is nothing unlawful in common law in reverently doubting or denying the doctrines of Christianity, however fundamental. Lord Sumner said that, with all respect to the great names of the lawyers who had used the phrase "Christianity is a part of the law of England," it was really not law, but only rhetoric. This decision, while emphasizing the right of free speech, and thus supporting with a legal judgment the solid contention of Freethinkers for many hundreds of years, ought also to put an end to all court trials for blasphemy, and to make to cease forever the condemnation of honest men who dare to speak their sincere thoughts regarding religion in common with other subjects. Verily, the worlds moves, and in its older portion first. It is to be hoped that our American courts will take cognizance of the action of the English House of Lords, and abolish at once any judicial discrimination against all persons who, without hypocrisy or guile, dare to express the results of their conscientious thinking.

The war is overturning the teachings of our youth. We have lived to hear economy deprecated as something undesirable and unwise. Merchants, ministers and purveyors of comestibles are against it. That well-known philanthropist, J. Ogden Armour, who possibly has overstocked on meat and canned goods, is especially solicitous about the effect that cutting down family expenses is going to have on trade. He wants us to buy while prices are high. Our guides in the matter are parties who have something to exchange for our good money, but the man who has a family to provide for is likely to consult his own judgment, or at least his pocket. The traffickers in food products exhort us to loosen up and spend some money, yet if we go to price their goods we are told that they come high because they are scarce. Why should we be urged to buy and consume in the presence of scarcity? Purchasing a pound of meat reduces the supply just as much when it costs thirty cents as when sold for half that. But the shortage is not apparent. The markets are fully stocked, and one may get all he wants of anything if he has the price. The sole effect of not buying liberally must be to cause a reduction of prices, and the goods will go as far to support life at a moderate price as at an exorbitant one. We do not think that the principle of economy, saving and sparing has been discredited or is likely to be by those who practice it when things get beyond their reach. If a man thinks he cannot afford to take THE TRUTH SEEKER we would never ask him to do so on our account, or to help keep up the price of white paper.

The name Catholic church is not to be found in the Christian scriptures; neither is the thing. The word "church" is found twice, it is true, in the English translation of the gospels; but even in those cases it might and probably should be otherwise translated. The original term "ecclesia" had at that time no ecclesiastical signification whatever, but was the word commonly employed by the Greeks to denote any general gathering of the people. It meant "assembly," and is the same word which in another place is correctly translated "assembly." When Jesus used it or its equivalent, therefore, on the occasions mentioned above, the disciples would naturally understand him as alluding to the body of his followers in general, whether united in an ecclesiastical organization or not. That Jesus himself created no such organization, does not need to be proved to those who read in New Testament language only what is there. Not only do the gospels give no hint of such an act, but they show no such desire on the part of Jesus himself. He seems to have no purpose or anxiety beyond the simple utterance of his thought, and its practical exemplification in the affairs of ordinary life. It is an indisputable fact that no evidence exists of any steps on his part towards separating his followers from the synagogues, or uniting them in a distinct body by themselves. Jesus left his followers, so far as ecclesiastical organization is concerned, just as he found them.

The friends of the corybantic evangelist are sensitive to criticism of his style. One day last week Irving Meirowitz, discussing religion from the Freethinker's point of view in an open-air speech, made casual mention of the evangelist, whose gyrations he compared to the antics of a monkey. The policeman on that post chanced to be an admirer of the knockabout at the tabernacle, and told Mr. Meirowitz that he would not be allowed to make fun of Mr. Sunday. Meirowitz, dissented, and, being ordered off his stand, invited the policeman to go with him to police headquarters and get an opinion from higher up. There he was advised that the interference was unwarranted and that he was entitled to lodge a complaint against the officer, which he declined to do, being satisfied with having enlightened him on a point relating to his duty and the limitations of his powers. The policeman may have honestly believed that to call Billy Sunday a monkey in public is contrary to the statute in such case made and provided. They all need instruction on the right of free speech.

They have a tabernacle evangelist in Grand Rapids, Michigan, who calls himself Bob Jones. He is a defender of Bible authority and inerrancy, and in effect says that anything contrary to the word of God may go plumb to hell. A Unitarian minister of Grand Rapids, the Rev. Daniel Roy Freeman, sent to Bob Jones a letter courteously inviting him to a conference for the purpose of going into the matter of the authority of the Bible, and offering him every facility to be heard, at Mr. Freeman's church, or Mr. Freeman would come to the tabernacle and ask him to answer a few questions. The evangelist declined, first, apparently, for business reasons, and secondly because "on the authority of Jesus, there cannot be such a person as an honest doubter." There are many persons who, after vainly endeavoring to get certain gospel shouters to submit their statements to the test of argument and fact, have reached the conclusion that there cannot be such a thing as an honest evangelist.

To churches everywhere the example of the Congregational church in Suquamish, state of Washington, is recommended. This church, as reported in the Star of Seattle, has by a unanimous resolution "asked the county assessor to assess their property so that they can pay their share of the taxes. The church is only one year old, is worth about $3,000, and feels that it should do its share toward the payment of taxes during the war." This ought to quicken the consciences of New York churches, which own property valued at $300,000,000. Last March, the New York Federation of Christian churches voted 158 to 52 in favor of going to war. Only the negative votes of 20 Presbyterian delegates saved them from going 5 to 1 for the sword. The Episcopal church voted 9 to 1 in favor of America's entering the armed conflict. The Methodists were 6 to 1 for military measures. Will these churches back their opinions by paying the war tax, or were they "bluffing"?

What General Sherman called the "scramble" for chaplaincies has begun. Says the Evening Telegram:

"The Rev. George J. Waring, chaplain of the Eleventh Cavalry, U. S. A., was quoted as saying the new United States Army will need one thousand chaplains and that to the Roman Catholic church there has been allotted forty-three per cent. of the total—an allotment based on the religious census of the country.

"This means that within the next few months 400 priests will be required to serve as chaplains in our new army," Father Waring said."

The Rev. Father Waring works out percentages to suit himself. The Federal Council Year Book, compiled by the expert religious statistician, Dr. H. K. Carroll, gives the Catholics, in round numbers, 14,000,000 communicants out of a total religious population of 40,000,000—which is not 43 per cent., but 35. What a graft is this appointment of a thousand additional chaplains, with salaries of a thousand dollars up!

The World War, which has now been raging for nearly three years, has made it painfully manifest that the religion of yesterday, with its implicit reliance on transcendental guidance and aid, is not the religion of today. Men neither hope to win the war, nor secure a permanent settlement, save as the result of indefatigable thought and effort, and if scarcely a voice can be heard which does not anathematize war and all its odious works, it is because the conscience of men, liberated from ancient trammels, have grown infinitely more sensitive. Supernaturalism, in other words, has become as nearly as possible an empty formula, while strenuous endeavor in the service of the moral ideal has acquired a sacred character.

We gather this bouquet from the columns of our London contemporary, the Literary Guide: "If any of our readers are desirous of adding to their weekly newspaper list an excellent militant Free-thought journal, they cannot do better than send 4s. 6d to our publishers as a trial subscription to the New York TRUTH SEEKER for three months. Nearly every issue contains some remarkable paper among its varied contents, and there is never a really dull page. The editor is a specially gifted writer, and also an up-to-date and enterprising journalist." As Charlie Watts, the father of the publisher of the Guide, used to say, "This is praise from Sir Hubert."

Delinquent preachers must generally await the "Clerical Round Up" for mention in this paper; but the Rev. Lynne George Kelly, a Presbyterian minister of Iowa, is an unusual case. He is in custody at Red Oak under an indictment charging him with the murder of eight persons—one man, two women and four children—in Villisca, Iowa, in 1912. Since the murder, which was committed with an ax, the minister has preached in various Western cities, in one of which he was arrested for sending obscene matter to women through the mails.

After going to hear Billy Sunday preach on the evening of May 15, Mr. Edward Stone of 341 West Fourteenth street, this city, went home and committed suicide. This is to be remembered in connection with the well-known lie copyrighted by Sunday that twenty-five suicides followed immediately a lecture by Ingersoll, and one hundred more during the ensuing week. Can Sunday give a name or a date, as above, to substantiate his preaching?

A moment before dying, New York's distinguished citizen, Joseph H. Choate, laying aside the burden of his eighty-five years, remarked: "I think this is the end." There is not much material in that brief opinion for the mythologists to work upon, but we shall see what they can do. Doubtless it was the end and Mr. Choate felt it to be so.

The obvious remark concerning "continuity" after death is that it is not a matter of such common observation as would establish it as a fact.

The Word "Christ."

The word "Christ" is a word which, used in connection with Jesus, has no warrant in fact or in history. Jesus was not the Christ, the Anointed. He fulfilled no expectations of the looked-for messiah. He was the leader of a rabble, not of a people. He was the king of no possible kingdom. He called upon men to follow him, but did not know where he was going. If he was desirous of saving man, he did not have the means to do it. He relied upon his father in heaven, but never showed that he had such a father. Never did a person on earth make louder pretensions to knowledge, and never did a person on earth add so little to knowledge. Jesus claimed to have light from another world but gave none to this.

The word "Christ" has no meaning to our civilization. It is a word from which the life has gone out. It is a corpse. This dead word should be dropped from our language. Man can make no honest use of it, for the work which a Christ was to do was never done.

The man on whose brow this word has been put as a crown has been pictured larger than human nature, but the story of his life is fiction. The people who looked for a Christ did not expect a demigod, but a man who should restore the lost power of Israel; not a person who should perform a few petty tricks, but a king who should occupy the empty throne of David. That man never came; that king never held the lost sceptre of the Israelites, and the Christ of the New Testament is the merest phantom of that messiah whose coming was so earnestly wished for by the Jews. L. K. W.

"Job," says the evangelist, "was the Mark Twain of his day." And Balaam's ass may have been the Billy Sunday of his generation. Who knows?

THE TRUTH SEEKER

Published weekly by the Truth Seeker Company, President, George E. Macdonald; Secretary, James A. Conway, 62 Vesey street, New York.

Entered at the Postoffice, New York, N. Y., as second-class matter.

Address communications and make drafts, checks, postoffice and express money orders payable to THE TRUTH SEEKER, 62 Vesey street, New York.

Subscription Rates.

Single subscription in advance . . $3.00
Two new subscribers 5.00
One subscription two years in advance 5.00
One subscription and one new subscriber, in one remittance . . . 5.00
To all foreign countries except Mexico, 50 cents per annum extra.
Subscriptions received for any length of time under a year at the rate of 25 cents per month. Can be begun at any time.
Single copies, 10 cents.

SPECIAL NOTICE.—We shall be obliged to our readers if they will send us the name and address of any Free-thinker who is not a regular subscriber.

OBJECTS.

It is the object of THE TRUTH SEEKER to educate the people out of religious superstition. It denies the inspiration and infallibility of the Bible, and asserts the human origin of that book. It denies the existence of the theological heaven and hell, but as to the existence and immortality of the soul neither affirms nor denies. It waits for evidence.

THE TRUTH SEEKER upholds the theory of Evolution, believing that to be the solution of the question of the origin, growth, and development of the animal kingdom, including man. THE TRUTH SEEKER believes that the answer to the questions Whence? and Whither? can be given only by Science.

THE TRUTH SEEKER holds that morality and ethics—or man's relation to man—are entirely independent of creed or religion, and are founded on rules developed by experience.

In current politics THE TRUTH SEEKER takes no side or part. In general it holds to the principles of freedom enunciated by the Founders of the Republic.

THE TRUTH SEEKER believes in Free Speech, Free Press, and Free Mails; in full discussion of all sides of all subjects, and affords those having new and worthy thoughts, clearly stated, a generous and welcome hearing, each contributor being responsible for his own opinion. We neither indorse an idea by printing it, nor condemn it by exclusion.

THE TRUTH SEEKER is the recognized medium of communication between the Liberals of the country, and is edited each week for their information, instruction, entertainment, and support against religious error and mental slavery and in maintenance of their equal civil and religious rights as citizens of the United States.

The Editor invites communications on the subjects to which these pages are devoted.

POLITICAL PRINCIPLES.

(THE NINE DEMANDS OF LIBERALISM.)

1. We demand that churches and other ecclesiastical property shall be no longer exempt from taxation.
2. We demand that the employment of chaplains in Congress, in the Legislatures, in the navy and militia, and in prisons, asylums and all other institutions supported by public money shall be discontinued.
3. We demand that all public appropriations for educational and charitable institutions of a sectarian character shall cease.
4. We demand that all religious services now sustained by the government shall be abolished; and especially that the use of the Bible in the public schools, whether ostensibly as a text-book or avowedly as a book of religious worship, shall be prohibited.
5. We demand that the appointment by the President of the United States or by the governors of the various states, of all religious festivals and fasts shall wholly cease.
6. We demand that the judicial oath in the courts and in all other departments of the government shall be abolished, and that simple affirmation under the pains and penalties of perjury shall be established in its stead.
7. We demand that all laws directly or indirectly enforcing the observance of Sunday as the Sabbath shall be repealed.
8. We demand that all laws looking to the enforcement of "Christian" morality shall be abrogated and that all laws shall be conformed to the requirements of natural morality, equal rights, and impartial liberty.

9. We demand that not only in the Constitution of the United States and of the several states, but also in the practical administration of the same, no privileges or advantages shall be conceded to Christianity or any other special religion; that our entire political system shall be founded and administered on a purely secular basis; and that whatever changes shall prove necessary to this end shall be consistently, unflinchingly, and promptly made.

Letters of Friends

Readers desirous of communicating with the writers of the letters in this department may address them in care of THE TRUTH SEEKER, 62 Vesey street, New York, N. Y., and the letters will be re-addressed and forwarded.

THE BIBLE AS AN ALMANAC.

No. 3—Jacob and Esau.

From Wakeman Ryno, M.D., Michigan.
To the Editor of The Truth Seeker:

Jacob and Esau are the same as Abraham and Lot; that is, under other names Jacob and Esau are allegorical pictures of greater and lesser time. Just as Ab-Ra-Ham stood for "Ra," the Egyptian god of greater or "Old Father Time," and Lot stood for "Min," the Egyptian god little or Intercalary Time; so Jacob is another representation of "Old Father Time," and Esau is made to represent "Little or Intercalary Time."

In former articles I have endeavored to show that the three first stories in the Bible are allegories of a year of time and identically the same. That Adam, Noah, and Terah, are characters made up from the Egyptian gods of the year, as shown in the "Book of the Dead," the Bible of the Mummy religion. Adam (Atum), Noah (Nu), and Terah (Ptah), each stood for a year of three suns or seasons. Each had a spring or growing sun; a blessed or harvest sun; and a cursed or winter sun. Each cursed sun had a "little sun." Adam's cursed sun Cain had Enoch, Noah's cursed sun Ham had Canaan, and Terah's cursed sun Haran had Lot; and each of these suns of cursed suns, represent the five intercalary days necessary to turn a circle of 360 degrees into a year of 365 days. These days began the day after the winter solstice, the end of the old circle of the sun, the cut off place, the Golgotha or place of skulls.

This is the ancient Osirian cave of Abydos in the field of Amenta. "This is the cave in the field of Machpelah which is before Mamre, in the land of Canaan, which Abraham bought with the field of Ephron for a burying place. Here they buried Abraham, Isaac, and Jacob." Gen. xlviii, 30.

Machpelah means a doubling or curvature of the sun's path, such as takes place at the winter solstice, when the sun is in the cave or dark of the longest night in the year; "which is before Mamre," i. e., before the five Intercalary days of the "Little Month," presided over by "Min," the god of intercalary time. The place of these two time gods was called "Min-Ra," but has been translated as "Mamre." "The land of Canaan bought with the field of Ephron" is an astronomical phrase, and means that at the winter solstice (which is Canaan or lowest place of the sun) the sign of Taurus the Bull (Ephron) is the field of stars directly over head, and thus Abraham (Time) bought the field of Ephron with Mamre.

The analysis of the names of Abraham, Jacob, and Israel prove, then, to be names perfectly synonymous. The name of Ab-Ra-Ham reduced to its Amonian radicals gives us Ab—father, Ra—sun, Ham—heat or fire; i. e., the heat or fire of the sun is Father. Jacob is I-ac-ob and gives us I—the one, ac—the fire, ob or ab—father; i. e., the one great fire is Father. Is-Ra-El gives us Is—the fire, Ra—the sun, El—lord; i. e., the fire or sun is Lord or Father.

No language in the Bible is such a "dead-give-away" as the question continually reiterated of "what is thy name?" From the story of Adam, who named all things, to Abraham, Moses, and Jesus, this silly language occurs exactly as it appeared thousands of years before in the Book of the Dead.

"Neither shall thy name any more be called Abram, but thy name shall be Abraham." (Gen. xvii, 5). "Thy name shall be called no more Jacob but Israel." (Gen. xxxii, 28). "And Jacob said tell me thy name?" (Gen. xxxii, 27). And Moses said to God, What is thy name?" (Exod. iii, 13). "And Jesus said, Whom do men say that I am?" (Mat. xvi, 13; Mark viii, 27; Luke ix, 16).

In the Book of the Dead the names of the gods changed every time the sun entered a new sign. The sun or time god "Ra" is found combined with all of the Zodiacal gods. Horus, the God of Hours and the Horizon, is found combined with thirty-six or more. Says the Ritual: "Hail Horus, O third gate of the god with the motionless heart, I know thee, I know thy name, I know the name of the God who keeps thee." (Book of the Dead, Chap. 145). This verse is repeated at each of the 21 gates (Decans) of Aarru (Summer Time). Again repeated at each of the 15 gates (Decans) of Amenta (Cold, dark, or Winter time).

To ask "what is thy name?" was equivalent to asking the time of day; because telling the time of the day, month, or year depended upon the place of the Sun-God; and knowing his name, told his place.

Again, time was measured by the moon and stars. Bible stories are allegories of both solar, lunar and stellar time. The "great dipper" circling round the polar star was the clock of primitive man, and was called by the ancient Egyptian "the walking leg with the thigh."

In chapter 125 of the Ritual, Sec. B, V, 47, we read: "What is thy name they say to him. I am one with Osiris,—pass the gods answer him. I passed by the meadows northward the fig tree,—What didst thou see there? The walking leg with the thigh."

The thigh was indispensable to all the actors who played the role of Old Father Time; so Abraham is made to say "put thy hand under my thigh and I will make thee swear by the Lord" (i. e., the sun or moon god which tells the time). Gen. xxiv, 2. "And Jacob called the name of the place where he had "wrestled all night with his thigh out of joint, Penuel," for said he, "I have seen God face to face." "And as he passed over Penuel, or the face of God (sign) the sun rose upon him and he halted upon his thigh." Gen. xxxii, 25-31. In other words, time was wrestled or measured at night by the circling "Dipper" or "walking leg with the thigh,"—the Swastica,—the stellar clock; but on the rising of the sun, stellar time ceased and solar time began; so Jacob halted or stopped counting time by the thigh.

Just as Enoch, Canaan, and Lot, grandsons of Adam, Noah, and Terah, were made to represent "Min," the God of Intercalary time, so the grand-son of Jacob is made to represent Intercalary time under the name of Manasseh (Min-Esau). "And now thy two sons Ephraim and Manasseh are mine; as Reuben and Simeon they shall be mine. And he set Ephraim before Manasseh." Gen. xlviii, 5-20. Exactly as the story of Lot illustrates the carnival of drunkenness, which took place during the five Intercalary days or "Festival of Min," so the story of Esau and Manasseh (Min-Esau) illustrates the same thing. Manasseh or Min-Esau was a name that caused Joseph to "forget all his toils and troubles, and all his father's house;" that is, he was so drunk that "Old Father Time" was not considered. Gen. xli, 51. "Esau was born red, hairy, and fiery; he fed on red pottage, and was called Edom the red," which signifies the red fiery worship of the "Little Month" or "Festival of Min." Gen. xxv, 25-30.

During this festival the starry sign of "Taurus the Bull" was to be seen overhead, always standing over the place of Old Father Time at the winter solstice, and called Ephron and Ephraim. Eph-Ra-on and Eph-Ra-im, (Hebrew), and Aprilis (Roman), are names rooted in the Egyptian "Apis—the Bull," and as April was seed time, and one of the months presided over by "Ptah the Egyptian god of growth," the Romans gave their second God the name of "Taurus" (Ptah-rus), and always connected this god or sign, the old father time at the solstice, with seed-time and plenty. "So Joseph called his second born Ephraim, because God has caused me to be fruitful in the land." Gen. xli, 51. As seed-time or spring, always takes precedence over winter, so Jacob gave Ephraim precedence over Manasseh, and makes him one of his twelve suns or months.

Is it possible for any man of ordinary common sense to read Gen. xlix and Deut. xxxiii, and not be convinced that the twelve suns of Jacob, the twelve patriarchs, the twelve tribes of Israel, and the twelve Apostles of Christ, are all one with the twelve signs of the zodiac, and twelve months of the year?

It should be remembered that the figures and names given to the twelve signs of the zodiac, and founded on reasons of some hieroglyphical significance, or some association of ideas, which may perhaps now be entirely lost, has remained the same from before all records of the thoughts or devices of man, there being no language, nor any trace of the existence of men upon earth, among whom the division of the sun's annual course through these twelve groups of stars, was not the same as it is with us, and the names and figures of the groups, the same too.

An imaginary character and imaginary history, says Dr. Taylor, were referred to these groups, analogous to the character and history pending that portion of the year, during which the sun appears to be in that part of the heavens over which the stars that make up the group spread themselves. And as the sun was always the supreme god, so each of these signs of the zodiac were all of them gods in their turns; so spoken of, so worshiped and adored, and so one or other adopted by different nations, as the great father or patriarch, from which they imagined themselves to be descended.

The name tribes, or twelve tribes of Israel, is as technically astronomical a term as the name of the twelve signs of the zodiac itself, the word tribe actually meaning, and never having had any other meaning than a path or course, such as that of the sun through the signs of the zodiac. Patriarch never meant parent, but was a religious term, imported from Egypt, the same as Pator or Patora, the Amonian name of the sun, whose priests were called Pator or Pator, in honor of the sun; and in their religious ceremonies they danced round a large fire, in representation of the sun in the visible heavens. Hence the name of Peter, the chief of the apostles of Christ, and the name Patriarchs, or most distinguished Peters given to the twelve tribes of Israel—that is, the twelve signs of the zodiac, which really do seem to dance round the sun in the annual revolution of the heavens.

And Jacob said to the twelve Patriarchs, "Gather yourselves together and hear, ye sons of Jacob, and hearken unto Israel (Zodiac) your father."

Reuben (Aquarius) thou art my first born, the beginning of my strength, unstable as water.

Simeon and Levi (Pisces) are brethren, instruments of cruelty (hooks, spears, etc.) are in their habitation.

Gad (Aries) a troop shall overcome, but he shall overcome at last.

Ephraim (Taurus) his glory is like the firstling of his bullock.

Asher (Gemini) let Asher be blessed with children.

Judah (Leo) as a lion's whelp, he couches as a lion, as an old lion.

Naphtali (Virgo) O Naphtali, satisfied and full of the blessings of the Lord (harvest).

Benjamin (Libra) shall raven as a wolf, in the morning he shall devour the prey, and at night divide the spoil. (Equal nights and days).

Dan (Scorpio) shall be a serpent in the path, that biteth the horses' heels.

Joseph (Sagittarius) is a fruitful bough, the archers have shot at him, but his bow abode in strength.

Zebulon (Capricornus) shall dwell at the haven of the sea.

Manasseh (Min-Esau) "the thousands of Manasseh are the ten thousands of Ephraim." i. e. The sun in passing through the thirty days of Ephraim or April, passes through ten times as many stars as in the five days of the "Little Month."

"All these are the twelve tribes (signs) of Israel (Zodiac); this is it that their father (time) spake unto them, and blessed them; every one according to his blessing he blessed them." Gen. xlix, 28. Blessing signifies time, works and nourishment and whatever the sun brings forth in each sign or month so is the year supported and time measured.

INFLUENCE OF THE TRUTH SEEKER.

From J. B. Galbraith, Texas.

To the Editor of The Truth Seeker:

We are to have Billy Sunday in Dallas next year. I believe he is causing many people to see how absolutely absurd Christianity is. Of course he gets lots of suckers. But just think of the number who go to hear him that take no active part in his show. There is nothing that can do so much to offset this fanaticism as the grand old TRUTH SEEKER; and to think I knew of no such paper until recently! I having been raised by a man (my father) who is a Universalist and strictly liberal, I was always taught to read everything that I wanted to and not to be afraid of anything. A good Infidel friend of mine handed me a TRUTH SEEKER one day and asked me if I cared or was afraid to read it. I assured him I was afraid of nothing. I read it with much interest. In reading I saw a little short piece from Mr. Washburn, I think it was. He made the statement that any man that could read the 31st chapter of Numbers and believe God was the instigator of all that carnage was badly wrong somewhere. I got my Bible at once and read it, and it surely did make me come uncoupled right then and there. At the time I was superintendent of a good live Sunday school. I forthwith resigned and pretty soon subscribed for THE TRUTH SEEKER, and have lived happy ever since. My father, who is 82 years old, reads THE TRUTH SEEKER and is nearly as free as I.

I have a son three years old on Washington's birthday. My greatest desire is that I can give him a good education and maybe sometime he will be able to stand up and defend the rights of man like Stanley Clark (the Robt. Ingersoll of the South) and many others. Of course he might make a preacher, but I don't see how he can if I keep THE TRUTH SEEKER for him to read till he is a grown man.

MAN A SEARCHER FOR TRUTH

From Wm. C. Tremier, Pennsylvania.

To the Editor of The Truth Seeker:

It may truthfully be said that man is ever desirous of finding Truth, and seeks his concepts of said abstract state of being, from such material,—tangible or intangible,—as come within the purview of his reasoning powers.

As long as man confines his search for truth to the realm of "sensed" existences, he at least has a tangible guide to point the way his ego should go to reach the object of its quest; but when he leaves said realm for the realm of imaginary existences, his findings regarding Truth are as intangible as the evidence upon which he bases his concepts of same.

As no two mentalities are exactly alike in perceptive or receptive grasp of nature's existences, it perforce follows that no two minds can ever possibly obtain exactly the same intensity or quality of concept regarding Truth; hence when two or more mentalities have reached what seems upon comparison to be unanimity of concept, existant discrepancies in reasoning power will usher in such other psychic factors as will provoke disagreement to said concepts.

That portion of nature's realm that comes within range of human concept might aptly be termed man's school, its forms, and its forces, his textbooks; and the psychic impressions made by said forms and forces, the educators that enlighten his mind to partial conceptions of Truth, or that opposite state or quality of abstract being, which he is pleased to term error.

Man's concepts of the "seen" awaken his ego to desire knowledge regarding the "unseen"; hence he ever strives to lift the veil of mystery that separates that period called time, from that mystic period termed eternity hence those nondescript conceptions of "spirit forms" are fashioned more or less in the shape of earth animated existences, and the "spirit realms," in which they eternally dwell, contain some of the same tangible substances and intangible forces which man physically senses and psychically cognizes during his sojourn upon the stage of earthly existence.

While man can only obtain such concepts of truth as individual consciousness will permit, his consciousness is more or less influenced by contact with group activities; hence through said contact his concepts become more or less biased for, or against, certain prescribed forms of belief. It is the mental bias arising from group association that determines the pro-creedal, pro-racial, pro-political and all other abstract forms of pro-group concepts.

To the extent that individual mind is divorced from said group bias, does its possessor deserve the truly distinguished title of "Freethinker"?

In closing I wish to add that while a myriad forces impel man onward in the quest of Truth, the "printed word" is probably the greatest aid to his search; and among the diversified agencies of said psychic aid to the discovery of truth, there is none, in the opinion of the writer, that ranks so high as that printed publication known as THE TRUTH SEEKER.

A VETERAN SUBSCRIBER.

From William Hubbard, California.

To the Editor of The Truth Seeker:

I want to thank you for the little tract I have just received and many other favors you have granted me.

I was born in Boone county, Mo., the 10th of March, 1833. I was raised by Methodist parents till I was old enough to read for myself. Then I learned from reading the book called the word of God, that I hadn't been lawfully inducted into God's kingdom, so I became reckless and skeptical about that being the word of God, and in the spring of 1853 I and three others, with a team, started for California. We got to St. Joseph, Mo., but had to lay over there waiting for more favorable weather and grass to grow. During that time there was a traveling lecturer came there according to his appointment to give free lectures on theology, which caused quite an excitement, filling the largest hall in St. Joseph, but there wasn't standing room in the big hall. They called him a Deist or an Infidel. He was very eloquent, and his lectures and unanswerable arguments reminded me of Col. R. G. Ingersoll's grand lectures that I now have and still like to read. He was selling Thomas Paine's "Age of Reason" and others of Paine's writings. The lecturer's audience increased during his stay of one week. I heard all of his grand lectures and laid in a good supply of books that I have never regretted buying to this day; and I have a good supply of books which I bought from The Truth Seeker Company. I have been a subscriber to THE TRUTH SEEKER for many years, as your books will show. I have no old TRUTH SEEKERS lying around, for I always remail them wherever I think they will do the most good. I have received many thanks for my kindness and the grand and noble lessons they have learned from them. They now do their own thinking and have quit paying sky pilots to think for them.

I am an old soldier who served two years in the Civil War. My pension is one dollar a day. I am growing old and feeble, but can say, as Thomas Paine said, that the world is my country, and to do good is my religion.

SPIRITS AND SPIRIT LIFE.

From Wm. J. Bryan, M. D., New York.

To the Editor of The Truth Seeker:

For a number of years I was a subscriber to THE TRUTH SEEKER, and for over twenty-five years I was a materialist. Is there something beyond materialism? It seems so, because I have progressed from it into spiritualism. During the last year I have developed psychically, till now I am a spirit medium, and possess the phase of mediumship known as automatic writing. Having been a student of psychology for several years, I can state positively that this spirit-writing does not issue from my own brain, but that it is composed by spirits and is dictated to me by those spirits—many of whom are known as prominent persons in history, such as Xerxes, Aaron, Hypatia, Cleopatra and Thomas Jefferson.

Happiness in store for the faithful, is certain to be the reward of a dutiful obedience to the guidance and counsel of those advanced spirits who seek to lessen our burdens here in the mortal side of life.

And this is not mysterious, uncanny or wonderful, because it is the natural bent of those who practice loving regard for humanity, to see them happy and mindful of their prerogatives of self-conscious ideality.

Now we hasten the day when all those who are seeking advancement may jump into the wagon of advancement, and take a ride with congenial company to the destination of transition from earth to spirit-land, and there see the splendor of a life full of glorious activity and spiritual achievement, where character is seen by all, and where the bubble of "reputation" has no real existence in the minds of spirits.

So it follows that only the realities of self-hood find a prominence in the open skies and 'mid the mansions not built with hands yet eternal in the heavens.

Travel west, travel east, wherever a spirit glides, there is beauty untold; and gifts, conditions and realities of continued existence are there to enchant, ennoble and glorify.

And above and beyond all is the infinite deity, which on steadily seeks to approach and fill the soul with a love which passeth all conceptions of the human mentality.

Call that supreme force by any term you wish or can represent by words, and the fact is still apparent that, beyond the mightiest is the Almighty. Acknowledgement of this concept brings one at once into a most delightful spiritual elevation that gratifies, encourages and ennoble.

So, my friends, it is with every regard for the explanations of the materialists—which fail to really explain—that it can be publicly announced from the spiritualistic press, platform, and medium's sanctum, that there is a life for all after the body falls and disintegrates, and that eternal life with retention of personality, is coexistent with resurrection. This is a proven fact.

So let our materialist companions who have so far neglected to verify our statements,—let them awaken to the sense of more earnest investigation of genuine spirit phenomena and they will soon realize that communion with the saints of heaven—with spirits—is no fantasy, illusion, nor hallucination of a shattered brain.

Sooner or later, all will learn the truth about spirit-return, and then—gladness dispels the gloom of uncertainty, doubt and unbelief, and all's well at last.

Through inconvenience, many are unacquainted with evidence of spirit-life which is all around us, in every house and home, and in and beyond the earth's atmosphere; and no one need be perturbed over the sight of some angel or spirit apparition that it may become one's good fortune to observe, clairvoyantly, once or more times during our earthly career. They will not harm or cause injury to any one who possesses a determination to seek the good and to repel the bad.

So let us say, in conclusion, that to give our spirit-friends a cordial welcome, by sending forth our good thoughts, will help them to progress; and it will help us to realize that good thoughts will prove to be strong incentives toward right living.

NEW THOUGHT.

From D. F. Sweetland.

To the Editor of The Truth Seeker:

Dr. Julia Seaton, plus artist extraordinary, has departed. It was her second coming to our happy city. She is touring the continent in the interest of her church and school of The New Civilization. She intends to plant at least one of her institutions in all large cities. While she antagonizes the cults as little as possible, she has hard work in most places in renting their halls. She is a fluent speaker, and draws well. The name New Thought is well chosen, as most people are looking for something new. As she plusses everything worth while it is hard work to beat her to it.

She lectured on the difference between Christian Science, Spiritualism, Theosophy and New Thought. Religion she claimed started with Zarathustra, about 700 B. C. Zara got the first planetary messages from the infinite. They contained about twenty-three doctrines which he boiled down to thirteen, the chief of which are:

Everything is God. Everything is Good, and we are all godlets. The trouble lies in our not being able to realize our divinity. This her church and school were founded to do at so much per. These truths were embodied in Zara's message over 6,500 years ago. So there is nothing new about her teachings. It was partly lost sight of until received by one J. H. Evans and put on the market as New Thought. Zoroaster, the Jews and Jesus got their stuff from Zara's priests who also carried it into India where it became the foundation of Buddhism, Brahmanism, etc.

Christian Science was originated by a man by the name of Quimby, who taught it to Eddy, who got all the credit. Christian Science has a devil named Mortal Mind. It is exclusive, slavish; taught no reincarnation, spiritism or transcendentalism, denied matter and intelligence. New Thought taught the opposite. She gave it credit for a large amount of healing.

Spiritualism taught spirit control. New Thinkers had direct impressions from the departed, and needed no control. She commenced with spirits nightly. Spiritualism was very comforting. Theosophy also was slavish and had a devil named Karma. Theosophists ruled by certain Lords of Karma. New Thought ruled their Karma, and had no Lords of any kind. The Theosophists taught but few reincarnations, while she had several daily. She remembered things that happened on previous trips to this, as well as on other planets. She knows her doctrines are true as they are backed by unnumbered hosts of power.

She opens and closes her meetings by every one going into the silence for five minutes which she claims throws them out of gear with the world, opens up their spiritual vision, and gives them a chance to realize their divinity—oneness with the eternal existence. What is the use of being a dub when by going into the silence and taking a few lectures you can realize that you are a godlet?

MENTAL GROWTH.

From H. Mell, Nebraska.

To the Editor of The Truth Seeker:

The development of the musical sense suggests a parallel unfolding of our higher nature. The ancient tom-tom, once an emergency alarm, later became an instrument of emotional intimation. In time the reedflute and the melodious string appeared, and with them came growth of the tune sense. This faculty in turn devised new instruments for self-expression and developed by using them.

Our present task, to equalize the benefits of scientific invention, is a material necessity. But out of the union of masculine aspiration and feminine altruism, of individualism and socialism, shall be brought forth an increase in the momentum of mind domination, warranting the subsequent employment of the whole social fabric merely for expressing the ecstasies of a civilization to which our own, in its crudity, will compare as does the noise of the tom-tom to the creations of modern masters of melody.

CHILDREN'S CORNER FOR BOYS AND GIRLS YOUNG AND OLD

"Between the dark and the daylight,
When the night is beginning to lower,
Comes a pause in the day's occupations
That is known as the Children's Hour."

FREETHOUGHT CALENDAR.

CONDUCTED BY FRANKLIN STEINER.

Stephen Girard, May 24, 1750-December 31, 1831.

The year 1774 was a memorable one in American history, as at that time there landed on our shores Thomas Paine, an Englishman. In 1776 there came another, Stephen Girard, a Frenchman. In many respects these men were the antithesis of each other. The first, whose soul burned with a love of liberty, was looking for a means of livelihood, and opportunity to exercise his talent. The second was a sea captain whom the British warships drove with his vessel up the Delaware to Philadelphia, where the hostilities of the Revolution compelled him to remain. He was strictly devoted to business, and from the first was a financial success. Both men were Freethinkers and the new continent was a gainer in many ways by their arrival. No Philadelphian of the period dreamed of the benefits that would come upon his city through the queer-looking, one-eyed little Frenchman, who had been born in Bordeaux, France, May 20, 1750. At the age of eight he lost his right eye. He was born to a seafaring life. His father was a sea captain, and between 1764 and 1773 young Girard made many voyages to the West Indies and return. In 1774 he was himself licensed as a captain, and was doing a prosperous business when compelled to tie up in Philadelphia. He made the best of the situation and opened a store in the Quaker city, which from the first was a success. He married also, but having a keener eye to business than to matrimony he chose a weak-minded woman who became insane and died in the Pennsylvania Hospital in 1815. When the Revolution was over he again embarked in seafaring mercantile enterprises. From one ship his efforts blossomed into a fleet of merchantmen. These sailed upon every sea and anchored in the ports of all nations. James Parton thus describes his method of managing his voyages: "A ship loaded with cotton and grain would sail, for example, to Bordeaux, there discharge and take in a cargo of wine and fruit; thence to St. Petersburg where she would exchange her wine and fruit for hemp and iron; then to Amsterdam where the hemp and iron would be sold for dollars; to Calcutta next for a cargo of tea and silks, with which the ship would return to Philadelphia. . . The grand, the fundamental secret of his success, as of all success, was that he understood his business. He had a personal, familiar knowledge of the ports with which he traded, the commodities in which he dealt, the vehicles in which they were carried, the dangers to which they were liable, and the various kinds of men through whom he acted." (Famous Americans, p. 236).

STEPHEN GIRARD.

Among his ships were "The Rousseau," "The Voltaire," "The Helvetius" and "The Montesquieu," named after noted French Infidel writers whom he admired and whose books he loved to read. Like every other prominent Freethinker, Girard has not escaped the malignity of Christian charity, hence some of his personal acts are worthy of mention. One of the epidemics of the olden time was the yellow fever. When it came, it came as a scourge, a terror, people deserting cities to escape its ravages, and the dead were gathered in heaps and buried in trenches. Christians used to try to ward it off through prayer. Now science has taught us the value of hygiene and cleanliness, and we have it no more.

In 1793 Philadelphia was afflicted with this calamity. Out of a population of twenty-five thousand, one-half fled and over four thousand died. Of those who remained, one avoided another as he would a savage beast. It was impossible to secure the services of enough who had escaped the malady to take charge of the sick and dying. Two men of wealth in the city offered their services to take charge of the hospitals. Peter Helm was one and Stephen Girard was the other. O ye canting, whining hypocrites of the cross, could you but have seen this Infidel, without belief in your God or your Savior, nurse the sick, receive the last messages of the dying, burying the dead, to say nothing of giving financial aid in the city's great distress, your sense of justice might not be quickened, but your ignorance and bigotry would receive a smite. In 1797 and 1798 came the yellow jack again, and on both occasions Stephen Girard was at his post of duty.

In 1811, when Congress refused to re-charter the old United States Bank, Girard bought it out and started a bank of his own. This was fortunate, for in 1814, during the war with England, the credit of the government was at its lowest ebb. Five million dollars were required to carry on the war, but after weeks of effort, only twenty thousand dollars could be raised. So little faith had Americans of that time in the reliability of their government. This regardless of the fact that the interest was seven per cent., and in addition, a bonus of twenty dollars. Stephen Girard then subscribed for the remaining $4,980,000, and the government was relieved of its embarrassment. In 1816, when it was impossible to sell the stock for a new United States Bank, he bought $3,100,000 worth and thus secured its establishment. He was the strong arm of all great enterprises, was careful and farseeing and seldom met with reverses.

On February 12, 1830, Mr. Girard was injured on the street by a truck, from which injury he was confined to his house, dying December 31, 1831. He left the largest fortune of any American of his time. Many asked, "What will become of 'old Girard's' money?" He had no children, but many nephews and nieces, who were Roman Catholics. Marriages had been contracted with these with the future possession of the great financier's money as the chief motive. A short time before his death he made a will, the provisions of which had been kept a profound secret. Upon his death the grasping Christian relatives could not wait until after the funeral, but insisted that the will should be read at once. How great was their consternation! Those who had expected a million found that they were to receive only from five to twenty thousand dollars, while the bulk of the estate was to be given to the public. For improvements in Philadelphia he left $500,000; to Pennsylvania for canals, $300,000; to the Pennsylvania Hospital, established by Benjamin Franklin, another Infidel, $30,000; to the Freemasons of Pennsylvania, $20,000; to the Deaf and Dumb Asylum, $20,000; to an orphan asylum, $10,000; for fuel for Philadelphia poor, $10,000; for relief of distressed sea captains, $10,000, and for a school in Passayunk, near Philadelphia, $6,000. The remainder of his wealth, consisting of $6,000,000, was turned over to the city of Philadelphia for the establishment of a school for orphans, who, therein, were "to be plainly but wholesomely fed, clothed and lodged; instructed in the English branches, in geometry, natural philosophy, the French and Spanish languages, and whatever else might be deemed suitable and beneficial to them." And he says very significantly: "I would have them taught facts and things, rather than words and signs." When this part of their education was finished, the students were to be apprenticed to "suitable occupations, as those of agriculture, navigation, arts, mechanical trades and manufactures." Here he proved himself to be a pioneer in practical secular education, the only kind worth having. He also desired that the young men educated in his college should be trained in patriotism, loyalty and love of republican institutions. The result was that three-fourths of the Girard college graduates prior to the Civil War joined the Union army.

The proviso which horrified the Christian world, and caused an action to set the will aside, is—as follows—the italics used being those of Girard himself—so thoroughly did he detest superstition and priestcraft:

"I enjoin and require that no ecclesiastic, missionary, or minister of any sect whatsoever, shall ever hold or exercise any station or duty whatsoever in said college; nor shall any such person be admitted for any purpose, as a visitor, within the premises appropriated to the purposes of said college." He then says, the scholars should be taught "the purest principles of morality," that they may "from inclination and habit evince benevolence toward their fellow creatures and a love of truth, sobriety and industry, adopting at the same time such religious tenets as their matured reason may enable them to prefer." Girard knew priestcraft and determined to protect the youth against its taking the advantage of the undeveloped minds of youth. This will caused a sensation, and the Christian heirs, securing Daniel Webster as their lawyer, brought suit to have the will set aside. The case was tried before the great American jurist, Judge Joseph Story. Notwithstanding that the sympathy of the churches and the clergy was behind the heirs, they were defeated, Judge Story holding that the will must be executed as written.

Work on the college was begun in 1833, and it was opened to students in 1848. Christians, who prate so much about law, order and justice spurn all three when they conflict with their interests. Christian city officials in Philadelphia have used Girard's millions as a means of graft. While the men at the head of the institution have not been ministers, religious services have been and are held in Girard College contrary to the will of the founder, sustained by the Supreme Court of the United States. They have even had the audacity to build a church on the premises and dedicate it to Stephen Girard! Christians having failed to steal his mind and his money, actually tried to steal his body. He had left the Roman Catholic church and joined the Freemasons. Between these two organizations, as is well known, there is deadly enmity. His body had been temporarily placed in a vault of the Holy Trinity Catholic church, the vault being the property of a Romanist Frenchman who had married a niece. When the college was finished a marble sarcophagus was placed in the rotunda for its reception. When this was ready, in 1851 the church refused to permit the body to be moved, and Girard's Masonic brethren were obliged to get an order from the court to obtain it! Such is the Christian idea of honesty.

Until 1869, the control of the college was under a board chosen by the city council of Philadelphia, when by an act of the legislature it was transferred to trustees appointed by the Common Pleas judges of Philadelphia. The value of the Girard estate in 1909 was $35,000,000, of which $550,000 was devoted to other charities than the college. Any Christian philanthropist might well emulate the rational, sensible, and at the same time high and noble motives of the Infidel, Stephen Girard. Others have established institutions of learning whose benefits were practical only for the rich. He established one especially for the poor.

Other events of which the past week is the anniversary are:

May 20, C. B. Reynolds convicted of blasphemy, Morristown, N. J., 1887. J. S. Mill born, 1806. Columbus died, 1506. Lafayette died, 1834. May 21, Alexander Pope born, 1688. Victor Hugo died, 1885. Stephen Pearl Andrews died, 1886. Dio Lewis died, 1886. May 22, Decalogue claimed to have been revealed to Moses, 1491 B. C. May 23, Savonarola burnt by order of the pope, 1498. First newspaper regularly published in England, 1622. James Otis died, 1783. May 24, Wm. Lloyd Garrison died, 1879. May 25, Ralph Waldo Emerson born, 1803. May 26, Thomas Campanella, Freethinker, died, 1639.

Trials of a Twin.

In form and feature, face and limb,
I grew so like my brother,
That folks got taking me for him,
And each for one another.
It puzzled all our kith and kin,
It reached a fearful pitch;
For one of us was born a twin,
And not a soul knew which.

One day, to make the matter worse
Before our names were fixed,
As we were being washed by nurse
We got completely mixed;
And thus you see, by fate's decree,
Or rather nurse's whim,
My brother John got christened me
And I got christened him.

This fatal likeness even dogged
My footsteps when at school,
And I was always getting flogged,
When John turned out a fool;
I put this question, fruitlessly,
To every one I knew,
"What would you do, if you were me,
To prove that you were you?"

Our close resemblance turned the tide
Of my domestic life,
For somehow, my intended bride
Became my brother's wife.
In fact, year after year the same
Absurd mistakes went on,
And when I died, the neighbors came
And buried brother John.

—Anonymous.

Slipped His Mind.

"Tommy," said his mother reprovingly,
"what did I say I'd do to you if I ever caught you stealing jam again?"

Tommy thoughtfully scratched his head with his sticky fingers.

"Why, that's funny, ma, that you should forget it, too. Hanged if I can remember it."

The Best Solution.

"Bridget, you have broken as much china this month as your wages amount to. Now, how can you prevent this occurring again?"

"Oi don't know, mum," said Bridget,
"unless ye raise me wages."

Why Worry?

Another home problem is solved by a firm of cleaners in Grinnell, Iowa, which advertises: "Notice—ladies—why worry about your dirty kids when we clean them for fifteen cents?"—Chicago Tribune.

The Naughty Boy.

"I'm afraid, Tommy," said the lad's Sunday school teacher, with much dignity,
"that I'll never meet you in Heaven."

"Why, what have you been up to now?"
queried Tommy, innocently.

The Simpler Joys.

"Does your daughter play Mozart?" we asked, displaying unusual erudition.

"I believe so," she replied deprecatingly
"but I think she prefers euchre."—Philadelphia Ledger.

The More Delicate Sense.

"Bobbie, your face wants washing. Did you look at it in the glass this morning?"

"No, mother, but it seemed all right when I felt it."—New York Sun.

In Olden Days.

An irate Neolithic man,
His anger to assuage,
Once stoned a peaceful mastodon
('Twas in the stony age).

His simply-costumed lady-love,
Who dearly loved to pun,
Remarked, with sparkling, roguish eyes,
"What has the mastodon?"
—Chaparral.

THE LETTER BOX.

LUCY WATERS PHELPS, Massachusetts.—The motto on the postcards, "To plow is to pray, to plant is to prophesy, and the harvest answers and fulfils," is the epigraph to Ingersoll's lecture "About Farming in Illinois." There is more truth in it than in all the law and the prophets.

B. LARSON, Milwaukee.—You will have to take that classic editorial, "The Tendency Toward Good," off our hook and hang it on that of our associate, Professor Bowne, who seems to have come to the Rationalists with a message. Readers oblivious to our own merits are hanging all sorts of medals on him, to our intense mortification, envy and chagrin.

E. B. COOK, Kansas.—The evangelist has already learned from experience that he cannot convert persons of our persuasion, or Freethinkers. He can influence only believers, and his trail-hitters are largely church members. He disposes of the unbeliever and the moralist by damning them in advance. They are not on praying grounds nor interceding terms for mercy.

W. S. ESSEX, Canal Zone.—When you feel, as you say "the desire to write and give a word of praise for the excellent paper, THE TRUTH SEEKER, you should by all means obey that impulse. Praise from a subscriber in good standing is known to be sincere. Putting out a paper and getting no response except in the curt and undecorated language of a check or postal order is less satisfactory than when the remittance is accompanied with remarks showing that the reader takes notice of the paper's excellence.

B. A., New Jersey.—The Saturday Evening Post for May 12 contained a picture of our old friend, the late G. H. Purdy, who was on the flagship Olympia with Dewey at Manila Bay. Mr. Purdy appears in a group of ancient mariners used to illustrate the old navy, and from his attitude seems to be making some matter clear to his mates. He deserves the title of his country's defender, as he began in that capacity about 1862, and spent the ensuing forty years in the army and navy. THE TRUTH SEEKER followed him around the globe.

R. J. CRONIN, Michigan.—The statements of "A Philadelphian" in the Press about the death of Franklin, that he had a picture of Christ where he could look at it while dying, and that he died with his eyes resting on it, are Protestant trimmings on the deathbed of an unbeliever. In the Catholic version the picture is of the Immaculate Mother. His professed creed: "I believe in one God, the creator of the universe; that he governs it by his providence; that he ought to be worshiped; that the soul of man is immortal," is substantially the same as that of Paine, who said: "I believe in one God and no more, and I hope for happiness beyond this life." Believers in one God instead of three were Deists, the early Freethinkers, and were called Infidels. Had Franklin been orthodox he would have said he believed in three gods, Father, Son and Holy Ghost. For a full consideration of the religious belief of Franklin read Remsburg's "Six Historic Americans." ($1.25).

THE CHRISTIAN MYTHOLOGY

A Work that Traces the Principal Features of the Christian Religion to Their Source in the Mythologies of Older Religions.

By BRIGHAM LEATHERBEE
Illustrated.

A feature of the work is the uncovering of the phallic principles in Christianity, to which the key is given in a series of illustrations.

"The Christian Mythology" is printed on light but substantial paper, convenient in size, handsomely bound in cloth, with gold sidestamp, and is provided with a sufficient index and a Bibliography that guides the reader to works drawn upon as authorities. The unpretentious little volume will bring light to thousands who know nothing about the origin of the dogmas they believe or the rites they practice.

Published by
The Truth Seeker Co.
62 Vesey Street - New York
Price, 75 cents

THE REASON WHY. A Story for Freethinkers. By Ernest E. Russell. Paper, 50 cents.

The Ingersoll Birthday Book

Selections by
GRACE LELAND MACDONALD

(Mrs. G. E. Macdonald)
Preface by EVA INGERSOLL-BROWN.
(Granddaughter of Ingersoll)
Decorations by PAUL F. BERDANIER.
Cover by HUGH HENNESSY.

Printed in Color on Cameo Plate Coated
Sepia Paper, 252 pages, Octavo.
Descriptive Circular sent free on application.

PRICE, $1.65 POSTPAID
The Truth Seeker Company
62 Vesey Street, New York

THE REASON WHY

A Story for Freethinkers

By ERNEST E. RUSSELL

We do not know which will be most admired in this book, the narrative or the argument, for both are rich. The author has pictured religion as it is preached and talked, and has added brilliant and informing chapters on modern thought about religion.

In Paper Covers, 50 Cents

THE
TRUTH SEEKER OFFICE
NEW YORK

TRACTS REPRINTED

CAN JESUS SAVE? By W. E. Clark. 5 cents.

There is a new idea in this little work for Christian believers to consider.

CREDENTIALS OF CHRIST. LACK OF PROOF THAT HE WAS AN ACTUAL PERSONALITY. By Parish B. Ladd. 5 cents.

Judge Ladd examines, from the established rules of evidence, the pretensions of the church as to the necessity for a Redeemer, the prediction of his coming, and the testimony that he finally appeared upon earth—"Not Proven."

CASE OF BILLY SUNDAY (the). By James F. Morton, Jr., Franklin Steiner and George E. Macdonald. 5 cents. $2.50 a hundred.

One of the most effective exposures ever printed. Has done more than any other cause to discomfort the notorious "gutter evangelist," and should be made to follow him in large quantities, wherever he goes.

FALSE TEACHING OF THE CHRISTIAN CHURCH. By L. K. Washburn. 5 cents.

An earnest appeal to the human consciousness to emancipate itself from the falsehoods instilled into it in the name of religion.

INGERSOLL'S ADVICE TO PARENTS. By R. G. Ingersoll. 10 cents per dozen.
Keep Children out of Church and Sunday School.

OUR ANONYMOUS BIBLE. Is Scripture Infallible and Divinely Inspired? By Chas. L. Snyder. 10 cents.

The negative answer is supported by an array of proofs which the most ardent Bible believer will be unable to refute.

WHAT WE OFFER IN EXCHANGE. By W. A. Crofut. "If you take away my religion, what will you give in its place?" 5 cents.

HOW CHRISTIANITY BEGAN. By Gen. William Birney. Locating the time and place when the religion of Christendom arose. Price 7 cents.

The Candle from Under the Bushel

(Mark iv, 21); or,

1,306 Questions to the Clergy

And for the Consideration of Others.

Instructive, Interesting, and Laughable.

By WILLIAM HART

Price, paper, 50 cents; cloth, $1.00.

Address THE TRUTH SEEKER CO.

MYTH AND LEGEND IN THE BIBLE

By Keighley Snowden.

A valuable handbook for those who desire to keep handy a clear statement of the most assured results of modern thought as applied to the critical examination of the Bible.

Price, cloth, $1.50.

Address, THE TRUTH SEEKER CO.,
62 Vesey St., New York.

The Influence of the Church
on

Marriage AND Divorce

By JOSEPH McCABE

Marriage law reform is a subject which is likely to assume greater prominence in the near future. There does not exist in English a complete study of the historical influence of the church on marriage. The lack is supplied by Mr. McCabe's new book, which deals fully with the Roman and medieval systems and the modern humanist development.

PRICE, CLOTH, $1.75

The Truth Seeker Co.
62 Vesey St. - New York, N. Y.

THE CASE OF BILLY SUNDAY

A complete exposure of the greatest charlatan of the age, exhibiting his coarse vulgarity in the pulpit, his medieval theology, his insane bigotry, his vulgar abusiveness, and his fundamental dishonesty. Contains the famous parallel columns showing his stealings from Ingersoll, and presents unanswerable proof of the deliberate falsehoods with which he has sought to turn aside exposure. Now is the time to circulate this most effective of all propaganda documents by the hundreds and thousands.

PRICE, FIVE CENTS

For sale by
THE TRUTH SEEKER
62 Vesey Street, New York City

SELF-CONTRADICTIONS OF THE BIBLE. By W. H. Burr. One hundred and forty-four propositions embodying the most palpable and striking self-contradictions of the Bible with a summary. Price 15 cents.

THE FOURTH DEMAND. Religious Teaching in Public Schools, with Reasons Why It Should Be Abolished. By Woolsey Teller. This is a fresh and up-to-date discussion of the subject. Price, 10 cents.

DESIGN ARGUMENT. Anatomically and Physiologically Considered. By an East Indian. Per copy, 10 cents; fifteen copies, $1.

ANTICHRIST. By Ernest Renan. Paper, 50 cents; cloth, $1.00.

The R. P. A. ANNUAL 1917

LIST OF CONTRIBUTIONS:

RELIGION AFTER THE WAR
Arnold Bennett

WILL ORTHODOX CHRISTIANITY SURVIVE THE WORLD WAR?

An attempt at Forecast by Representative Humanists: Sir Ray Lankester, Leonard Huxley, John A. Robson, Sir Bryan Donkin, Hon. John Collier, Professor J. B. Bury, Henry W. Nevins, Sir H. H. Johnston, H. de Vere Stacpoole, and Right Hon. J. M. Robertson, M.P.

THEOLOGY AND THE WAR..
William Archer

THE GREATEST ILLUSION..
Adam Gowans Whyte

PRE-ANIMISM...Edward Clodd

THE NEOLITH: A POEM.....
Eden Phillpotts

THE PAPACY DURING THE RENAISSANCE
Joseph McCabe

WATCHMAN, WHAT OF THE NIGHT? ...Charles T. Gorham

Sold at
THE TRUTH SEEKER OFFICE
Or sent postpaid for
40 cents per copy

TENTH EDITION. Crimes of Preachers

A RECORD OF THE CLERGY WHO HAVE COMMITTED CRIMES AND IMMORALITIES.

As was said of previous editions, the record is startlingly instructive and will open the eyes of the people, proving as it does that in thousands of cases the Bible and the Christian religion have totally failed to keep even their exponents from committing acts of grossest immorality and deeds of darkest crime.

Cover in colors. 247 pages.

PRICE, 35 CENTS

Address, THE TRUTH SEEKER CO.,
62 Vesey St., New York.

Is The Bible Worth Reading? And Other Essays

By LEMUEL K. WASHEURN

Price, postpaid, $1.

Address THE TRUTH SEEKER,
62 Vesey St., New York.

DEPARTMENT OF ECONOMICS.

Woman's Proper Sphere.

Miss Brunzell entreates me to give her the information to which I refer in my replies to her, and upon which I base my arguments against woman's entry into man's sphere of action. Now, if this be intended for sarcasm, I am limited, unfortunately enough, to but one reply, which I take from the mouth of the immortal Rosalind: "Well, said; that was laid on with a trowel!" But if indeed the lady has been vouchsafed a sufficient gleam of light amid the Cimmerian darkness of her Feminism, to perceive that there is another side to the question, then I can but compliment her upon the excellent judgment and unusual perspicacity she has shown in her choice of a preceptor. And let me assure her that, although a little dubious about the fertility of the soil in which I am about to work, yet I will conscientiously do my best.

First, then, in pursuance of my design to comply with Miss Brunzell's humble request, I will urge her to read a little wider and deeper, not confining herself to the over-flowing stream of hog-wash which in this degenerate and commercial age serves us for literature, and, in reference to which, Frederic Harrison has truly said that there is too much writing and too little of worth; but bravely plunging into the depths of those books that were written by thinkers for sane people, and not by prostitute-penny-a-liners for the corrupt and enervated palate of effeminate wonder-seekers.

Miss Brunzell might very profitably read Horace Bushnell's Reform against Nature, which contains reasonable matter couched in well-balanced style (for I cannot subscribe to Miss Brunzell's indignant discountenance and scornful discarding of everything that savors of refinement and culture). In this book, she will find much grist for her mental mill. Heaven send the mill may be in working order!

Ruskin, a name perhaps not to be lightly uttered with such titles of colossal genius as Ellen Key, but still a name with some few claims to respect, Ruskin, also, is worth a few moments' perusal, especially his fifth letter in Fors Clavigera; wherein what he has to say upon this age of business women will thrill the hearts of all virile men and womanly women, and cause the ardent feminist to gnash her teeth in indignant wrath.

The master herein clearly shows the pitiful truth that they who profess to love woman the dearest, most profoundly betray her: that those who claim to work for her emancipation are in reality agitating for her ultimate physical and mental undoing. Many of them do this in criminal prescience of the fatal result of their efforts, and among them may be numbered many congressmen who privately confess their utter disgust with the whole Feminist movement, while openly, for the sake of female votes, asseverating their whole-hearted sympathy with the scheme. Among these false friends, also, may be reckoned those exploiters of labor who, naturally, endorse a system that will bring them female laborers at less expense than, with male assistance, they are now put to. Not the least pitiful fact recognizable as characteristic of the equal-rights claimant is her utter blindness to friends and foes: her naturally consistent but politically and commercially inconsistent proneness to be bought over and betrayed by a little feigned fanaticism on the part of those who by such methods scrape a few extra votes into their ballot-box or a few extra dollars into their pouch.

Now, I hardly know my self-constituted pupil's capacity for mental raw beef. It may be that a constitutional dyspepsia prohibits all but modern skim-milk from her mental diet. Still, I will hazard the advice that she read, mark, learn and inwardly digest the sixth satire of Juvenal, a Roman gentleman (this information being for her particular enlightenment) who wrote a little while ago, and who portrayed with inspired truth and vividness the manners, customs and inclinations of his times. And if she will read this through, calmly, fairly and judiciously, my fair pupil will see a strange resemblance between that remote period and the days in which we dwell. And then, a short course in classic history will reveal the interesting fact that these manners, customs and inclinations did not prevail until the women of the times assumed an unseemly publicity, and, themselves being less than women, gave birth to sons that were less than men.

Yes—and this is calmly said—there is a verity and depth in this Roman satirist that almost equals the profundity of Laura Jean Libbey or the sublime psychological revelations of "Helen and Warren." I can thoroughly recommend a perusal of Juvenal—Dryden's translation.

It is a little amusing, mon eleve, to read what you say of Strindberg. Because woman renders herself idiotic in copying man, ergo man, a posteriori, is an absurd creature. Now, listen for a moment.

The average man can take an ice-cold plunge on every day of the month—a most hygienic custom, far from absurd. But if the average woman anywhere between fifteen and fifty failed to omit at least three of those plunges—well, what? You can furnish other examples for next lesson. The fact is this: not that woman's copy of man is absurd because man is absurd, but that woman is absurd for copying man. Man is a noble being in his right sphere, truly fulfilling his proper functions in that sphere: woman is a beautiful creature in her place, ably performing the duties that her place involves. But a man voluntarily rocking a cradle and darning a sock is a wretch, and a woman, voluntarily haranguing a mob, sweating out her life-blood in the ardors of a political campaign or wearing the helmet of a soldier, is an abortion.

It is very likely that Miss Rankin has already discovered that it is a waste of energy to talk,—if she be not the speaker!—for in the House, the other day, during some readings, she chatted and laughed the whole time with a congressman seated beside her, ignoring the proceedings of the morning as entirely as though she were secluded for a flirtation in her boudoir. Those advocates of woman's rights who aver that sex interests will in no wise interfere with or pervert the course of legislation, in short, that sex will be eliminated when the petticoats shall have come into their own, should have witnessed that congressman's attitude towards the congresswoman, the attitude of a man to a woman, and certainly not that of one man to a fellow outcast.

Here endeth the first lesson. I will conclude it with a truth to be committed to memory by next time: "What enters the mind without reason, cannot by reason be expelled." Therefore, I do not hope for great results from my course of tuition.

MARY MONICO.

THE NEW SOCIALISM.

An harmonious life is one of infinite diversity. As we advance in experience and knowledge its very complexity becomes simple.

The demonstration of a simple harmonious life among the units of a collective body will harmonize the whole.

There would be no strife between harmonious individualism and collectivism. It takes the harmonious two to form a complete whole.

Genuine capital is the product, only of labor and its necessary useful service.

All honestly acquired capital should, with security but without interest, be utilized for the benefit of all: yet when needed be subject to recall.

Let us form environments and cooperative commercial conditions favorable to the breaking away from harmful conventional habits.

We would not disturb or oppose capitalists who are managing large undertakings for the public benefit; but we would disapprove of and cease patronizing all speculations, interest and dividends, and allow all managers of big business to use this capital exclusively for the public.

Let us simply organize along educational lines and withdraw patronage from such as would still remain ignorant. All would be equally benefited and finally come into the fold.

Love and peace, hatred and war, these two opposites have no affinity; one does not beget the other.

Love and peace are immune from hatred and strife. Having all the power, safety lies with the former alone.

Soon as the people of any country understand this, and disband armies and navies, just so soon will they be safe and immune from attack and their example applauded and followed by the other nations.

Saviors! why we each and all have the saving power. Christ within us, which now we are crucifying.

The Cross! Let it not be a worshiped emblem or idol image, but a cross against every harmful indulgence.

Never mind an imaginary god. Let us substitute universal love for the real spiritual man or woman, instead of worshiping ideas or beliefs on hearsay evidence.

Man's spiritual origin or source is from above, and is the highest expression of the infinite eternity and harmony of being.

Immortal life, love and wisdom are the heritage of us all when we make the personal effort and continue to the end!

No man, woman, god or angel can do our individual and collective work necessary for salvation. I do not approve of class war, and think it futile.

I do not approve of picketed strikes, or of inciting riots and disturbances and then educating and hiring lawyers to defend us. It might afford an easy life and big pay for the lawyers; but is a heavy added burden for workers.

There is a real and a counterfeit Socialism. Before it is too late let us put on our thinking caps.

Political parties have and still may become corrupt in the forming.

Had we not best use our united means and supreme efforts to demonstrate a harmonious life that will give us health and strength for cooperative effort? The only competition should be as to who would be of greatest service for the uplift of mankind.

Should we continue to expect to find remedies for either sin or sickness? Should we not break loose from all creeds and ritualism and look and press forward instead of looking backward except to profit as to past experience?

Let everything be tested by up to date knowledge. Let children be taught nothing but tested truth. Let no book be considered moral or infallible because it has some wise sayings in it borrowed from past traditions. With the light that I have I would disdain to think or do that which militates against my brother or sister's advancement.

Let naught but love enter or proceed from our heart.

We all at present live in glass houses. Let us get together and lovingly work like bees and moles to remove the causes that have made and still continue to make of earth a holocaust.

L. L. ROBBINS.

IS LIFE WORTH LIVING?

The Workers' University Society of Chicago, A. M. Lewis, President, has just finished the most successful season of its usually prosperous career. Lewis gets the best radical lecturers obtainable and arranges debates with the clergy when he can find one that will come out in the open.

So far only liberal city and country orthodox have debated. The debate between Foster and Darrow on "Is Life Worth Living?" drew the largest crowd. The house was packed, including the platform.

Foster, in starting, claimed it was the question of pessimism and optimism. The individual man was sometimes one way, sometimes the other. If his energies exceeded his tasks or his task exceeded his energies, he was pessimistic. In youth and full manhood he is inclined to be optimistic. In sickness and senility, when his nerves are exhausted by overwork or over-indulgence, he will be pessimistic. As some one has expressed it, it depends upon the liver as to whether or not life is worth living. He said that man found himself in a hostile environment and invented three things to help him out—science, art and religion. Science enables us to facilitate purposive action. Art renders us oblivious to the evil of our particular lot, and in its contemplation we forget the drudgery involved in the supremacy of external powers over us. In religion men have conceived the existence of spiritual powers upon which they can lean and from which they can draw power, wisdom and guidance. When a man has these helps he is an optimist, but lacking religion he is inclined to be pessimistic.

Darrow, in answering, asserted that man was a coward, who dare not look the facts of life squarely in the face. That was the reason he invented religion. The actual facts will make any man a pessimist. Contemplate the horrors of disease, accidents, crimes and cruelties, and you will be sick of life. He didn't care for any more of it; and the god they invent and the heaven where there is nothing to did not appeal to him. He had investigated all the religions, Spiritualism and Christian Science, and could find nothing worth while in them. He read half a page of Mrs. Eddy's book and that was enough. It said God was love and love was God, and he asked himself what was the use of the two words when they both meant the same thing! He could get up a bigger hallucination with opium than with religion. An opium eater is an optimist, at least when the effects are on him. Opium has done more to alleviate suffering than anything else. The soldier in the field, the patient in the hospital, are dead by opium. It takes us out of the horrible existence, and for a little while we can't suffer and have the most pleasant "time of your life." The most pleasant time with him was when he was asleep. Continuing, he said: "Some say pessimism is all black, but I claim it is the only good philosophy of life; it prepares you for the worst." He was never disappointed unless he was happy. Nothing could come out any worse than he expected. Suppose you were suddenly told in full health that you were going to die to-night. You can imagine the consternation. "I do not know why you should feel badly. Then you turn to a consoling thought. The professor might turn to God and immortality, which to one would not help, because I would consider the present when I was thinking of the future. There would be one thought only that would give me any consolation and that would be that I wasn't losing anything. You take that from man and life would be a nightmare. Suppose you lived with nothing but pleasant emotions. Suppose all was joy, peace and happiness; that you never had a toothache, corns or debts, and you knew you must die; that you have to give up all—the beauty, glory and love of life, and go down into the silent grave forever—would not this alone rob you of the joys of life? Life is an unpleasant interruption of peaceful nothingness—and when the interruption is over you are at peace. It is a pleasant thought."

D. F. SWEETLAND.

A TAXATION ATROCITY.

The power to tax is the power to destroy; but in filling the war chest, that power should not be so exerted as to injure and hamper the religious, educational and scientific progress of the nation.

This progress is expressed and promoted by a religious, educational and scientific press; and among all these publications, few are profitable in a money-making sense, and nine out of ten barely pay expenses. These publications have grown up under the present second-class mail rates of one cent per pound. In fact, that rate has been the stimulus which has increased the number of mediums for the dissemination of this useful kind of public information; that rate has been the basis upon which religious, educational and scientific publications have established their business and entered upon their useful existence. To double that rate means the death of hundreds of religious, educational and scientific publications in this country, a distinct loss to the very soul of the nation. The so-called zone rate addition is an invidious surtax on the more meritorious of these publications, inasmuch as the better exponents they are of educational, scientific and religious thought and work, the more national their circulation.

The whole world was shocked by the bombardment of the beautiful Cathedral at Rheims. It was an alleged "necessity of war" that might have been avoided. The present proposition to ruin the religious, scientific and educational press of the United States by doubling and trebling the postal rates which they pay, is a worse atrocity of war than the riddling of Rheims historic cathedral. If the educational, religious and scientific papers of the country should, not in fact, go post free, like the Congressional Record, or the franked pamphlets of political parties, they should at any rate, be exempted as a class from the present proposed ruinous increase.—Catholic Citizen.

RELIGIOUS CENSUS IN BROOME COUNTY.

Highly interesting experiences were exchanged by the members of the Broome County (N. Y.) Sunday School Committee, and of the Religious Survey Committee who met last night to discuss the work done last Sunday and in the rural districts since that time.

It was brought out in the reports that while in most of the wards, the visitors received courteous treatment and with comparative ease, gathered the information they sought, the Seventh ward was found to be a difficult section to work in. At many of the homes the visitors were told to leave, and in some cases, were almost forced out.

In another ward, one of the visitors went into a cigar store to use the telephone, and in so doing, inadvertently stumbled onto a card game, with the financial stake in evidence on the table. The canvasser reported the case to the city authorities, but he reported that he did not know the outcome.

The captain of the First ward visited the saloons and hotels on Saturday so that his workers would not have to go into these places on Sunday. One of the numerous surprises encountered in the work was that there the visitor received much better treatment than he had expected. About 14½ per cent. of the people in this ward are Protestants.

In the Eighth ward, the visitors found 20 different faiths, this being the most diversified district in this respect.

People were encountered who are quite indifferent in regard to religious matters, the committeemen reported, but in most districts, those who are not attending church or Sunday school, but who have denominational preferences, greatly outnumber those who take no interest in church matters. Only one man was found who said he wanted to be listed as an Agnostic.

Mr. Beckwith, state superintendent of community betterment, gave some results of the rural canvass. In the town of Dickinson, every home was visited. Quite a number of families outside of churches was found, but 90 per cent. of these expressed a church preference.—Binghamton Republican.

SEVENTH EDITION — REDUCED PRICE

BIBLE MYTHS

AND THEIR PARALLELS IN OTHER RELIGIONS

Being a Comparison of the Old and New Testament Myths and Miracles with those of Heathen Nations of Antiquity

CONSIDERING ALSO THEIR ORIGIN AND MEANING. WITH NUMEROUS ILLUSTRATIONS.

IT is a perfect Encyclopedia on the subjects treated, containing a vast amount of out-of-the-way knowledge not accessible to the majority of readers, and all the objections to the dogmas of Christianity one is likely to encounter, grouped under appropriate heads. No author has struck harder blows at the Christian religion. It is the most important Biblical criticism that has ever appeared, being the result of many years of study of the religions of antiquity. It is thoroughly reliable, every fact being verified by copious notes and authorities.

COL. ROBERT G. INGERSOLL said: "This work demonstrates the fact that there is nothing new or original in Christianity; that its maxims, miracles, and mistakes, its doctrines, sacraments, and ceremonies, were all borrowed; that its virgin mothers, miraculous babes, courier-stars, crucifixions, resurrections, and ascensions were familiar things hundreds of years before the founder of Christianity was born. It shows that all the machinery of the supernatural has been in active operation for countless generations; that all the nations of antiquity had about the same religious experience, and substantially agreed as to the correctness of about the same mistakes. Catholicism administered on the estate of Paganism, and appropriated most of the property to its own use. Christianity furnished new steam for an old engine. Fables, like most other things, wear out and have to be patched, gilded, or replaced.

"The author of 'Bible Myths' has succeeded in showing that our Bible is not the great central fire giving light to the world, but a collection of candles and tapers and sparks borrowed by the 'chosen people' from those whom Jehovah, according to the scriptures, had left in the darkness of nature."

REV. M. J. SAVAGE says: "To me, the volume is worth twenty times its cost."

THE BOSTON COMMONWEALTH says: "Here we have evidence upon evidence that there is no myth, legend, supernatural occurrence, doctrine, rite or ceremony recorded in the Bible which cannot be paralleled in some ancient record centuries older than the page on which the same thing is narrated in the Hebrew and Christian scriptures. We confess we are curious as to how the orthodoxes of the Christian world will greet this book. We more than suspect that they will not greet it at all, but will be content to pass it by in fearful silence."

Seventh Edition: Large 8vo, cloth, 614 pages, $2.

Address THE TRUTH SEEKER :: 62 Vesey Street, New York

In Best of Humor.

Misunderstood.—Mistress—"Are you married?"
Maid—"No'm. I bumped into a door."
—Awgwan.

Ponder This.—Happiness comes to us by degrees. We have to bite through the bread before we reach the chicken in the sandwich.—Indianapolis Star.

Bittersweet.—"Am I good enough for you?" sighed the fond lover.
"No," said the girl, candidly, "you're not, but you are too good for any other girl."—New York Times.

Religion in War-Times.—"Vicar, I beg of you not to mention the 'fires of hell' in your sermon to-day. It would only lead us into temptation during this terrible shortage of coal!"—Le Rire, Paris.

Professing Too Much.—"My dear lady, I go further than believing in woman suffrage; I maintain that man and woman are equal in every way."
"Ah, professor! Now you're bragging."—Life.

Close Friends.—"It is indeed hard," said the melancholy gentleman, "to lose one's relatives."
"Hard!" snorted the gentleman of wealth. "Hard! It is impossible."—Town Topics.

Poetic Justice.
The Devil sends the wicked wind
To raise the skirts knee high,
But Heav'n is just
And sends the dust
To close the bad man's eye.
—Pitt Panther.

Try This.—Mrs. Crawford—"Haven't you ever discovered a way to get money out of your husband?"
Mrs. Crabshaw—"Oh, yes. All I have to do is to threaten to go home to mother and without a word he hands over the railway-fare."—The Lamb.

Som Mining.—"Well, Rastus, I hear you are working again. What business are you engaged in?"
"I've done be engaged in de mining business, sah."
"What kind of mining are you doing, gold, silver, or diamond?"
"I've doing kalsomining, sah."—Comus.

The Yankee Mind.—Victim—"What has happened? Where am I?"
Doctor—"You have been seriously injured in a trolley accident. But cheer up—you will recover."
Victim—"How much?"—New York Times.

An Experience Meeting.—Joe Stein, of Sheboygan, divorced for wife-abandonment, is serving two years in jail for the same reason. Thomas Wagner, who married the former Mrs. Stein, been sent to jail for non-support. Stein and Wagner occupy the same cell.—Fond du Lac Reporter.

Tar-Heel Philosophy.—Tragic, but true, that even in the milk of human kindness there is very often the wild onion of selfishness.

There is no blight in which some blessing is not intertwined. For instance, a wooden-legged man does not have to have but one shoe these times.—Charlotte News.

The Limit of Jayhawker Patience.—Joshua Pringle, whose wife went away a year ago last October to stay till Saturday, and who has not yet returned, has sued for divorce. Joshua says a woman is always late in keeping an appointment, but if she doesn't show up in a year there's no use waiting for her.—Topeka Capital.

Cautious Mourner.—Walking through the village street one day, the widowed Lady Bountiful met old Farmer Stubbs on his way to market. Her greeting went unnoticed.

"Stubbs!" said she, indignantly, "You might at least raise your hat to me!"
"I beg your pardon, m'lady," was the reply, "but my poor wife ain't dead more'n two weeks, and I ain't started lookin' at the wimmen yet!"—New York American.

Contributed to This Column.—Here is a story about a real live kid I knew in Missouri: Little Earl was almost three years old. He had never traveled any in his life, and perhaps for this reason was a close observer. One day his aunt Maud got married and brought her new professor home and introduced him to little Earl. From his seat in the center of the floor Earl regarded with indifference his new uncle's friendly greetings, until he took his hat off, then instantly Earl was all interest. He had never before seen a bald-headed man, and much study had made Professor Grav as bald as Elisha. Little Earl observed his new uncle with piercing, steadfast eyes for about a minute, and then said: "Who in the devil peeled your head?"—S. VAN T.

Unexpressed.—An Alabama justice was trying a man charged with a minor offence. Law and evidence were unquestionably on the side of the defence, but the presiding justice arose, and announced: "I find the defendant guilty, and I assess a fine of five dollars, with costs. Mr. Sheriff, collect the amount, or take charge of the prisoner." The old lawyer for the defence was sitting with his back toward the justice. Without changing his position or rising to address the Court, he remarked, "Judge, please fine me for contempt of court." The justice inquired, "What d'ye mean, sir? You haven't committed contempt." The following from the old lawyer: "It's silent."

THE SOUL AND ITS BEARINGS

SHOWING

The Material Quality of the Soul and the Mechanical Nature of Its Functions and of the Business Relations It Sustains with the Environment on One Side and the Rest of the Corporal Organism on the Other.

BY JAMES B. ALEXANDER

This is a Materialistic book. The author does not believe that the soul survives the body. He says: "Is it right to lie for the concealment of a disagreeable truth—to inclose the vital truth in a pleasant husk of fiction by tricking the people with the delusion of agreeable falsehoods? No! Tell the truth! Let not the truth be brought into disrepute by unworthy and debasing associations."

A very frank book; serious, scholarly, convincing.

Price $1.00

Sold at THE TRUTH SEEKER OFFICE

Paine's Age of Reason

By THOMAS PAINE, M.A.

This edition of Thomas Paine's masterpiece is the one that is sure to become the standard for all future correct editions. It is reprinted from one of the first copies in English published by Barrois at Paris, January, 1794, and the proofs were probably read by Paine. It enables the world of the twentieth century to read Paine's AGE OF REASON as Paine wrote it in the eighteenth century. It is printed from large new type. 180 pages. 15c. T. S. Co.

THE CHRISTIAN HELL

From the First to the Twentieth Century

By

HYPATIA BRADLAUGH BONNER

There is no book in the English language which describes the theory and experience of the doctrine of the Christian Hell with such fulness of details as this work by Mrs. Bonner. No one who wishes to know what this doctrine means when carried to its natural conclusions, as in the teaching of the Roman Catholic church, should fail to secure a copy of this startling work. Mrs. Bonner's sources are entirely authentic, and the reader is held spellbound by her graphic descriptions, which grow in intensity as she reaches the climax of her subject. There are some twenty-eight illustrations in the book, taken from pictures actually circulated by the churches, which serve to bring to view all the horrifying phases of this most inhuman of conceptions. This work alone is sufficient to condemn Christianity as a thoroughly unnatural institution.

PRICE, PAPER, 30 CENTS
CLOTH - 45 CENTS

The Truth Seeker

62 Vesey Street - New York

EXEMPTING THE CHURCHES

A Presentation of Facts and Reasons to Show Why

CHURCHES SHOULD BE TAXED

Argument of

JAMES F. MORTON, JR.,

Before the Committee on Taxation of the Constitutional Convention at Albany, New York. Expanded into a pamphlet of 84 pages, to which is annexed a tract by John E. Remsburg.

It Covers All the Ground

The many pretexts for the exemption of church property from taxation examined and exposed.

Price 25 Cents

Write for rates on quantities.
THE TRUTH SEEKER CO.

ETERNITY

World-War Thoughts on Life and Death, Religion, and the Theory of Evolution

By ERNST HAECKEL

(Professor at the University of Jena)

Author of "The History of Creation," "The Evolution of Man," "The Riddle of the Universe," etc.

Of highest importance are these latest thoughts of Professor Haeckel, which embody the ideas of a Monist philosopher and Humanitarian Freethinker on War, Religion, and the nature and origin of Man. The conclusions of the evolutionists on these questions are restated, emphasized and strengthened. Apart from severely scoring the hypocrisy of nations that profess to be followers of a 'Prince of Peace, and yet enter upon wars of conquest and make arms and munitions their trade, what the author has to say on the merits of the parties to the present war is given in an appendix. In the main he confines himself closely to the themes indicated—science, religion and humanity. He rejects utterly the Christian scheme of this world or any other.

Cloth, $1.25 net.

THE TRUTH SEEKER COMPANY

62 Vesey Street, New York

SELF-CONTRADICTIONS OF THE BIBLE. By W. H. Burr. One hundred and forty-four propositions embodying the most palpable and striking contradictions. Price 15 cents.

News of the Week.

The United States May 16 loaned to Russia $100,000,000.

Dr. Paul Ritter, the Swiss minister at Washington, has been appointed minister at the Hague.

Honduras has severed diplomatic relations with Germany, following the lead of Guatemala.

Paul N. Milukoff, minister of foreign affairs for Russia, has resigned. He left the cabinet altogether.

More than 10,000 American chemists, metallurgists and mining engineers have been enrolled to help in the war.

Nicaragua has severed diplomatic relations with the German government, following the lead taken by the United States.

Frederick C. Penfield, United States ambassador to Austria-Hungary for the last four years, arrived in New York May 17 on a French liner.

The formation of a naval staff, of which Admiral Sir John R. Jellicoe, first sea lord, will be chief, was announced in the House of Commons, May 14.

Judge Martin, in Common Pleas Court, May 16, signed a decree for the removal of Harry K. Thaw to the Pennsylvania Hospital for the Insane in Philadelphia.

Professor Guillaume Stengel-Sembrich, seventy years old, husband of Mme. Mercella Sembrich, one of the world's most famous singers, died May 15 in New York.

The Women's Patriotic League of Solingen, Rhenish Prussia, Germany, is making a collection of women's hair from which to weave belting for use in munition works.

The United States Envelope Company, whose main offices are in Springfield, Mass., will provide 750,000 envelopes daily, without charge, for the use of the new United States army.

The administration has surrendered unconditionally to Senator Hiram Johnson and other leaders in the Senate and the House who have fought the proposed newspaper gag law.

Great Britain received May 14 a third instalment of $25,000,000 of the $1,000,000,000 which the United States has agreed to loan to meet British purchases in this country during May.

An official souvenir, made from the ruins of historic structures that have been demolished by the Germans, will be given to Americans who contribute to the fund for the restoration of France.

Mrs. William Sunday, wife of the evangelist, was taken from her home at 184 Northern Avenue to the Audubon Sanitarium, at 8 St. Nicholas Place, May 19, and was operated on for acute appendicitis.

President Wilson May 18 directed that a division of United States regulars, under command of Major General Pershing, proceed to France and co-operate with the Anglo-French forces as soon as possible.

The franchise bill which was introduced in the House of Commons May 15 by Walter H. Long, secretary of state for the colonies, contains Great Britain's reward for the loyalty and fortitude of its women.

Every unnaturalized German in the Southern District of New York, which includes Manhattan Island, will have to hold a government permit if he wishes to move freely about New York City during the war.

Senate and House conferees agreed May 18 on disputed provisions of the navy personnel bill, increasing the navy's enlisted strength from 87,000 to 150,000 men, and the Marine Corps from 17,000 to 30,000 men.

When Arthur James Balfour returns to England he will take with him a check for $200,000 for the benefit of the war widows and orphans of England and Scotland, the anonymous gift of one of New York's foremost citizens.

Colonel Theodore Roosevelt formally disbanded his division May 20. In a communication addressed to the 285,000 men who had signed up to follow him he urged them to render national service in any way they could find open.

President Wilson has written Chairman Pou of the House Committee on Committees, urging appointment of a special committee on woman suffrage. Woman suffrage workers have fought for years for appointment of such a body.

All railroads have been called upon by the war board of the American Railway Association to readjust their service immediately so as to make available the maximum transportation energy for moving fuel, food, material and troops.

Fire of undetermined origin which started May 15 in the five-story brick receiving building at the New York Navy Yard destroyed that structure and caused a loss which probably will run into the hundreds of thousands of dollars.

A Russian-American committee was organized May 17 at Petrograd to assist in an economic and industrial rapprochement between the two countries and the coordination of various organizations interested in Russo-American affairs.

Mrs. Belva A. B. Lockwood, the first woman admitted to practice before the Supreme Court, a pioneer in the woman suffrage movement, and the only woman who was ever a candidate for President of the United States, died at Washington, D. C., May 19, in her eighty-sixth year.

When Edwin Craig, a Pullman porter, brought home to his wife May 18 a purse that he had picked up in the Grand Central Terminal, she became so frightened at the sight of the roll it contained that she hurled it into the stove. Before her husband could rescue it $800 of the $5,300 it contained had been burned away.

John Redmond, leader of the Irish Nationalists in the House of Commons, rejected, May 17, the proposal of Premier Lloyd George for a settlement of the Home Rule question by the exclusion of six Ulster counties, but accepted the proposal for the calling of a convention of Irishmen to decide on a government for Ireland.

THE WAR.

Russian troops have again forced a crossing of the Dnial River, on the Mesopotamian front, northeast of Bagdad.

Hindenburg has been forced to throw 900,000 German reserves against the French and British fighting lines on the West Front.

A squadron of American torpedo boat destroyers has crossed the Atlantic and is patrolling the seas in war service.

The Germans have about 325 submarines in operation and about one hundred have been lost through British nets alone.

Russian troops on May 18 met and defeated a German attempt to take the offensive on the Galician front.

General Henri Philippe Pétain has been appointed commander in chief of the French armies operating on the French front.

The German Zeppelin L-22 was destroyed May 14 by a British naval battleplane in the North Sea, off the east coast of England.

The British transport Cameronia, with troops, was torpedoed by an enemy submarine in the eastern Mediterranean on April 15. One hundred and forty men are missing, and are presumed to have been drowned.

British troops have struck strong blows in the spring offensive on the Macedonian front. Nearly three miles of trenches have been cut from the Bulgarian first line system between Lake Doiran and the Vardar valley, the Centre of the front.

The Austrians have made a tremendous effort to stop the Italian offensive and have failed. May 16 was a day of violent fighting on the Julian front. After a series of Austrian counter attacks the Italians advanced and made considerable progress.

It is reported from Romanshorn, on Lake Constance, that since the death of Count Zeppelin, who always was supported by the kaiser in his aerial work, many employees in the Zeppelin factory at Friedrichshaven have been dismissed and ordered to join the army.

Both the British and French crushed heavy Hindenburg attacks May 16, Haig blocking them on the north bank of the Scarpe, between Roeux and Gavrelle, and Pétain on the western slopes leading up to the Chemin-des-Dames.

Great Britain's shipping loss for the week ending May 16 through mines and submarines was considerably under half that inflicted during the week before, according to the official figures.

The ancient basilica and the Archeological Museum at Aquileia, at the head of the Adriatic, northwest of Trieste, were each struck by an explosive bomb during a raid by Austrian airplanes on Sunday, May 13, and suffered damage considered irreparable.

Statistics for the week ending May 13, at midnight, show that 952 ships exceeding 100 tons entered French ports, while 991 vessels sailed. Three ships of more than 1,600 tons were sunk by submarines. Four French merchantmen were attacked, but escaped.

The Socialist leader, Georg Ledebour, declared in the Reichstag May 16 that it was impossible for Germany to win a war of subjugation, and expressed the conviction that a revolution must happen in Germany as it had happened in Russia.

Seventeen French merchantmen were sunk by German submarines during February, March and April, according to an official statement issued May 14. In the same period nine French vessels were attacked by underwater craft, but escaped. No armed merchantmen have fallen prey to the U-boats.

As a result of a meeting in Petrograd of the commanders in chief from all the fronts except the Caucasus, the Russian Generals Brusiloff and Gurko have withdrawn their resignations, and reports of further resignations are refuted by the definite announcement that all the commanders have decided to remain at their posts.

Failure of Von Hindenburg's efforts to stop the British progress in the Arras battle is shown by the fact that the last Germans who held out in Bullecourt have been captured and the whole village was in British hands May 17. On the French front German attacks were incessant, but vain.

The French torpedo-boat destroyer Boutefeu was sunk by striking a mine in the naval engagement between Entente and Austrian vessels in the Adriatic on May 15.

News that the Swedish steamers Vesterland, Aspen and Viken, laden with grain from England, had been sunk by German submarines was received at Stockholm, May 20 and caused much indignation.

The British steamship Highland Corrie was torpedoed without warning on May 16. Six members of the crew and two passengers were killed by the explosion.

The Italians on May 18 reached the crests of Hill 652, on the Vodice. These positions are the key to the Austrian defenses, north of Monte Santo.

Field Marshal Haig resumed the offensive on the Arras front May 20, on a major scale. South of the Scarpe more than a mile of the original Hindenburg line between Bullecourt and Fontaine-les-Croisilles was wrested from the enemy.

Lectures and Meetings

The New York Secular Society. Mr. Irving Meirovits of this society will speak at Thirty-seventh Street and Broadway every Wednesday and Saturday night.

The Clarksburg (W. Va.) Rationalist Society holds its next meeting May 27 in the Court House at 2 P. M. The success and interest of this society so far indicates that it has a great future. All persons who are not afraid to think and who believe in the open mind should join this society, and help in the great work of freeing men's minds from superstition. A lecture course is now being prepared. Address G. A. Miller, Secy.-Treas., 644 S. 7th street, Clarksburg.

The Seattle Rationalist Society meets Saturday at 8 p. m. in Strand Hall, 1525 Fourth avenue, Seattle, Wash.; L. A. Wheeler, president, 1330 First avenue. THE TRUTH SEEKER and other Free-thought literature for sale at all meetings. Admission is free. The Society will adjourn after Sunday, May 27th meeting for the Summer season, to Sunday, Sept. 2d, 1917. It would be pleased to hear from Rationalist speakers coming that way. J. H. Christian, Sec'y., 1330 First Ave., Seattle Wash..

Tacoma Rationalist Society. meets every Sunday at 3 p. m. in Maccabees Hall, 1109 Broadway, Tacoma, Wash. S. T. Hammersmark, Secy., Colonial Hotel.

The Ferrer Association holds public meetings at the Ferrer Centre, 63 East 107th street, New York, every Saturday and Sunday evening. May 28.—"Shelley." By Jacob Robbins.

The Paterson Philosophical Society meets Sunday evenings at 8, at 202 Market st., over Garden Theater. Live subjects; interesting speakers. Frank Bamford, 111 Cliff st., secretary.

The Boston Freethought Society meets in Paine Memorial Hall, Appleton street, every Sunday at 3 P. M. J. P. Bland, B.D., is resident speaker, and THE TRUTH SEEKER is for sale at the door.

The Rationalist Society of Toledo, Ohio, meets in the Arcade Bldg., Room 133, St. Clair and Jackson sts., Wednesday evenings at 8.

The Chicago Freethought Society meets in Corinthian Hall, Masonic Temple, Sunday mornings, at 11 o'clock; H. Percy Ward, lecturer.

The Freethought Congregation of Cedar Rapids, Iowa, meets every second Sunday of the month at the C. S. P. S. Hall, corner Eleventh Avenue and Third Street; Jos. J. Hajek, Speaker.

BUSINESS MAN wishes room and board with private family. New York City or Brooklyn.—J. S., care Truth Seeker Co.

The Columbus Rationalist Association meets the second and fourth Tuesday evening of each month, 7:30 P. M., at the Hotel Vendome, Third street, opposite State House. U. C. Weatherby, president; Olin J. Ross, 23 East State street, Columbus, O., secretary.

The Friendship Liberal League, (Inc.) of Philadelphia, meets every Sunday at 2:30 and 7:30, at 1417 Columbia avenue. Open platform. The Truth Seeker and liberal literature on sale. F. Garfield Bowers, secretary, 245 N. Ninth street.

The Milwaukee Rationalist Society meets every Friday evening in Convention Hall, Republican House. Joel Rubin, Pres., 9, 10 Cawker Bldg.

The Denver Rationalist Association meets the first and third Thursday of each month at 319 Kittredge Building: Olive Oliver, president.

The Church of This World, Rationalist. John Emerson Roberts, lecturer. Meetings every Sunday morning at 11 o'clock in Willis Wood Theatre, Kansas City, Mo. Mr. Roberts' services may be secured for wedding and funeral occasions. Address, 4011 Kenwood ave., Kansas City, Mo.

The Toledo Rationalist Society meets every Wednesday evening at 8, Room 133, Arcade Building, St. Clair and Jackson streets. W. M. Braun, secretary. Speakers, Dr. Rullison, J. Carl, J. Braun and K. Pauli.

The Detroit Society of Truth Seekers (Lithuanian) meets the second Sunday of every month at 2 P. M. in C. O. F. Hall, Chene, cor. Trombly st.; Karl Rutkus, organizer, 338 West End ave., Detroit, Mich.

The Meetings of the Independent Lectureship of San Francisco, Walter Holloway, Rationalist and Lecturer, are held every Sunday night at 8 o'clock, at Golden Gate Commandery, 2135 Sutter Street, San Francisco, Cal.

JACOB ROBBINS will speak on "SHELLEY" at the FERRER CENTRE, 63 East 107th Street, New York City, on MONDAY EVENING, May 28th, at 8:30 o'clock. Admission, Ten Cents.

GOD AND MY NEIGHBOR

The Bible Reviewed in the Light of Modern Thought.

By ROBERT BLATCHFORD

IS THE BIBLE TRUE?

This is the chief subject of debate to-day between Christians and Scientists the world over.

Robert Blatchford, who does not believe it is, says: "Is the Bible a holy and inspired book and the Word of God to man, or is it an incongruous and contradictory collection of tribal tradition and ancient fables, written by men of genius and imagination?" He answers Yes to the last question.

"We cannot accept as the God of creation," he writes, "this savage idol (Jehovah) of an obscure tribe, and we have renounced him and are ashamed of him, not because of any later divine revelation, but because mankind have become too enlightened to tolerate Jehovah."

"The ethical code of the Old Testament is no longer suitable as the rule of life. The moral and intellectual advance of the human race has left it behind."

CHRISTIANS declare the highest conception of God is the Christian conception of him as a Heavenly Father. "God is love," they say. To which Blatchford replies: "This is a very lofty, poetical and gratifying conception, but it is open to one fatal objection—it is not true!"

Mr. Blatchford does not believe that a divine being would need or ask for PRAYER and PRAISE.

"If you were a human father, would you rather your children praised you and neglected each other, or that brother should stand by brother, and sister cherish sister?"

"GOD AND MY NEIGHBOR," is one of the most thought-provoking books of the age. It is discussed from hundreds of platforms and in thousands of homes.

Cloth. 248 pages, $1 postpaid.

THE TRUTH SEEKER

A HISTORY OF THE FREEDOM OF THOUGHT. By J. B. Bury, Litt.D., LL.D., Regius Professor of Modern History, Cambridge, University. A book of the highest merit. Well bound in cloth 252 pages. Price 65 cents.

THE TRUTH SEEKER

A Freethought and Agnostic Newspaper.

Vol. 44.—No. 22.

PUBLISHED
WEEKLY

New York, June 2, 1917.

62 VESEY
STREET

$3.00 Per Year

THE SACRIFICE OF LIFE.

In This War, Men the Church Has Banned
Meet Death Bravely for Their Ideals.

BY ALFRED LOISY.

[This is the third installment of the essay by Alfred Loisy, the distinguished French Modernist and excommunicate, on "The Meaning of Life and Death"—a work suggested by the present war and prompted by the assertion of certain apologists that only religious faith can prepare men to live nobly and die bravely. The translation is made for THE TRUTH SEEKER by Joseph McCabe.]

WE NEED not hesitate to say that there is a rare lack of scruple—the phrase is not too strong—in those writers who venture, in the present circumstances, to maintain that only the believers in the old faith are prepared for the sacrifice which the country demands of them. We will not deny that they show courage in taking up such a position. We will not allege that their faith has led to some moral deterioration. We have no need to libel our brothers in order to protect our principles. But we have a right to protest against the insult cast upon our own faith and its martyrs, when it is said that the followers of the Catholic church alone can and do face death without flinching.

Here we have to do with facts, and facts differ from fiction. M. Bourget's hero, LeGallic—who gives up the ghost after a good deal of elegant language, which is not the fashion of heroes—finds himself ready for death because "the traditional teaching enables him to accept it at once. . . . His sentimental psychism is prepared for it, because, according to this teaching, he can offer up his suffering with an assurance that his offering will redound to the service of those he loves. His intellectual psychism is not less ready," because he has a firm hope of salvation, and "salvation is to preserve alive the best part of one's being." ("The Meaning of Death," p. 322.) We will pass over the "psychism," though no doubt Pascal would have used a different word; but, let us say it to their credit, it is not thus that the ordinary good Christians die. They make less fuss about it, and have no such intricate mysticism. They have offered and they give, like others, their lives to their country. They have exposed their lives, and they die, in order that France may live. In this they have, like their fellows, considered that they were doing their duty; and they have done it. They further believe that in doing their duty they earn the reward promised to those who are faithful unto death. It is very simple, and there is no need to seek in it a great mystery of "psychism." Many there are who die thus, with this comfort, going to sleep with this consoling vision. Peace and honor to their graves.

We are told that the others are not ready for death. Ortégue, the typical unbeliever, the type of the unbelieving genius, if you will, in "The Meaning of Death," can see in death only "the annihilation of his entire sentimental psychism," and "the annihilation of his intellectual psychism"—which means, in good old language, of his feelings and scientific thought, his life of heart and mind. He will not tolerate this "entire crumbling of his being," unless it be with "the grandeur of a melodramatic resignation."

This is supposed to be a picture of the end of a member of the Institute, who is understood to be angry at the thought of death because he does not believe that he is immortal. But, again, it is not with all this apparatus of stoic despair that the brave men who have rejected the old creed are dying today. They have, like the others, offered their lives, and yield them, for their country. They die that France may live; and in doing this they have, like their fellows, thought only of doing their duty, and have assuredly done it. They further believe that their sacrifice is not in vain; that it contributes to the preservation of what they hold dearest in the world. Thus their end is not without hope and comfort. Great enough to attach no excessive importance to their own personalities, they have created a future for the cause to which they have been faithful unto death. Yes, there are very many who die with this confidence; who pass away with faith in their human ideal. Peace and honor to their graves.

The instances I will now give are not taken from fiction. I had three especially dear friends in the French army, men close to my heart and my thoughts. All three are dead; and listen what they were and what they did.

The first, though fifty years old, served from the very beginning of the war. He was born, in poor circumstances, at Colmar. Becoming a priest and a member of a well-known religious congregation, he was for a long time attached to a Parisian college which was then controlled, collectively, and not without distinction, by the church and the university. He was a cultivated and liberal man, a fine teacher. Afterwards he was appointed head of the novitiate of his congregation, and he seemed to be destined to reach the highest offices of his society. But there arose the crisis which is known as Modernism, and, with all the sincerity of his mind, he took part in it. As far as he could, he remained faithful to his church and to his monastic body, which had been suppressed. A time came, however, when, with the assistance of Pius X, he found himself completely outside the old faith. He left the church in the fall of 1910, when Rome demanded that all the clergy should take the anti-Modernist oath. Not without a good deal of trouble he found employment, and his future seemed to be assured, when the war broke out.

A child of Alsace and France, he determined, although his age exempted him, to take an active part in the national defense. In the later months of 1914 he was stationed near Soissons, respected by his comrades, esteemed by his commanders, who saw in him the leader of men that he had been. Always the first in danger, he was shot down on January 12, 1915, near Crouy, in a district which remains in the hands of the Germans, and he has been mentioned in dispatches. His letters breathed confidence, and not a shade of fear of the fate which awaited him, and which he foresaw, having played many times with death before it struck him. Never was there a simpler and more perfect "readiness" of a living hero to meet the death which crowned him. Yet this man was worse than an ordinary unbeliever; he was what is shudderingly called in certain quarters "an apostate." He had, out of love of the truth and regard for the evidence, renounced the faith of his youth, the monastic profession, the priesthood, even all belief in theology; but he was broad enough in heart and mind to avoid despising and insulting the past, and he was not a man to flinch from any duty. It was precisely for duty that he was "adapted," even unto death.

The second friend was in his forties. He was enrolled amongst the Territorials, and was set to guard a Mediterranean port. "Sergeant X," he wrote humorously, "defends Toulon, which no one attacks." Brought up in a strict Protestant home, being the son of a clergyman, he had passed through the Normal School and the Roman School, and he had become a professor in a provincial university. He was well known for his learning, a tireless worker, a man with a brilliant career before him. He retained nothing of the Protestant creed; but he did not lose his integrity, or his spirit of devotion to duty. This learned man, who was married and had three children, felt that he was not doing enough for France, and, with the consent of a wife who was worthy of him, he procured his transfer to the active army. At the beginning of the year 1916 he was a second lieutenant, and he was mortally wounded on February 28 in a brilliant action near Arras, for which he received the cross of the Legion of Honor before he died. With his last breath he asked: "Have I done my duty?" Certainly he had done his duty, and more than his duty, if men of his kind can ever find that they have done enough. This was the "adaptation" of a great soul to a duty which he sustained until the last ebb of his strength, without other fear or regret than that he had not been able to do more—more than give his life.

The third was in his twenty-sixth year. He belonged to a good middle-class family, of what is called a "conservative" type, and he had been educated in a provincial college of the Jesuits. He had, in fact, for the purpose of protecting his belief, been obliged to take his degree in a Catholic institute. He was a studious youth, of great application, even punctilious; and he was, unhappily, very inquisitive and clairvoyant and sincere. His first doubts occurred to him, he used to say with a smile, when he read the anti-Modernist works which his superiors had given him, to confirm him in the orthodox faith. The refutation had inspired him with a suspicion of esteem for the statements attacked and, once his attention was awakened, he sought further. He had discovered that there was no certainty on the side of the theologians, and for some time, having been trained by them in an abstract dialectic, he was too restless to succeed, as he wanted, in constructing a metaphysic of duty with fine syllogisms. Gradually he became accustomed to look to the reality of things, at human nature and the facts of history. He tired of theories, and took a lively and direct interest, apart from controversy, in religious history.

He had recovered his peace of mind when the war broke out. His health was poor, but after two adjournments he became a secretary of the General Staff: an easy task in time of peace, and one that seemed still to him too easy, and weighed upon his mind, so that he asked to be admitted to a brigade of Zouaves. He began, after lining up, by having his feet frozen in the trenches near Ypres, and, after a few weeks for recovery, he returned to Belgium. He became a sergeant, and volunteered for all kinds of difficult missions; and he had the pleasure of going to hear what was being said in the opposing trenches. He was mentioned in dispatches on May 9, 1915, for a bold fight, and a day or two later he went at the risk of his life (forgetting that he had a brother, a doctor, wrongly held as a prisoner in Germany) to gather in a few wounded enemies, who had fallen between the lines and were, he said, making heart-breaking appeals, while none on either side dared help them.

In the meantime the brave youth employed his rest in study. He wrote, for instance, a short essay on the idea of the end of the world in the First Epistle to the Thessalonians. He began to learn Hebrew . . . And he was killed outright, on April 5, 1916, by the bursting of a German shell, during one of the dangerous missions he loved to undertake. For his last exploit he was mentioned in army-orders. He used to say that his companions faced death without thinking of it, without any thought about what might lie beyond. He did the same. He "adapted" himself cheerfully to meet death, yet was not ignorant how much life might hold for him. He was very clear what he would do with his life; but he knew also that, if he fell in the war, he would not die in vain.

Thus do men die of whom some would say, with a delicate shade of insolent disdain, that they had no faith. Say, if you like, that they had cast aside the ancient creeds of the Christian faith. But most certainly they had a faith, a strong and noble faith, a faith which was common to them with your dead, and which made them brothers. France has not two classes of heroes, of which one—yours—is greater, finer, holier than the other, that of what are called unbelievers. France recognizes all who believe in her, and she will never admit this shameful distinction. Our dead are, like yours, a legion, and, like yours, they have a right to respect. Shame upon the man who insinuates that Freethinkers know not how to die! Glorious was their death, and glorious their thought, because it was all of loyalty and devotion. The ancient belief which helps you was to them a shackle. They did not abandon it that they might avoid the sternness of duty. Cease, then, to insult their glorious deaths, or—let me charitably warn you—the insult will return to you, with the curse of your country.

Before the war began there arose amongst us a politico-religious movement which had a great place in the Catholic and reactionary press. The pupils of the schools, it was said, were returning to the church; and all that we could find in the way of fact was a noisy attempt, which has not yet ended, to push the propaganda of royalism under the pretext of what was called "Integral Nationalism." For various reasons, of which one of the chief may have been the absence of a monarch, the strictly monarchist movement began to languish, but this was not the case with the military nationalism, which was fostered by the danger of war and has been naturally stimulated by the war. This nationalist zeal, very admirable in some respects, and at present excusable even in the features of which we may not approve, assumes a religious color in certain minds, an intimate and, it is said, necessary alliance with Catholicism. Hence it is that we find amongst us, not exactly a religious revival, as people have been too eager to assert, but a stream, neither broad nor deep, of a mysticism which has a certain resemblance, in some of its symptoms, to the cult of the German God.

The links which attach this military religion to the gospel of Jesus are less than frail: they do not exist. But the old sacred texts are conveniently unintelligible in great part to any man who has not made a philological study of them—that is to say, to nearly all who read them—and lend themselves to every kind of nonsense which prejudice, interest, and passion suggest. That is why the Christ of the gospels, who is so indifferent to the things of this world, so contemptuous of material force, so complete a stranger to our ideas of country and nationality—the Christ whose only principle was that we must cling to nothing in the present order, leave our goods and families, abandon our life to the persecutor, sacrifice everything, in a word, in the hope that the kingdom of God is nigh and one will have a hundredfold for what one has sacrificed—this Christ of a more than pacifist ideal becomes a truculent deity, a master of extermination, the heavenly leader of the national armies, Jesus Sabaoth. Ancient mythology never witnessed so strange a metamorphosis.

It was soon found that the gospels were a veritable manual for the patriot and the soldier. Certain contradictions which they contained were easy to exploit. By the side of the absolute command, which must necessarily remain more or less theoretical, not to resist violence, to offer the left cheek to him who struck the right, to relinquish your cloak to the thief who has taken your tunic, not to concern yourself more about your life and maintenance than do the sparrows under God's care, we notice a passage where Jesus, about to go to Gethsemane, advises his disciples not in future to be without arms. (Luke xxii, 36, 38.) Thus, without taking into account the text in another gospel in which Christ openly chides the disciple who draws the sword to defend him in the garden of Gethsemane, telling him that he draws the sword will perish by the sword (Matthew xxvi, 52), they represent that in authorizing private defense—which would be a concession imposed upon his theoretical idealism by the conditions of real life—the Divine Master has equally authorized national defense; as if he had really given the slightest thought to it, or had had any idea of a national war, or had reached our modern conception of international relations, or had, with his vision of the coming kingdom of God conceived in narrow Jewish fashion, dreamed of laying the foundations of public law for societies which would last for ages.

Then there is the centurion of Capernaum. Never before has this good soldier been in such favor. Certainly the church will have to appoint him a high festival in its calendar. Yet the anecdote in which he figures is very simple, and is not exactly calculated to recommend his profession. Here is the text, as we find it in the first gospel (Matthew viii, 5-10, 13):

"And when Jesus was entered into Capernaum, there came unto him a centurion, beseeching him, and saying, Lord, my servant lieth at home sick of the palsy, grievously tormented. And Jesus saith unto him, I will come and heal him. The centurion answered and said, Lord, I am not worthy that thou shouldst come under my roof, but speak the word only, and my servant shall be healed. For I am a man under authority, having soldiers under me; and I say to this man, Go, and he goeth; and to another, Come, and he cometh; and to my servant, Do this, and he doeth it. When Jesus heard it, he marvelled, and said to them that followed, Verily I say unto you, I have not found so great faith, no, not in Israel. . . . And Jesus said unto the centurion, Go thy way; and as thou hast believed, so be it done unto thee. And his servant was healed in the selfsame hour."

The narrative says that a pagan officer, whose son was seriously ill, came to ask Jesus to cure his son, and that he begged Jesus not to put himself to any trouble on that account, seeing that his power over the spirits enabled him to effect the cure at a distance by the force of his will, just as the centurion himself ordered his men about as he willed. No Jew, Jesus said, had shown such faith in his power; and the son was cured immediately. The inner meaning is that the pagans, more docile than the Jews to the preaching of the gospel, are saved by Jesus without his going amongst them bodily. The symbolism is very far from giving us any assurance of the historicity of the fact, but the literal and obvious meaning of the narrative is perfectly clear.

And now we are told that in the person of the centurion Jesus canonized soldiers and their profession! Jesus, they say, received the centurion; therefore he did not disapprove of the profession of arms. But did he not also, if we believe the gospels, receive a number of prostitutes and publicans? Must we conclude from this that he approved the trade of the former and the rapacity of the latter? Christ, we are told, ordered the rich man to give up his wealth, but did not order the centurion to leave the army. Those who say this forget that the rich man asked Jesus what he must do to possess eternal life (Mark x, 17), and that the centurion does not at all question Christ about his salvation.

The centurion is a figure of the converts from paganism, but he is not described as being himself converted to the gospel. In the narrative the centurion simply believes in the miraculous power of Jesus, and the commentator has no right to go any further. But, it is said, Christ praises "the words of discipline" uttered by the centurion, and is not content merely to "make them his own" in refraining from blaming them. (So Paul Bourget, in the preface to "The Voyage of the Centurion.") This is merely another piece of nonsense. Jesus praises and admires the faith of this man who believes that diseases, and the spirits which cause them, obey the command of the thaumaturgus like well-drilled soldiers. It is not military discipline that Christ commends, but the absolute confidence of the father who comes to him in behalf of a sick son. The whole of this military exegesis ought, if it were not for the sincerity of the sentiment which inspires it, to be treated as childish and ridiculous.

Let the gospel remain what it is, an ideal of peace in charity. Let no one look to it for formal lessons about war; the man who finds such has put them there himself, drawing them from his own brain. Conceived quite apart from all the realities of social, political, national and international life, the ideal of the gospels is not directly applicable to them; and it is only by forced interpretations that any one can draw from the discourses attributed to Christ a rule or special directive principle for the conduct of a man and citizen in contemporary society. The only thing reasonably possible is to take the general inspiration of the sentiment of justice and charity which pervades them. Exegetical subtleties are not of the least use as regards this moral utilization of the gospels, and they are calculated only to compromise it by the arbitrary inconsistency of their deductions. As to finding in the gospels a philosophy of war—its necessity, its legitimacy, its normal conditions, the military profession and its relations to religion—it is not to be thought of unless one wishes to fall into a set of improbable fancies. You might as well ask Buddha's ideas on the matter. Mohammed alone had ideas about war, and it is not at all expedient to introduce those amongst us.

(To be continued.)

A HERE AND NOW RELIGION.

Only Casually Has It Any Relation to Heaven, a Hereafter, or Duty to God.

[Worshippers at the First Unitarian church of Des Moines, Iowa, hear sermons occasionally that would make excellent editorial articles for THE TRUTH SEEKER. The minister is the Rev. Curtis Williford Reese, who recently, taking "A Democratic View of Religion" for his subject, delivered the following discourse:]

The theocratic view of the world order is autocratic. The humanistic view is democratic. In the theocratic order God is the autocrat; and under him are various minor autocrats, called divinities, angels, spirits, fairies, demons and the like. In the democratic order the people are the rulers of their own affairs, and above them are no autocrats, supreme or minor, whose favor they must curry.

In the autocratic order all happenings whatever are the results of the will of the supreme autocrat or of the activities of his appointees. Man's will and action amount to little or nothing. At best man can only pray and hope. If he wants more water, let him pray to the rain-spirit. If he wants freedom from disease, let him petition some god or goddess of pestilence. If he wants food, let him ask and perhaps some raven will bring it. If he fears any natural force, such as wind, fire, storm, and the like, let him call upon the minor autocrat assigned by the supreme autocrat to look after that particular force of nature.

The subjects of the autocratic order look upon poverty, for example, as a divine institution. The autocratic law says, "The poor ye have always with you." To these abject subjects disease is a "visitation of divine wrath." The disease is "smitten of God and afflicted." All the woes that haunt mankind, such as poverty, disease, the social evil, bad housing, the drink traffic, sweated industry, and that matchless enemy of man—war, are all necessary parts of the autocratically ordained order of things.

But the humanistic or democratic view of the world order holds that this is man's world and that it largely depends on man what the world order shall be like. The adherents of this view hold that if man wants more water, he must build more reservoirs and lay pipe lines; if he wants freedom from pestilence, he must foster medical science; if he wants food, he must mobilize the soil; if he fears natural forces, he himself must devise protection; if he would eliminate his woes, he must do the job himself.

This revolution in religion, from theocracy to humanism, from autocracy to democracy, has been brewing a long time. Aristotle believed in "the inner perfecting principle"; Lamarck in "the slow wishing of the animals"; Darwin in "natural selection"; Wallace in "the spiritual nature"; Nietzsche in the "will to power"—all of which are simply different ways of expressing the inherent democratic movement in life.

For a long time man has been gradually breaking away from "fate" and "fatalism."

The reformers who defied the vicegerents of God were democrats in the making. They were not mature enough to break away from autocracy in religion, but they did break away from the minor autocrats.

"Free will" is the theological term, "self-government" the political term, "commonwealth" the economic term, and "self-variation" the scientific term, in which men have expressed the democratic movement.

Democracy is from within. The religion for democrats must be religion from within. The pioneers of democracy were the preachers of the religion of the spirit, which is from within.

Democratic religion insists that all foreign elements and autocratic accretions be thrown off, and that the adherents of democratic religion assert themselves as free spirits voluntarily cooperating for the common salvation. Democratic religion is freedom consecrated to the creation of truth. Democratic religion seeks knowledge through experience and thought. Democratic religion seeks holiness through good-will and purity of motive. Democratic religion seeks not the kingdom of God but the democracy of humanity.

The road traveled by democratic religion is scientific, not theological. The theological way is autocratic; the scientific, democratic. The righteousness of the theological way is imputed; that of the scientific way, achieved. In the ideal aspiration, in the heroic inspiration, in the tireless labor, in the innumerable sacrifices, in the countless achievements of science is the glory of democratic religion; and the worship of democratic religion is the splendid reverence which sanctifies men as they seek to unravel the eternal mysteries.

The method of conveyance in democratic religion is human effort, not divine intervention. Any dependence on any autocratic spiritual power to do anything for mankind is disastrous. Man in his own strength must grapple with the forces of nature. Man in his own strength must face and solve his problems. Man in his own strength must work out his salvation. There is no carriage that may be brought down from heaven. No angels will push man along. The good fairies are gone forever.

Recognizing this, science has quietly gone about the solution of pressing problems, and wonderful achievements have been attained. Fifty years ago we knew next to nothing about the great plagues, typhus for example. But within the last decade science has made discoveries which have made it possible to protect the Western front with its hundreds of thousands of soldiers from devastating epidemics. Autocratic supernaturalism has no such achievement to its credit.

Not long ago tuberculosis was said to be incurable. But now medical science says tuberculosis is curable and preventable, and proves its statement by so reducing the death toll that complete freedom of society from this disease is forecast. Autocratic supernaturalism has no such achievement to its credit.

These and other things are proving conclusively that progress must be democratic, i.e., from within, voluntary not forced; and that the democratic religion is the religion of the spirit, i.e., from within, natural not supernatural.

The end to be attained by democratic religion is human welfare. The Westminster divines gave the first place in their catechism to the question, "What is the chief end of man?" Then they gave the answer, "The chief end of man is to glorify God, and to enjoy him forever." The meaning of this answer, according to Thomas Watson, a British divine of the days of Cromwell, consists in four things: appreciation, adoration, affection, and subjection. "This," he says, "is the yearly rent we pay to the crown of heaven." According to this the chief end of man is to forever bargain with God, to forever receive certain things for certain rental. The autocrat wants praise and worship, and the subject wants to go to heaven; in both cases it is a matter of "revenue only."

Autocratic religion takes the form of "other-worldliness." According to this religion we are not now living, we are only preparing to live after death. Among the questions most frequently asked in autocratic religion is, "Are you prepared to die?" Among the texts most frequently used is, "Prepare to meet thy God." Even the children are taught to sing, "I want to be an angel, and with the angels stand." Life is spoken of as a "period of probation."

It is said that when Harriet Beecher presented herself to a Hartford clergyman to be examined as to her fitness to become a member of the church, among other questions, he asked, "Harriet, do you feel that if the universe should be destroyed [awful pause] you could be happy with God alone?" The biographer says, "After struggling in vain, in her mental bewilderment, to fix in her mind some definite conception of the meaning of the sounds that fell on her ears like the measured strokes of a bell, the child of fourteen stammered out, 'Yes, sir!'"

This reminds me of my own experience. At the age of nine I was asked by the minister who was visiting in our home during the annual revival, if I thought I would be lost if I should die. I had been taught that if a child died after reaching the age of accountability and without trusting in Christ, he was lost. I had heard that for ordinary children the age of accountability was about twelve years; but that for exceptionally bright children, the age of accountability might be reached several years younger. Believing that I, at the age of nine, was an exceptionally bright youngster, I frankly admitted that if I should die I would be lost. During the days that followed I was duly saved, immersed in the middle of the river in the middle of winter, and received into the "fellowship of the saints."

Democratic religion takes the form of "this-worldliness." Should we glorify God? Yes—if that means cooperating with the eternal forces in producing an ideal human race; otherwise, no. Should we enjoy God forever? Yes—if that means that the eternal abides in the temporal and the temporal in the eternal; otherwise, no. Democratic religion says, seize the "eternal-now," live in the "eternal-now," for the "eternal-tomorrow" never is.

The chief end of man, according to democratic religion, is to promote human welfare here and now.

Job Amongst the Stars.

"I know that my redeemer liveth."

Although that eccentric character of the Old Testament, known as Job, is accredited with uttering the foregoing remarkable words, yet no such personality ever lived, the name being allegorical only.

The book attributed to Job states that there was a man in the land of Uz by the name of Job, and that he was upright, etc., giving the narrative a personal, historical cast; and the clergy, never weary of holding up this alleged saint as the corypheus of all that is sublime in patience and resignation under the severest of afflictions.

But no one pretends to know who Job was, or how he came to write the book, or when; nor how it comes that, if a person, where or when he figures in Jewish history. The book bearing his name stands as an interpolation, an interjection, and entirely alone in the Bible.

But independently of the sublime astronomical science veiled under the allegory of a crucified savior, this book discloses innumerable episodes and underplots, subordinate to the main design, evincing an earnest effort to attach a moral corollary that will dovetail appropriately into the general gospel.

The moral of the story, based on the scientific ground-work of the natural phenomena of "the acceptable year of the Lord," which is the allegorical history of the sun in his course in the heavens, was made to exhibit to the perceptions of the wise the wrongs and sorrows which the righteous would have to undergo ere they could triumph over error and falsehood. But the modern character of this portion of the Bible is betrayed by the phrase, "Oh that my words were now written! Oh that they were printed in a book!" Printed in a book, to say the least, is an awkward figure of speech for a man to hit upon, two or three thousand years before the art of printing was invented.

Who, then, was Job? The Jewish rabbis, who plagiarized this book from the Chaldean and Arabian Astronomers, admit that the word Job was a personification, a mere imaginary being, existing only in poetry and fiction.

Our modern clergy, however, have made a poor guess in identifying Job with Jobab (the fifth descendant from Abraham), from the similarity of the name Job to that of Jobab, in the series, thus betraying their ignorance of Greek, which has no letter V in the alphabet, but always represented that letter by a B.

Hence Job, Jove, and Jehovah, are personifications of the one and the self-same great theme of all celestial allegories—the sun and the year.

And this Job, the perfect and upright man of the East, as he is painted, with his seven sons and three daughters, tempted by Satan, and falling into great affliction, and getting out of it, and becoming as prosperous as ever, and finding his seven sons and three daughters alive again, none the worse for having been killed at the beginning of the story, is a Chaldean gospel, precisely of the character of our Egyptian fable of Jesus Christ, of which the gist was nothing more than the natural history of the year which has the seven months of summer (from March to September) for its sons: the three extra-Zodiacal feminine constellations for its three daughters, the old Mother, Virgin Mary, that tempts him "to curse God and die," for his wife, and Bootes, Hercules and Serpentarius for his comforters, who descended with him into his state of affliction when below the equator; while God is invariably the God of the tribes of Israel, that is, the Ram (Lamb) of the sign of the Zodiac.

Hence, in strict observance of astronomical analogies, God the Sun, in the constellation of Aries, the ram, asks Job or Jove about the year in his affliction, and after the autumnal equinox, "Canst thou bind the sweet influences of the Pleiades, or loose the bands of Orion?" "Canst thou bring forth the twelve signs in the season, or canst thou guide Arcturus with his sons?" These are the very names by which these constellations are known today, as they appear in the heavens.

The Pleiades, Arcturus, and Orion, though fixed stars, are spoken of in the book as though they were personages, and surely they are quite as much so as Job and his three friends, or God and the Devil, who each sustain their respective parts in this beautiful astronomical drama.

Hence with the precision of that science which ascertained the motion of the precession of the equinoxes, with almost perfect accuracy, which the Herschels, the Halleys and the Newtons have not been able to surpass or dispute, this great astronomer, speaking in the dramatic character of Jove or Job—the allegorical genius of the year—has given off those remarkable words in the thirty-first chapter: "I have made a covenant with mine eyes, why, then, should I think upon a maid?"

Observe the beautiful results of the astronomical figure—the fruits of the earth are to be patiently waited for till the season of their maturity, that is, of the coming of the sun in his path in the ecliptic to the line of the equator.

This covenant takes place, not in Virgo, the Virgin of August, but in Libra, the scales, or balance of September.

Hence the accuracy of the apothegm: "I have made a covenant with mine eyes," that is, I have observed the place of the Autumnal Equinox by astronomical observation, the only way a man could make a covenant with his eyes, and that it takes place in the Balance of September—why then should I think of finding it in the Virgin (Maid) of August?

To attempt to give these words any other appellation than an astronomical one, such as the clergy try to do, is to put upon them idiotic nonsense. But when applied to the passing features of the year they are beautiful and sublime.

Having shed his blood (juice of the grape) in autumn, and consoling himself with the assurance that the sun which every year renders, or brings around again, that is, still liveth, in my flesh, says he—the mutton and beef of March and April which follow immediately after the Fish of February—"shall I see God" (the sun). Thus I know "that my redeemer liveth, and at the last day, I shall rise up out of the earth," etc. The latter day is the last day of the old and the first day of the new year, when the year was reckoned, as it then was, from March. Then it is that the sun appears in the Lamb (Aries) of March, and Jesus (the sun) has redeemed his lost sheep, and Job is reinvested with his flesh (skin), and realizes that his redeemer liveth; and no intelligent Infidel will refuse to join him (it), for they all know that their redeemer also liveth, and at "the latter day" of each succeeding winter through ages "he shall stand upon the earth." The declining year speaks to the constellations whose ascendancy marks the autumnal period, "Why should you persecute me?" that is, come after me, as God drives along the whole glorious company of the apostles, "and not satisfied with my flesh," "but are thirsting for my blood," that is, the rich juice of the grape which the year gives in autumn; and "though after my skin," etc., he passeth on till worms destroy, that is, till the scorpions of October seem to have devoured his substance and extinguished his heat. Yet no sooner shall he have passed through the Pisces (Fish) of February than "in my flesh (of March) shall I see God" (the Sun).

The year will vary and change through infinite ages, but the sun remains eternally the same.

Denver, Colo.

CHAS. M. BICE.

The Marker for Herndon's Grave.

Through Freethinkers of Nowata, Okla., Dr. Wm. Nairn, Lou Whitford and Arch Rings, have sent Judge Weik $15 for the Herndon marker fund, Dr. Nairn contributing $8, Mr. Whitford $4 and Mr. Rings $3. Dr. Nairn was acquainted with Herndon and pays high tribute to him as a lawyer and a man.—J. E. R.

Those of us who have been brought up under a rigid régime of Protestant dogmas, gradually discover their falsity, and now see them as odious, have to wonder why we so long clung to them tenaciously, defending every link in the chain that bound us. We fight off the truth as long as it is possible. No doubt this is largely because our social and domestic affections have climbed on those stony walls of dogma, covering them with flowers and fruits, and truth threatens to tear them away and cast them into the mud.—M. D. Conway.

Society is periodically afflicted with the military fever. Pity it is none is inoculated against this in the schoolroom. But the boy must grow up to think it commendable he should some day play the rôle of Abel, and for no quarrel of his own. There should be one temple sacred to peace that at least childhood might worship there.—S. D. Kirkham.

O, many a shaft, at random sent,
Finds mark the archer little meant!
And many a word, at random spoken,
May soothe, or wound, a heart that's broken —Scott.

What stronger breastplate than a heart untainted?
Thrice is he armed that hath his quarrel just;
And he but naked, though locked up in steel,
Whose conscience with injustice is corrupted.
—Shakespeare.

Religions are various, but reason is one, and we are all brothers.—Chinese proverb.

Digitized by Google

THE TRUTH SEEKER.

FOUNDED BY D. M. BENNETT, 1873
 CONTINUED BY E. M. MACDONALD, 1883-1909
 G. E. MACDONALD Editor
 L. K. WASHBURN Editorial Contributor
 Sixty-two Vesey Street, New York, N. Y.
 Post Office Box 1610.

SATURDAY - - - JUNE 2, 1917.

Who Will Defend Free Speech?

Some New York city attorney who believes in the part of the Constitution that guarantees freedom of speech should take up the cases of Free-thought speakers in whose persons the law and the Constitution are habitually violated by the police and magistrates. One of the speakers, Mr. Irving Meiowitz, has recently been repeatedly arrested on the flimsiest pretexts, locked up and fined, because he had no influential backing and no lawyer to defend him. Unless such cases are fought and tried out on their merits before juries, the open air propaganda will have to be suspended. There may be in the city some attorney who, without requiring fees beyond the ability of the Secular Society to pay, will be willing to go into the matter and help establish the right of free speech for the young men who talk Rationalism at outdoor meetings. A good fight might attract contributions that would give such an attorney something for his trouble; for the crowds are mainly friendly to the speakers and ready to support them in practical ways.

Human Progress Due to Liberty

We are living in the year of the Christian superstition 1917, and it sometimes seems as though it would be many centuries yet before it would be sunrise in the first year of common sense.

Church spires still show where it is a crime to think. The great concern of the majority of human beings is not what men are doing, but what they are believing. The chief business of religion is to get in the world's way.

Man cannot go as fast as he would like for fear of disturbing the sleep of piety. How long is the priest to give the people dope and the ministers to preach about things that never came out of the ground, the clouds or the sea?

Three hundred years ago women were burned alive in England for refusing to attend church; two hundred years ago women were executed in America for what was called witchcraft; during the last century men were imprisoned for alleged blasphemy, but today, the church, that once burned, hanged and imprisoned men and women, not for crimes but for not accepting the dominant religious faith, slanders those who deny and reject its dogma.

This world needs to learn that disagreement with the church in its ecclesiastical management is simply the assertion of the right of private judgment, and that men and women are not to suffer punishment for honest difference of opinion.

There is no sin against God, and a law that punishes a human being for such a sin ought to be erased from all statute books. Sins against man are punishable by man, but not going to church, blasphemy and doubting the efficacy of prayer are not such sins.

It is a long way from the stake and gallows to an opprobrious epithet. There is a delicious difference between being burned alive and being called an "Infidel." It is far better to be lied about than to be gibbeted. This graduation of vengeance from killing to defaming shows that religion has been forced to respect civilization. The church today can only growl and show its teeth. It is hard for the priest to realize that the world moves. He once denied the fact. The Christian church formerly persecuted those who rejected its theology, and it still holds up to opprobrium the names of men and women who were brave enough to defy the church's hate.

What has changed the intellectual darkness and moral degradation of the sixteenth and seventeenth centuries to the enlightenment and progress of the twentieth? The right to think, the right to speak, the right to criticize; in one word, Liberty! the word that the Christian church has hated in every age and the word that it fears and hates today more than any word in human language, for, from that word sprang the power which wrested tyranny from the king and priest, and in that word sleeps the power that is destined to destroy falsehood and enthrone truth; to cast down the wrong and set up the right; to drive out iniquity and put in its place justice and righteousness.

L. K. W.

Religion and Democracy.

A short time ago the startling news was suddenly flashed all over the world that Russia, from being an ancient oligarchy, had become a prospective democracy. As Christian superstitions were everywhere manifest in that priest-ridden country, it may be of interest to inquire to what extent religion has fostered the democratic spirit. And in order that we may make ourselves clear upon this subject, let us first define what we mean by the terms religion and democracy.

By religion we mean the guidance of life by ordinances laying claim to supernatural authority, and the postponement of mundane to extra-mundane interests, of things temporal to things eternal. These are the characteristics, not of Christianity alone, but of all religions which have emerged from the chrysalis stage of magic. By democracy we mean that principle of government which has special regard for the welfare of the whole body of citizens, and that holds that their welfare can best be attained, not by obedience to the will of one man or of a few, but by the expression of the collective will in the national life.

Now Asia is the home of religion, and Europe the home of reason; and as democracy is (for better or worse) a product of reason, it is certainly foreign and uncongenial to the Asiatic influence against which European reason has had so hard a fight. Huge despotisms have everywhere been sanctioned and consecrated by religion. Frequently, perhaps generally, the despots are themselves, to some degree, objects of worship, being considered as direct descendants of the original divine authority. In India empires have risen and fallen like waves of the sea, but religion never did anything to moderate the arbitrary power of the ruler, whether great or small. The land which has given birth to all the great religions has produced not a single democracy, unless we except the effort recently made in the hitherto Chinese empire. In Russia, where Asia and Europe meet, and where formerly emperor-worship was as much a part of religion as it is in Japan, we are only now witnessing a change from these tyrannous conditions because of the final uprising of a people kept in religious bondage for centuries.

The very word "politics" implies the democratic ideal; for the "polis" was the city-state, the body of freemen collectively considered. And while the words "politics" and "democracy" come to us from the beginnings of Greek history, we owe to the beginning of Roman history the conception of the "res publica," the "common wealth," the republic. Germany, fighting for kaisers, is false to the racial ideal to which Britain, fighting for her age-old "Witenagemot," is true. When we say, then, that democracy is coeval with, or even antecedent to, European civilization we are speaking the literal truth. It did not occur to the Greek or Roman citizen that he might earn an eternity of bliss by renouncing his human dignity, and absolutely subjecting his will to that of a divinely-appointed ruler. The other life, as he conceived it, offered no reward for such a renunciation. His vote was real to him, his soul conjectural. He was conscious of possessing a will, and he loved to exercise it in concert or in conflict with his fellows. He would doubtless have to leave it behind with his fleshly integument; for the shadowy state beyond the tomb was always figured as a despotism.

When Christianity in time asserted itself, and absorbed all the earlier cults, it brought with it a dogmatic other-worldliness which even despotism regarded as anti-social. The Christians were persecuted, not as being hostile to despotism, but rather as being contemptuous of it—not because they contested the principle of autocracy, but because they boasted themselves the thralls of an autocrat mightier than all the Cæsars. In a sense, no doubt, Christianity was a leveling doctrine. It pronounced all men equal before the throne of God. Distinctions of race and rank were to be entirely abolished—in heaven. Here below, on the other hand, all such distinctions were to be scrupulously maintained. Democracy, as a reasoned method of promoting human well-being under terrestrial conditions, finds likewise no encouragement in the Christian scriptures. So far as they have any political application, they may be cited in favor of an irresponsible rule, deriving its authority, not from the consent of the governed, but, directly or indirectly, from divine appointment. The truth is that the "inspired" speakers and writers knew no more of political science than they did of astronomy and geology, and that the attempt to find scriptural sanction for democracy was the thinnest of special pleading.

The Roman Catholic church has been called a democratic institution because men of humble birth have frequently risen to great eminence, and even to the greatest, in its hierarchy. But this is a mere abuse of language. An autocrat is none the less an autocrat because he is the son of a butcher or a candlestick-maker. The church, indeed, provides stepping-stones by which men of the people may climb to arbitrary power; but that has nothing whatever to do with democracy. Very similar is the case of the Protestant sectaries who have made some show of fighting despotism. It was not democracy that they had at heart, but theocracy. How far Christianity has been from forming and fostering any reasonable conception of democracy we may see very clearly in its attitude towards two great social evils, entirely irreconcilable with the democratic ideal. The first of these evils—pauperism—Christianity for ages accepted as a permanent condition, rather desirable than otherwise. Against the second—slavery—it raised but a tardy and feeble protest.

Religious writers are constantly making strenuous attempts to show that Christianity is by rights the religion of freedom, constitutionalists, democracy, and that only its corruptions have worked in the opposite direction. The actual number of democratically-minded clerics has, doubtless, in some places, increased; but the church is today as far as it was a hundred years ago from giving any general lead in the direction of democracy. The prelate—real or imaginary—who said that the gospel precepts, taken literally, would bring society to a standstill in twenty-four hours, was much nearer the essential truth than many of our present-day religious expositors. Democracy, of all forms of government, is by far the most enlightened. We admit all its imperfections; we admit that its workings can often be justly criticized and always amusingly caricatured. But we believe that there is this great distinction between democracy and other forms of government—that it tends to correct and cast out its own imperfections, while they have no inherent principle of development or of self-purification.

Be this as it may, there is no possible means of guaranteeing enlightenment in a hereditary ruler or altruism in a caste. On the contrary, the possession of unlimited power by one man or by a few is in itself unwholesome, and tends to corrupt the man or men to whose lot it has fallen. That democracy is the ideal form of government may almost be called a self-evident proposition; and its growing ascendancy in the world today we are indebted not to any characteristic trait of religion, but to the impulse of the enfranchised intellect to free itself from the shackles of a centuries-old despotism imposed by an ecclesiastical authority based upon the supposed word of God.

Defending Ideals.

Of the day which he has appointed by proclamation for all male citizens from 21 to 30 to register with a view to performing military service, President Wilson observes that "it is nothing less than the day upon which the manhood of the country shall step forward in one solid rank in defense of the ideals to which this nation is consecrated."

We are glad Mr. Wilson spoke of our national ideals. The world at large might say that when a nation's ships at sea, carrying citizens on their lawful business, are ruthlessly sent to the bottom by the undersea assassins of a hostile nation, the primitive impulse of self-defense is a sufficient excuse for calling our manhood to the colors; still, it will be killing two birds with one stone, as it were, if at the same time our ideals as a nation can be defended and advanced.

What those things are which we mean when speaking of our ideals will occur readily to the minds of those familiar with our Declaration and Constitution. One of the first is freedom of speech, of press, and of assembly. This is not in a specially flourishing condition at the present time, when the press is threatened by Congress with a tax calculated to put newspapers out of business; when assemblies are broken up at the whim of a police officer on the pretext that they block traffic, and when speakers expressing their thoughts in public are placed under arrest, locked up, and then sent to the workhouse.

Unless such action is to be defended as a military necessity, we have preceded the defense of our ideals by destroying the chiefest of them.

There is another ideal, namely, religious equality, otherwise the separation of church and state, the abolition of all religious tests, a democracy founded on the equal rights of citizens of all beliefs and of no belief.

That is Americanism, the one thing that distinguishes it from other governmental isms. It is an ideal not yet realized; but since we are going to vast trouble and expense in maintenance of our ideals, why would not the present be a good time to vindicate this one?

To pay the cost of battling for our ideals, measures are adopted to make all men—that is, all men except priests and ministers—and all property—that is, all but ecclesiastical property—carry a share of the military and financial burden.

These exceptions, this exemption of priests and ministers from military duty and their property and the property of the churches from taxation, are violations of the American principles that constitute the ideal now held in mind, and expose our country to the charge of hypocrisy when in words it professes devotion to certain high aims and in action repudiates them.

Ecclesiastical exemptions cannot, like the suspension of free discussion, be excused on the plea of military necessity. On the other hand, that necessity which puts everything else among the ratables demands with equal reason that church property should pay its taxes; for a dollar raised in that way will go just as far as a dollar realized from any other source.

The country needs the tens of millions to be had by taxing church property just as much in proportion as it needs the hundreds it will get out of the Truth Seeker Company; and good financing would dictate that if immunities are to be granted, the government should exempt us, where only a few thousands can be levied on, and put a stiff rate of the three thousand millions of property held by the churches.

But let us have democracy and equality. Don't conscript our sons, who are young Freethinkers, and exempt the theologs and young ministers and priests.

Don't send the tax collector our way, while instructing him to avoid churches and parsonages.

How does Mr. Wilson expect us to defend an ideal that the government has neglected to make perfect, establish, strengthen and settle?

Theology and National Songs.

Our country seems to be particularly unfortunate in the matter of its national songs, both as regards the words and the music. The words to a large degree have been made simply to give permanency to ancient incidents in the life of the nation, which are wholly inappropriate amid the changed conditions that characterize our modern day. The Star-spangled Banner, for instance, which is considered by most people to be the national anthem (though not a few dispute this claim), was written at the time of the war between this country and England, during the attack of the British upon Fort M'Henry in Chesapeake Bay. When it was discovered that the American flag remained afloat during all the attack, Francis S. Key, a young lawyer who was a temporary prisoner on the British admiral's flagship, wrote the verses that have since obtained a world-wide popularity. But why should our national anthem be everlastingly recalling an incident in our history more than one hundred years old, especially in view of the fact that at the present time that nation and ourselves are close friends—allies, in fact—in the great cause of humanity?

But there is a feature of our national hymnology that interests us more than the military occurrences it records, and it is the unnecessary and inappropriate emphasis which it places upon the theological conception of life. The Star-spangled Banner tells us that "In God is our trust." As a matter of fact, so far as our personal experience goes, this as a statement of national confidence is not true. No nation and no individual places his ultimate trust in God. An appeal to heaven at the opening of Congress by a chaplain officially appointed has never yet deterred that federal body from acting otherwise than as if his celestial majesty did not exist. And as to the individual, we have yet to find the man who could truthfully say that he left the conduct of all his earthly affairs to the guidance of his heavenly father, without making the fullest provision, as the response of his own energy, to do the entire work for himself. The intrusion of a sentimental theology into a song which an entire nation is expected to approve, is contrary not only to the great Constitution, but also to the true American spirit, which, unhappily for the present generation, is fast dying out.

The same sentiment occurs in the song, Hail Columbia. Here we are taught to sing, "In Heaven we place a manly trust," whatever that phrase may mean. But it is in the "Battle-Hymn of the Republic" that we reach the height of this theological nonsense. Why should a song intended to be sung by all classes of mind and heart in honor of their country's fame and glory begin with the words: "Mine eyes have seen the glory of the coming of the Lord"? From the standpoint of well-defined and profitable thoughts, this hymn of Julia Ward Howe is devoid of any valuable meaning. It is throughout a description of Christ appearing to a religious visionary as the captain of the heavenly hosts, and warning men to give their souls to him, for "Our God is marching on." This hymn, as a national anthem, is not only offensive because of the harmful picture which it presents of God, as one who "hath loosed the fateful lightning of his terrible swift sword," but because it has about as little to do with the honor and glory of a great nation as Gilbert's "Dear little Buttercup," in Sullivan's opera, Pinafore. It is inappropriate in the most marked degree, and to inflict such words upon an unwilling community is a hardship that ought to be removed at once.

Now, why should any credit be given to a supernatural being for accomplishments that are manifestly the result of human effort? Why call to an unknown deity for counsel and material aid, when everywhere there is the evidence that what man has wrought for the benefit of the race has been achieved by his own hard work in the sweat of his brow, night and day? Was it the church or religion that discovered for us the truth about the stars, that unfolded the wisdom of the mineral and animal kingdoms, that enabled man to chain the lightning, and overcome the law of gravitation? If in these and many another department of investigation the fruits of discovery have been gathered as the result of human agency alone why perpetuate in a national song a worthless superstition which no longer has any meaning for the thoughtful of our generation?

"Church Exemption."

The Truth Seeker Company has on hand a good supply of the pamphlet entitled "Exempting the Churches," which is a presentation of facts and reasons to show why churches should be taxed. Just now, when Congress is discussing ways and means to raise revenue for carrying on the war, the members of that body should have this neglected source of income brought to their attention.

We propose to our readers that they send copies of this pamphlet to their congressmen and senators, together with a letter asking them to read and reflect upon its contents. The price of the pamphlets singly is 25 cents. For this purpose we will cut the price and send two copies for 25 cents to one address. The purchaser could thus supply his representatives in both Houses.

The government wants to raise $19,000,000 by mulcting the newspapers in an exorbitant and extortionate sum for postage. Three times as much could be realized by equal and impartial taxation on church property, which is surely better able to stand the strain than are the newspapers now struggling for existence in the face of multiplied charges for material.

If we want the members of Congress to vote for church taxation we must at least ask them to do so, and give our reasons. The best way to do this is to furnish them with the pamphlet "Exempting the Churches." Two copies to one address for 25 cents.

We are indebted to some unidentified friend in New Jersey for a disinterested and fruitful act. The following extract from the letter of a resident of that state shows what the act was:

"Inclosed find $3 to pay for a year's subscription to your paper, THE TRUTH SEEKER. A friend recently sent me a copy. I read it and said to myself: 'That is the paper for me.' It has more common sense and reason in it than anything I ever read in all my life. I shall do all I can to get my friends and acquaintances to read it and put foolishness and flimflam out of their heads."

The moral does not have to be pointed out. When sending a copy of THE TRUTH SEEKER to a friend secures that friend as a subscriber and brings us that kind of a letter, each reader can see what his next move ought to be. Present conditions should be favorable to securing new readers, for in these times of inflated prices the paper does not come high at $3. Think it over.

Provincial governments are notoriously more narrow, conservative and illiberal than those of mother countries. The fact is illustrated by the present government of Canada. While in England the highest courts and the upper house of Parliament, the Lords, have just declared that Christianity is no part of the law of the realm, that such a pretense is mere rhetoric, and that money may be lawfully bequeathed to a society the purpose of which is to combat the principles of Christianity, the Canadian government excludes this Freethought and Agnostic newspaper from its mails and refuses to issue a money order payable to the Truth Seeker Company. This in addition to confiscating our books addressed to Canadian correspondents, neither forwarding nor returning them, nor even notifying the sender that the property has been seized. The decisions of the English courts and House of Lords is in harmony with the increasingly liberal spirit of the age, but how are these pinheaded politicians of the provinces to be explained?

RESPECTFULLY SUBMITTED.

Franklin Steiner Brings Certain Things to the Attention of Rev. W. A. Sunday.

MOST GREAT AND BENIGN WILLIAM:—I use these words in addressing you with a full realization of their meaning. To your followers you are not a teacher of nor an exemplar of religion; but are regarded—as was Jesus, Paul, Mohamuned, Joe Smith or Dowie—as a religious prophet. In this, of course, I am not championing their good taste. You preach neither Christ nor Christianity, but you make use of both as a means of propagating Sundayism, for the glory and profits of yourself, the great and benign William.

You may not be aware of the fact that psychologists classify certain individuals as paranoiacs. One of these was a man by the name of Roosevelt. Ten years ago, the Roosevelt mania seemed to effect all classes, but with few exceptions all have recovered. Now, in certain localities, under certain conditions, chief of which is the dying, desiccated condition of the churches, the Sunday mania breaks out. One good thing, however, is that like smallpox, the same community is never afflicted the second time, although freckles and scars might remain as a mark of the scourge. We can congratulate you William, upon your ability to "catchem, holdem and skinem," with one stand of your circus.

I feel like giving you a heart-to-heart talk because you and I were both born and reared in the very provincial state of Iowa, in counties adjoining each other. We are both now in the great city of New York, the commercial metropolis of the world. Here, the great mass of the people, following their instinct, knowledge and experience, have judged you and your circus rightly. They see that it has every ear mark of a strict commercial transaction, and the average man here has so pronounced it. You well notice that you are not given whole pages in the daily papers as you were in small towns in the West. You must be satisfied with a column and a half, and many times with only the half. And should any of your henchmen go into a newspaper office here and tell the editor that he must not publish anything criticising you, that editor would never get through laughing. Let it be written, William, that while you are a big man in a small place, you are likewise a small man in a big place like New York.

The chief motive that prompts me to address you these lines is to be found in two items in THE TRUTH SEEKER of May 5, page 281. There it states that an offer was made to your secretary that the expenses of a criminal libel suit against that journal would be furnished if you would agree to go into court and swear that you did not appropriate Ingersoll's Decoration Day oration and deliver it as your own. This, William, touches me deeply, for I confess to you and your friends that I am co-author of this cruel "libel." This "libel" has had an extensive circulation. It was first published in THE TRUTH SEEKER of December 9, 1914. In the Sunday issues of the New York Times and Herald of January 30, 1915, it was republished, placed before nearly a million readers and telegraphed by the Associated Press throughout the United States. To further circulate this very malicious "libel," The Truth Seeker Co. printed it in a pamphlet, together with other matter concerning your august self, and in this form it has had a circulation of one hundred thousand copies. The reading of this pamphlet in San Francisco in the summer of 1915 caused you to cease your meetings, and suddenly take your departure from the Golden Gate. Now, lo! it comes home to roost and greets you in New York city. You are reported to have rejected the kind offer of your friends, and will have naught to do with a prosecution. Surely, like Jesus—and you seem to resemble him in no other respect—you are dumb before your accusers except to say that it is all due to the "whiskey bunch." And more cruel still, William, the sinful editor of THE TRUTH SEEKER deposits two thousand dollars in a bank which he agrees to forfeit in case he cannot prove to any competent jury that the alleged "libel" is true. He further defies you to publicly say, specifically, that the "whiskey bunch" is behind the opposition that THE TRUTH SEEKER is now conducting to your circus in the metropolis. Should you do so, he guarantees that you will make an appearance in court, not the result of your own volition, and in a like manner part with some of your money.

Now, most benign William, no one dislikes to see a good man spoken ill of any more than I do. Yet if the editor of THE TRUTH SEEKER and myself are guilty, there is a paper published in Minneapolis, Minnesota, that is more so. I refer to

The Twin-City Reporter. This journal has persisted in "libeling" you for several years, and has prevented a performance of your religious circus with its side-show and concert in Minneapolis. The editor of that paper has repeatedly cited and circulated in many thousands of copies, two incidents in your life. One is that when a young man you kept company with a young lady in Belle Plaine, Iowa, and that you used to "stand up" with her at religious meetings. You seemed to know, then, William, as you do now, that nothing is more useful than religion in worming oneself into another's confidence. The sequel was that your treatment of the young lady was not exactly on the square, as a result of which she died. And in the same paper, it is stated, as I had previously heard in Iowa, that while you were preaching Christ crucified, and laying up material treasures, you permitted your brother to die at the Story County, Iowa, poor farm.

Then there is another wicked man whom you have multitudinously accused of "libeling" you. I refer to C. A. Windle, editor of Brann's Iconoclast. You once tried to have this journal denied the use of the mails. Four years ago, in South Bend, Indiana, your henchmen had a boy arrested for selling it on the street during the stand of your circus in that city. They said they meant no harm to the boy, but they wanted to "get Windle." Well, Windle came down to South Bend and went on the boy's bonds; but did they get him or even try to? No, Windle is too big a man for you or your crowd to tackle, and possibly you said you would have nothing to do with a law-suit, the same as when your friends wanted you to prosecute THE TRUTH SEEKER. Now the Christ-like spirit, William, which you manifested in the face of these "libels," but not on other occasions, makes you really a wonderful man; and the future historian will doubtless refer to you as "William, the chosen of God, despised and 'libeled' by man."

Now, Sunday, I am not yet through with you concerning that Decoration Day oration, which you delivered in Beaver Falls, Pennsylvania, in 1912, and published in the Beaver Times. A large part of it is admitted by all, including yourself, to have been purloined from Ingersoll. You say you did not know it was Ingersoll's production. One thing you could not help knowing. You knew it was not your own, yet you deliberately published it, or permitted it to be published, as your own. Will you be candid, and answer a question? Who is the author of that portion of that oration, which you did not purloin from Ingersoll? Did you write it? Do not fear to say yes, if you did, for it would certainly be a tribute to your ability as an orator, which the world has not yet discovered that you deserve. There is one passage to which I will call your particular attention. It reads:

"Spanish rule in Cuba was organized inhumanity. In fact, the whole history of Spain was a record of broken faith, plunder, torture, judicial murdering, treachery and double dealing. Humanity and liberty were outraged, and across the island there stretched a trail of blood, while the cry of the perishing was summoning us to the rescue, sights of misery confronted our gaze. And queenly Columbia, as brave as she is beautiful, heard the wail that came over the waters from the shores of the waters not far away, and God heard the voice that cried to him from the blood-soaked soil of Cuba, and when the pen of the diplomats had been dipped in vain, and even the kind offices of the pope had failed to relieve distressed Cuba, God called on the great American nation to do his work with shot and shell. And America heard the call. We said to Spain, 'This butchery must cease,' and when she would not heed us, we simply went over in a hurry, and made her heed. We demonstrated that we are not only unconquerable on land, but invincible on the seas."

You see, William, the wayward man cannot help thinking that were you to express the ideas of this passage in language of your own, it would read something like this:

"Hey, you bloated, bull-necked, weazel-eyed Spanish galoots! You bunch of liars, thieves and all around scoundrels! What do you mean by turning the swell ranch of Cuba into a dog pound or slaughter-house? Get out of there, you mutts! Bully for you, old Pop on the Tiber! I hope, old pal, that for this good turn you will be able to maul the everlasting wind out of these old lantern-jawed Infidels. All of them ought to be put off the earth. But, you, sallow complected dago rascals, I want you to know that we Americans are some pumpkins, and our Columbia a great old gal. We can lick you on land, or duck you in the sea. Take your choice! Pack your duds, you scoundrels, and blow, before we turn you into mincemeat or throw you into the Gulf of Mexico."

And I further inform you, William, that in case you refuse to answer this question, it is my intention to publish your Decoration oration in full, in the hope that some one will discover the source of that portion that is not Ingersoll's.

You seem, William, to have made free use of your precursor, T. De Witt Talmage. In the Johnstown (Pa.) Democrat of November 10, 1913, appears a sermon by you, three hundred and seventy words of which are identical with the same words to be found on page 77 of a collection of sermons by Talmage entitled, "Social Dynamite." Many of your best "gags" are taken from Sam Jones. We will forgive you for stealing from Talmage and Jones. They are of your kind, but not your nerve in stealing from Ingersoll, who you say is in hell. And your marvelous consistency of statement, William. When caught like a rat in a trap in the Ingersoll matter, you in an attempt to exculpate yourself, said you had never read a word of Ingersoll in your life, forgetting that you had previously said, in the Jacksonville (Ill.) Courier of October 27, 1908, that you had "read everything Ingersoll ever spouted," and afterwards repeated this statement in the Philadelphia Ledger, the same journal in which you made your original denial! I commend to you a maxim more important in your case than any in scripture. It is: "Liars should have good memories."

Are you acquainted with a book entitled "Practical Christianity," by the Rev. Dr. Valentine, for thirty years president of the Gettysburg, Pa., Lutheran Theological Seminary? Well, a prominent Lutheran minister in a western city where your circus gave a successful performance, says one of your sermons is purloined from this book.

Your latest steal, exposed in the Boston Post, is amusing, in that you took it from a book called "Etidorpha," which spelled backwards makes "Aphrodite," a name given to the old pagan goddess of love, Venus! And you, William, used this in reference to Christ and Christmas! Are you not guilty of "blasphemy"? No, most great and benign William, we will not do you the injustice to say that you are the only literary thief in the world. We will only say that you are one of the boldest. While the others ply their vocation in the dark, you ply yours in daylight or right under the lamps. You remind me of the servant girl who appropriated her mistress' dress, and then wore it right before her eyes. You say people send you wagon loads of clippings that you use. Is this because they think you have not brains enough to compose sermons of your own? Truly, you can say with Paul, "I am indebted both to the Greek and the barbarian, to the wise and to the unwise." And above all things you can again say with Paul, "If the word of God abound through my lie to his glory, why am I judged a sinner?"

No one is frightened, William, when you say that all opposition to you is due to the "whiskey bunch." Only beware saying this about THE TRUTH SEEKER. The editor of that paper is a peaceful individual, but he will not stand for this without calling you to account. We all know that you make this statement to obtain sympathy, when the attention of the public is called to your violations of truth, honesty and decency.

And you say that a man is offered $30,000 to attend your meetings and write you up in a slanderous manner. Zounds! William, and to think that I have written you up many times and never received a dollar therefor! Do you blame me for getting nervous?

While your circus was playing in Des Moines, Iowa, a little over two years ago, I was there. You lived on West Fifth street in the same block that I lived in on Sixth avenue. You showed me no neighborly feeling, notwithstanding that both I and my friend, Mr. J. B. Herriman, took an interest in your show and wrote you letters telling you how it might be improved.

In Des Moines you advertised that you had made 11,000 converts. Three weeks after you departed the ministers after raking the city with a fine comb, could muster only three thousand! What became, William, of the eight thousand others? Does your old opponent, the Devil, often corral so soon the choice young lambs that you have brought into the fold of Christ?

A word touching your dear friend and partner, "Rhody." Tell him that the girls of the metropolis are beautiful, erect, walk with a quick step, and are bewitching, but sly and tricky. What a great shame that "Rhody" should work so hard to get the sheep of the Lord in a temper for you to shear them; sell so many thousands of hymn books, costing him about twelve or fifteen cents, at a dollar apiece; and then have one of these bright-eyed daughters of Eve come into court, swear that he promised to marry her, and demand and receive a huge piece of his money!

In conclusion, most great and benign William, I will say that I do not seek or want "eternal life," certainly not if it is to be spent in the company of you and your crowd. FRANKLIN STEINER.

As a matter of fact, the civilization of our time is the result of countless causes with which Christianity had little to do, except by way of hindrance. —R. G. Ingersoll.

MAN OVERSIZES HIMSELF.

He and His Earth Are but Specks and Motes in the Infinite Universe.

[C. M. Kilby, writing in Popular Astronomy on "Man and Universe," gives us some facts and figures calculated to take the conceit out of people who think the whole cosmos was made for them and that its creator is perpetually occupied with their affairs.]

Measured by man's standards man is a mighty being, a colossus, the lord and ruler of the world, and in our younger days man seemed to be almost the lord of the universe, or at least the universe seemed to be made for him. Fortunately, as we grow older this magnification decreases until finally we see man in his true perspective—as through a telescope reversed. Then he is known to be only an infinitesimal in infinite space. He is but a speck upon a ball 8,000 miles in diameter, rotating on its axis once in 24 hours, and revolving around the sun in about 365 days at the rate of 18.5 miles per second. Around this Sun, which is one of the smaller and cooler stars and which appears large because it is only 93,000,000 miles from us, revolve other planets—Mercury, Venus, Earth, Mars, Jupiter, Saturn, Uranus, and Neptune, in order—whose distances from it range from 36 to 2,800 million miles.

Along with this solar system of sun, planets, meteors and comets, we speed through space at twelve miles per second, not knowing whither we go nor why. Other suns, or stars, doubtless have their planetary systems also, and all, according to our observations, are hastening through space. The unaided eye sees but 6,000 of these stars, but the telescope reveals 100,000,000. The nearest one to us is 25,000,000,000,000 (25 trillion) miles distant and heaven only knows how far is the farthest. Though light travels at a rate of 186,000 miles per second, it takes about four and a half years for light to come to us from the nearest star, Centauri, and fifty years to come from the Pole star. Therefore some of the stars we are now seeing may have been blotted out centuries ago.

Our only visitors are meteors and comets. Several hundred meteorites have actually reached the Earth and been found. They are the remnants of former worlds that tell us that those worlds were composed of the same materials as our Earth. Most of these intended visitors are burnt to powder by friction when they strike our atmosphere, and become but dust of our earth. Some that contain occluded gas burst with explosive violence and furnish us beautiful pyrotechnics. All are small and weight less than 500 pounds.

The comets are more distinguished visitors, but are light, airy nothings with electric tails. In passing through our solar system their orbits and motions are changed by the influence of the Sun and the planets—especially Jupiter—and thus are captured for trespassing. Many of the phenomena accompanying them are optical and electrical and change as they continue on their courses.

Of all this how much does man control? Is he monarch of all he surveys? He has no voice in their motions, no power to change the course of even one meteor. He is but an onlooker, a passenger through space without chart or compass, or even steering gear. Around and 'round he goes "on the the whirligig of time circling with the seasons," which cover him with their snows, bite him with their frosts, and scorch him with summer suns: and he can not lift a hand to stay them.

Though man is but a speck compared to his habitat, the earth itself is not so large. When we consider some measurements it seems not only large but immense. For instance, its surface contains 200,000,000 square miles, its volume is 260,000,000,000 (260 billion) cubic miles, and its mass is 6,600,000,000,000,000,000,000 (6,600 million million millions) tons. There are 52,000,000 square miles of land and 145,000,000 square miles of water, and living here are 1,500,000,000 persons. These numbers are large and hence our magnified idea of the size of our planet. But a square mile, a cubic mile, and a ton are all small quantities, and hence these large numbers. If it were said that year consists of 31,536,000 seconds, one might get the idea that a year is an aeon. And so numbers sometimes fool us.

Though the earth is 25,000 miles in circumference it can be circled in a few days. At the new moderate speed of 60 miles per hour it would require but 17 days. Its curvature shows a drop of 8 inches in 1 mile and 64 inches in 2 miles. The lower 600 feet of a mountain only 30 miles distant are below the horizon. And so it seems that our earth is indeed a ball, and a small one at that. Its surface is nearly smooth, as its highest mountain, Everest rises less than six miles above sea-level, and the ocean bed is about the same distance below.

Man on his island home is a creature of circumstances. If the earth's temperature were to rise 40 or 50 degrees above, or drop as much below, the present range, he would pass away and the place thereof would know him no more. Or, if the sun's temperature were to fall as much as 14 deg. Fahr., a glacial period would occur and refrigerate us all. A slight change in the relative amounts of oxygen and nitrogen constituting our atmosphere would end our days. If the water were removed our bodies, which are 90 per cent. water, would soon wither away.

Why man was placed here and whither he goes—who can tell? In spite of his insignificance and impotence, he has gazed into space and explored the starry regions. He has discovered many mysteries and solved many riddles, but the First Cause and the final consummation remain unrevealed to his intellect. And so, "there is a door to which he finds no key, there is a veil through which he can not see."

But he has seen and discovered many things. With his science he has dispelled the idea that the stars and planets are divinities, that they are candles periodically lit, and shown that they are simply masses of matter. He knows that the earth is not flat and that it is supported neither by a tortoise nor by Atlas. Nor is the earth the center of the universe, nor even the center of one of the numberless systems. With the aid of his chemical balance and reagents he can say that the earth's crust contains 47 per cent. oxygen, 28 per cent. silicon, 8 per cent. aluminium, 4 per cent. iron, 0.17 per cent. hydrogen and 0.12 per cent. carbon. With his barometer he can tell us that the atmosphere extends but seventy miles above the earth's surface. He can point his telescope to the sister planets, see, and photograph their surface markings; with his spectrometer he can tell what elemental substances constitute the sun and stars; and with his bolometer he can tell you that the temperature of the sun is 12,000 deg. Fahr. and that the moon is icy cold. With his Coulomb's balance he can weigh the earth, and with the aid of his scientific laws determine the mass of the planets and the moon, and predict eclipses. He has told us that the solar system was formerly a nebula, which by gravitation and cooling formed the sun and planets. He has pointed out 10,000 nebulae, which slowly, but surely, are condensing to form other solar systems. He has discovered the cosmic process, evolution, a cyclic process without beginning and without end, progressive and continuous. From internal evidence he finds that the earth has reached the age of some 60,000,000 years. Though still cooling and contracting its end is in the dim and distant future. Within its surface much heat is stored, for as we dig down its temperature increases 1 deg. Fahr. for every seventy feet. The sun, a mass 880,000 miles in diameter, has cooled more slowly and its temperature is yet 12,000 deg. Fahr. Through calculations it is known that the sun's heat is not due merely to cooling, for if it were its temperature would not long remain constant. As it cools, it contracts; as it contracts, its temperature is raised; and thus its heat is maintained. Another factor in this maintenance is the wonderful metal radium, which undoubtedly exists in the sun. This metal is a heat factory in itself.

Not only has he delved into the past, but he has dipped into the future and predicted discoveries of other worlds. The prediction and discovery of Neptune, the farthest known planet, is evidence of his ability and acumen.

Man's inquiries have not been limited to the inanimate matter of the universe. For centuries he has wondered whether worlds are inhabited. It was formerly thought that all of the planets, stars, moon and sun were inhabited, but now we know that this cannot be unless their residents are far different from us.

In ancient times it was said that the heavenly bodies were round because the circle is the perfect figure. It was also thought that their motions and conditions were permanently fixed because established by a perfect creator. Though the motions and forces of the sun, earth and moon are finely balanced, we know now that sooner or later their equilibrium will be destroyed and that the earth will be ground to pieces by the moon or fall into the sun to be destroyed by fire. Whether the earth will be refrigerated and depopulated along before such a cataclysm occurs, man cannot yet tell.

As the solar system is speeding toward the constellation Hercules, perhaps to join the cluster of 6,000 stars observable there, the avoidance of a collision with other system seem impossible. Such a collision would start another cycle in the evolutionary process. Thus one cycle follows another, but all are in the same progressive march through eternity. Was there a beginning? Man can find no evidence of it; nor can he find any promise of an end. The present stage is but a phase of the endless cosmic cycle: condensation—collision—heating—nebulae; then condensation, collision, etc., again. The creator has not finished his work—and never will. "He" is ever present, ever-working throughout the universe—an Infinite and Eternal Energy. And

"When you and I behind the veil are past,
Oh, but the long, long while the world shall last,
Which of our coming and departure heeds
As the sea's self should heed a pebble cast."

Man has not only made measurements and calculations of things seen, but has also launched his mind upon the sea of infinity to explore its unknown shores and answer the riddles that he meets. He does not balk at the question, "Is the universe infinite?" though he knows that he can not conceive of infinite space because the idea is beyond the power of his imagination. But this fact does not prevent an answer to the question. As Spencer has said, "Conceivability or non-conceivability is never proof." Man employs his reason and argues that since everything occupies space, space can be limited only by space. Therefore, it is self-limited only, and therefore endless and infinite. Again who would deny that 1.0/3 gives an endless result, an infinity of 3's? Yet imagination can not cope with them. Thus reason attests an infinity though imagination can not reach it. Again, reason suggests that time is infinite—without beginning and without end—but mind can not grasp the idea.

So man, the quintessence of dust, is but a mote in an infinity of infinities. Though his "dim horizon is bounded by a span," he gazes intently at the passing show that comes within his ken—an onlooker who can control nothing—one of the "magic shadow shapes that come and go 'round with the sun-illuminated lantern held in midnight by the master of the show; one of the helpless pieces of the game. He plays upon "this checker-board of nights and days, hither and thither moves, and checks and slays, and one by one back in the closet lays."

Through infinite space he whirls in complex spiral motion at thirty miles per second, speeding on and on until his days are ended. Like the poor player upon the stage he struts and frets and frets until his part is done. He is but a "flower of the field which to-day is and to-morrow is no more." "He dieth and wasteth away: yea man giveth up the ghost, and where is he?"

Morality.

What we call morality is the conduct we demand from others. Morality has been given a false origin. Of course, there was no god back of it, but man put a god there for emphasis. And God was made to say, "Thou shalt not," etc. Now, that is not the right way to teach human brains and human hearts. That is the way to make morality a system of slavery. That divine "Thou shalt not" has been made into a club or a lash. How much better for the world, when God was on the earth, had he said to his human children: "Let us do what is right for ourselves and others; let us be kind to one another and help all who are unfortunate; let us do unto others and not demand that they do unto us, let us all try to make life easy and pleasant for all who live." God should also have set a better example for man. His history, as presented in the Old Testament, would be a disgrace to an orang-outang.

There must, however, be no defense of wrongdoing in the liberty to do what is right. We must stop at the door of another person's right. There is a fence around a man's house which should protect it. There is a fence around a man's property which should protect it. We have no right to trespass. To enlarge one man's freedom does not narrow another man's freedom. In one word, the only morality which will protect the world is the morality of liberty, of truth, of justice. A morality founded upon a theology limits human experience, whereas man must live true to his highest convictions, even if those convictions contradict every theological tenet in existence. There is a purer morality in disobedience of religious commands than in following the thunder and lightning of Sinai or the "Sermon on the Mount."

The morality of God has kept man from becoming civilized. Prohibition of any kind is death to Liberty. What man wants in order to progress is freedom. Religion and Morality are twin tyrants. They have done little besides persecute human beings. The phrase "Thou shalt not" should be changed into: "We all should respect our brothers and sisters by giving them liberty to express their thoughts in words and actions."

The last experiment of freedom has not been tried. What is called the "Decalogue" has been a stumbling-block for the feet of men, or the minds of men, for thousands of years. Men today are no longer bound by it. If that is the way to be better it is better to go some other way.

The whole trouble with the ten commandments is that they are religious first and anything afterwards. The command to worship God and to keep his Sabbath holy annuls all that is good in the other commands. An honest man cannot worship a dishonest god. A good man cannot worship a bad god. A man in the twentieth century cannot worship the god of the first century. Man can take care of himself better by not worshipping god. All history is my witness. There has been a bad lot back of god. The world has reached a point where it can say: If I have any morality, it must be that of freedom, not of religion. Too many men and women have been killed for not obeying a priest. Nothing is so black on the earth as the shadow of the cross. If you make it a moral duty to go to church, then I declare it a higher duty not to go. One thinker is worth more than a thousand worshippers. The individual must be sacred. And every individual must be sacred. One man must not force his morality upon another, nor must all men force their morality upon one man. There is no universal morality. And there is none wanted. There is too much conformity, not too little. Independence is man's noblest privilege and the power, be it political or religious, that is working to destroy human independence is the worst enemy of mankind. No man's god must come into my house. The fire that burns upon the hearth of my home is the fire of freedom and every god has tried to put that fire out. The worst act of a human being is that of proselyting, trying to enlist another under his banner. The greatest battle is to be fought by each one alone and the greatest victory is to be won by each one alone. What mankind should strive for is to make every person live an honest, kind and upright life. "Hands off" to priests and parsons.

It is my right to do as I think best until I trespass upon the same right of someone else. But no man must command my obedience. To obey is to surrender the highest, dearest and most sacred right of man. We must live in such a way that no man could condemn such living in himself. But compulsory morality unless nature compels it, is a violation of man's liberty.

Do not listen to the pulpit, but put your ear to your own heart and let your head and hand respond to its beating.

MARILLA M. RICKER.

Religion Useful to Rulers.

Under the heading, "The German Clergy," the Literary Digest gives a sort of summary, with brief quotations, of some articles written by an American who visited Germany with an American passport. This gentleman, Mr. D. Thomas Curtin, is evidently strongly pro-British, and his articles are creating a deep impression as they come out in English journals. Mr. Curtin asserts that the "modern material Germany has not much use for religion" except as a factor in the government. And referring to the so-called hymns and prayers of hate in the churches, Mr. Curtin holds that the spread of "extreme Agnosticism in the last quarter of a century renders it essential for the clergy to hold their places by stooping to the extreme violence of the professors."

It seems to give certain persons a feeling of self-gratulation to say, "You are fond of the material. I am higher, nobler. I choose the spiritual." And of all classes who put up this pretense none other is so addicted to this assumption of superiority as is the clerical class, who are engaged in a desperate struggle to palm off on us their spiritual gold bricks for our sound material dollars.

And how is it in other Christian countries? What well-informed, intelligent person has much use for religion except as a factor in the government? Do not rulers uphold the church because to them it stands for Order, necessarily to them the established order? This is true in England and America as well as in Germany. As to the spread of Agnosticism, most men of education and intelligence are really Agnostic, though Agnosticism may be more deeply grounded by scientific knowledge in Germany than in England, to a greater degree still than in America. The church is an institution based upon privilege. It must give a good account of itself by holding the lower classes in a condition rendering them easily governable. This it does by the other-world fraud. The church and the rulers make common cause, each to ensure the power and perpetuity of the other. But this is not a distinctively German arrangement, and the English had better pause before holding up hypocritical hands in affected horror with an "I am holier than thou."

Book Notes.

We are frequently asked by subscribers and others concerning the testimony given by certain prejudiced Christians regarding the death-bed sayings of eminent Infidels. There are many pious believers who still persist, for the sake of religion, to malign the closing hours of some of the noblest workers for truth and liberty that this world has ever known. In order to meet these uncharitable accusations with the real facts in the case, the late Mr. G. W. Foote wrote a book called "Infidel Death-beds," in which, besides giving an interesting sketch of the life of distinguished Infidels, he describes with the accuracy of facts the most interesting circumstances of their last moments. These lives include such names as those of Lord Byron, Charles Darwin, George Eliot, Gibbon, Hume, Victor Hugo, Thomas Paine, George Sand, Shelley, Volney, Voltaire, and Colonel Ingersoll. Any reader familiar with the writings of Mr. Foote, that renowned English Freethinker, will not need to be reminded of the excellence of his work, the clearness of his style, the care with which he gathered his facts, and the disinterested motive with which he marshaled them when occasion required. "Infidel Death-beds" is now in its second edition, and is the only book of its kind published in the English language. It is invaluable for use in confuting the many lies that have been and are still being circulated by immoral Christians concerning the life and death of noted Agnostics, in order that by such lies they may, if possible, prove the excellence of their religion. This book should find a place in the library of every Freethinker, and especially among those who are seeking information as to the manner in which unbelievers have met the call of death. The price is twenty-five cents. The Truth Seeker Company.

Another TRUTH SEEKER publication which deserves to be better known is the volume of Robert C. Adams called "Travels in Faith from Tradition to Reason." Mr. Adams was at one time president of the Montreal Pioneer Freethought Club, and while holding that office delivered some of the best lectures that up to that time had ever been offered to a thinking public. In the book, "Travels in Faith," Mr. Adams records in the first seventy pages the history of his progress from Christianity to Rationalism. This telling bit of personal history is highly interesting, and ought easily to engage the attention of the most careless reader, for there are very few persons who do not enjoy an outline of human life and character, especially if a noble purpose runs through the whole. The remaining seventeen chapters of the book discuss such subjects as "Human Religion," "Is the Bible the Word of God?" "Human Ideas of God," "The Decline of the Ministry," "The Consolations of Christianity," "Material Immortality," and "Liberal Convictions." All these subjects with others are treated from the standpoint of pure Rationalism. They are dealt with clearly, pointedly, and with a view to being easily understood. No man surpasses Mr. Adams in the clarity of his statements as to what actually constitutes the real contention of Rationalism. He never allows himself to be diverted from the main issue by any of the later fads which are resting their weight upon Rationalism for support. His epigrammatic style yields many a gem of thought which have been quoted far beyond the limits reached by this great lecturer's voice. For beginners in the study of truth his books have no superiors. (The Truth Seeker Company. Price, 25c.)

The Bankruptcy of Religion. By Joseph McCabe. Watts & Co., London. Price, $2.50.

This is Mr. McCabe's latest work. It was written as the direct outcome of the conditions occasioned by the association of religion and the present world-war. The most casual observer has not failed to note the paralysis of religion in the presence of the greatest international strife that our world has ever known. Many persons have been inclined to believe that the present apathy of religion with reference to the commencement of the war and its long duration has been but an accidental condition due to the general determination on the part of the nations to settle their differences by force of arms, as in the fairest days of Christianity. The purpose of this latest work of the great English Rationalist is to show that this is by no means the true explanation of this startling phase of modern religion. "In order to realize," says Mr. McCabe in his preface, "the full force of the blow under which the churches reel today one must appreciate the long preparation for it. It is this lengthy preparation, this steady lowering through many decades of the prestige and power of the clergy, that I set out to describe. First I will put in plain and concise form the moral of the war itself, and glance at the recent apologies of clerical and other writers. Then, in four convenient sections, I will summarily describe the great struggles of the nineteenth, and early part of the twentieth, century. Having this material before him, any thoughtful person can appreciate correctly the position of religion in our life; and in the last chapters I will candidly meet the anxiety of those who imagine that the Christian creed, however slender its influence and poor its representation, cannot be replaced. There is a more solid and more thrilling creed that only awaits its chance."

The four sections here spoken of are, Section I, The Verdict of Science; Section II, The Verdict of History; Section III, The Verdict of Philosophy; Section IV, The Verdict of Humanity. Each of these sections has three or four subdivisions in which every feature of the main topic is fully and clearly examined. Throughout the work there is a wealth of references and practical illustrations which, besides strengthening the author's main contention, introduce the reader to a number of prominent men and their opinions upon religion as known in the past and as pictured in the future. The book is one of profound interest. It is easily the most stirring literary production of the present year. No other book compares with it in keenness of analysis as regards the true state of religious conditions throughout the world today. In short, Mr. McCabe's work "is an historical survey of the decline of the influence of religion, and a masterly statement of its importance during the great World Crisis." It is in fact an authoritative text-book of the status of religion as it exists at the present time.

The following have been received:

British Education after the War. By Frederick J. Gould. Watts & Co., London. Price 1/6 net.

Junius Finally Discovered. By William H. Graves. Published by the Author, Birmingham, Ala.

A Fool's Commentary of Scripture and Doctrine. By Pater Guilielmus. Sherman, French & Co., Boston. Price, 80c.

The Struggle of a Mind to be Free. By John Emerson Roberts, Kansas City, Mo. Price, 25c.

Gleanings and Scrap Book Gatherings. By C. R. Woodward. Published by the Author, Lockport, N. Y.

Pagan and Christian Morality. By Walter Mann. The Pioneer Press, London. Price two pence.

What Is a Real Revival? Billy Sunday, "Unreal," "Money," "Exaggerator." By A. Sheldrick. Published by the Author, East Northfield, Mass.

Christianity and Progress. By G. W. Foote. The Pioneer Press, London. Price, twopence.

The European War. By Edward G. Smith. Published by the Author, Chicago, Ill. Price, 25c.

Criminology and Social Psychology. By Theodore Schroeder, of the New York Bar. The Medico-Legal Journal, April, 1917.

The Specific Trouble with the World and Its Specific Preventive. By Franklin Hopkins. Land Currency Advancers, Pubs., New York.

Some Revelations. By R. D. Tompkins. Published privately. Price, 50 cents.

The major league baseball owners, who are generally opposed to seven days of playing per week, have laid plans to aid military units through Sunday games; but the sabbatarians threaten them with the law if they try it. Boston authorities are quoted as saying that Sunday baseball even for patriotic purposes will not be permitted. Philadelphia will also "make a howl," and New York is uncertain. Elsewhere the plan meets with bigoted opposition, although in every case it is proposed to turn over the entire receipts to the mayor. Innis Brown, the baseball writer, remarks that "the action of the baseball men in offering such a scheme deserves stronger commendation than the imposition of legal restrictions to hinder the plan"—which is putting it mildly. The community is submitting to a good deal of dictation from the churches, who themselves contribute nothing to the war tax, and then act the dog in the manger when the more patriotic baseball men offer to do their bit.

The age has passed when man can be deceived by ancient fables or fiction; the fixed principles of life are generally known, and we are aware of our ignorance concerning what we do not know. The powers and work of nature are not necessarily supernatural because we cannot account for their origin.—J. Hartmann.

NOTES AT LARGE.

The police and courts of this city appear to be in a conspiracy to suppress freedom of discussion of religious questions without warrant of law. A permit is required for a religious meeting, but the Secular speakers are informed that they do not need a permit because their meetings are not religious; and then they are arrested for holding religious meetings without a permit. The latest opinion from the office of the police commissioner is that the character of a speaker's teachings determines whether or not the meeting is religious. It is said in other quarters that a religious meeting must be opened with prayer. The Freethought speakers are in a quandary to determine whether they should try to get around the religious question by organizing as exponents of the Religion of Humanity or of Secularism, or fight it out as Rationalists. The last speaker arrested up to the time of this writing is Mr. Nicholas Mitchuly, who on May 23 was brought before Magistrate Nolan in the Fifty-seventh street court, charged by a woman, evidently a Catholic, with creating prejudice against the Jewish religion! As the woman, who probably acted under instigation from other persons not appearing, could repeat nothing that the speaker had said, and could testify that Mr. Mitchuly spoke as charged only because she heard "murmurs" in the crowd, the case had to be dismissed. The Secular speakers make every effort to abide by the law and not to give occasion for offense. They do not criticize the government; they are not open to the charge of using treasonable or seditious language, nor has that charge been brought against them. Before speaking they obtain the consent of the police captains, and conform to all the regulations. They are harassed, apparently, only because the police think they can "get away with it"; and if the police officer on the post happens to be friendly, some crank or fanatic is generally on hand to demand their suppression. The whole matter needs sifting and settling. Not only should the police be told by their superiors to keep their hands off, but they should be instructed to warn complainants of their responsibility in cases of false arrest. The right of peaceable assembly, of free discussion and the sale of any periodical on the street needs vindicating or it will be entirely lost.

"Just now, when it is necessary to impose excessive taxes on our homes, food and industries, and when thousands of our best men are cheerfully offering their lives to protect and defend our country, the Federal Council of Churches, in session in Washington, declares:

"We believe it to be just whenever necessary that incomes should be taxed to the furthest possible point without checking production, and exemption should be made of surplus incomes which are dedicated to the maintenance of religious and social agencies."

"In other words, they believe it to be just that the other fellow should be taxed to the limit and that they should go tax free."

"How much more patriotic it would have been if the Federal Council of Churches had declared: In this crisis no private property should be exempt from tax, and to prove our good faith and patriotism we cheerfully agree that all property under our control shall bear its full share of the necessary burden."

The foregoing is a letter addressed by J. B. Beattie, of Chicago, to the Tribune of that city. It was not published. Mr. Beattie notices the fact, which has also come to our attention, that daily papers have stopped printing criticisms of the churches by Secularists, and in their selfish demand for exemption from war taxes and military duty the ecclesiastical slackers are protected by the silence of the press. Instead of offering to do something for their country, the churches are calling for larger contributions for their religious work, which in war times is more conspicuously futile than in peace. What are they going to say when in the future they are charged with the recreancy they now manifest? They bind burdens heavy and grievous to be borne, and lay them on men's shoulders; but they themselves will not move them with one of their fingers.

One report of the work being done for Jesus and other important considerations at the tabernacle uptown credits "Billy" with new and original versions, in "the slang of the street and baseball diamond," of incidents in the life of Our Lord. And we are told that the account of the meeting between Jesus and Zaccheus, conceived in the slang aforesaid, was hilariously applauded, and "the 18,000 showed their approval by shrieks of laughter." Zaccheus, as we all know who have read the nineteenth of Luke, was the man who said to Jesus: "Behold, Lord, the half of my goods I give to the poor; and if I take anything from any man by false accusation, I restore him fourfold." No wonder that the crowd shrieked with laughter at the notion of a man giving half his goods to the poor. "And Jesus said unto him, This day is salvation come to this house." More shrieks. What is funnier to a Christian than the idea of a man's being saved just by dividing with these poor and making restitution to those he has wronged, when it is well known that salvation comes only to those who formerly profess Jesus as their personal savior. "He [Zaccheus] is also a son of Abraham." Zaccheus was a Jew, and salvation came to his house without his conversion to Christianity. The humor of the entire story calls for all the shrieks of laughter with which it was greeted.

The sincerity of the pacifists who are opposing conscription for war purposes is hardly to be doubted. They may be misguided; they may be uselessly agitating the air, but they are still in pursuit of a purpose which to them seems good. When, therefore, Magistrate Fuchs, of New York, declares that all agitators against the conscription law are traitors and in his court will be treated as such, he shows himself to be a dangerous person to vest with power over the liberties of his fellow men. He menaces American freedom more than any power the country is organizing to fight. A few days ago this same magistrate fined a Freethought street speaker for the offense of reading in public a quotation from the tabernacle evangelist, as follows:

"Do you remember what God did for Joshua? He bent down toward the sun and said, 'Here, sun! Stay where you are until Joshua gives you the high sign!' So the sun stood still, and Joshua went right ahead, and licked the enemies of God to a frazzle, and took his time at the job."

The officer who made the arrest understood the words to be those of the speaker, not recognizing them as quotation from America's foremost minister of the gospel. Magistrate Fuchs ruled that the language was calculated to provoke a breach of the peace, and imposed the fine.

The New York dentist, Arthur Waite, who last year murdered his wife's father and mother in order to get their money, and was put to death for his crime on May 24, was a believer in the comfortable doctrine of a future life, which he faced with no apprehensions as to what it might hold for him. He was the president of a Christian Endeavor Society, and active in church work in Ann Arbor, Michigan, as well as in New York. When in the Tombs prison he sang hymns so feelingly as to persuade hearers that he could not be guilty, and was constant at divine services held in the prison. "Fear God and do right" was his motto. He feared God. "I have become a student of the Bible," he said, "and I believe everything in it"—from cover to cover. Dr. Waite told the reporters that on rereading the Ten Commandments he found he had broken all but one of them—"I have never used profane language." He composed poetry rebuking unbelievers and affirming that "God's love supplanteth every doubt." His last day was spent reading the Bible. His work as a murderer and as a Christian added fresh facts to prove the generalization of Havelock Ellis that "in all countries religion, or superstition, is closely related to crime."

"Cleveland, May 18.—As a 'great forward step in Christianity' the social service committee of the Northern Baptist Convention recommended last night that churches and ministers pay taxes.

"The proposal caused much debate. It is yet to be passed upon by the convention."—Daily paper.

The fate of the proposal at the hands of the convention has not been learned. Perhaps it was allowed to die for want of support, which would be a pity. It shows that in some church circles there is an awakening conscience on the subject of tax dodging. The church works for itself. The ends it aims at are its own, not those of the state. There is an ulterior object in its so-called charities and philanthropies, and this is not so much to do good, humanly speaking, as to promote what they call the kingdom of God, which is the church. As regards the state, the church is an outsider. It demands favors from the state, but returns none except for pay. No wonder that some, even inside the fold, are beginning to feel like parasites and deadheads.

The bill before Congress to raise the price of newspaper postage from 100 to 600 per cent contains the provision that "newspapers and periodicals entitled to be entered as second-class matter and maintained by and in the interests of religious, educational, philanthropic, agricultural, labor, or fraternal organizations, not organized for profit and none of the net income of which inures to the benefit of any private stockholder or individual" shall not be subject to the advanced rates. The framers of the bill seem to have a grudge against scientific papers; otherwise that class might have been included among the exempt, or at least such of them as pay no profits to any private stockholder. The exemptions are as bad as the bill, for they appear to include only the newspapers and periodicals that do not amount to anything, or that are printed to advertise some society or promote the interests of some clique or orders. For an example, the Catholic Knights of Columbus publish a paper or organ called, we believe, the Columbiad, which might claim exemption as religious or fraternal, or both. It is the same old abuse.

In defense of free speech and unshackled press a Sun correspondent appeals to Cardinal Gibbons, who has written a book called "A Retrospect of Fifty Years," in which he is quoted as saying:

"If only the American people will hold fast to that instrument which has been bequeathed to them as the palladium of their liberties—the Constitution of the United States—and fear and distrust the man who would touch that ark with profane hands, the permanence of our institutions is assured."

Is Gibbons getting Americanized? A few years ago he advised the voters of this country to elect only Christians to office, although "the palladium of their liberties—the Constitution of the United States," forbids a religious test. Only a year ago he ventured the prediction that this government would survive owing to the fact that "no man who openly repudiates the leading tenets of Christianity can hold public office." At that time he stood for exactly what our "palladium" does not stand for. If now he is really in favor of the Constitution as it is, he has made a considerable advance over himself and the church he represents.

By special cable dispatch we are told that the allied forces in Palestine will soon occupy the city of Jerusalem, now held by the Turks. The city was taken away from the Jews about the year 70 of the current era, and the story of its capture is a point in higher criticism. In Luke ix, 43, 44, the account is found, attributed to Jesus as a prophecy. But the higher critics do not credit prophecy with predicting historical events, and therefore they conclude that the Luke gospel was written after A. D. 70 by someone who knew so little about dates that he filled in the discourse of Jesus with this mention of the siege of Jerusalem. There is a similar anachronism in Matthew (xxiii, 35), where Jesus speaks of the slaying of Zacharias "between the temple and the altar," a tragedy which took place in the year 71, thirty-eight years after the crucifixion.

There is a bill in the New York legislature to prohibit the police from "listening in" on telephones without permission from a supreme court justice. The bill is the result of a case of wire-tapping in this city last year, when the police by intercepting messages between the Rev. Daniel C. Potter and certain Catholic clergymen obtained evidence of a conspiracy to discredit Charity Commissioner Kingsbury and to obstruct the due process of law. The "listening in" accomplished good results in that instance.

He was a religious leader; she was a religious girl; they met at a religious meeting. He is Chester A. Winters; she is Nabbie Garrison; they live in Binghamton, N. Y., where the courts are trying Winters for his relations with the girl, the charge being criminal assault. Mothers should keep their girls away from religious leaders and male Sunday school teachers.

A Favorite Story in Belgium.

Bethmann-Hollweg was sent by his emperor on a special mission to God the Father in heaven. He knocks at the door of Paradise, which is opened to him by St. Peter. Bethmann-Hollweg asks permission to speak with the good God. "Impossible, he is sick, very sick." "What is the matter with him?" "I do not know," replies the saint, "but he walks up and down without respite or intermission; he seems to be affected with an insane idea of his greatness, for he keeps constantly repeating, 'I am the Kaiser! I am the Kaiser!'" The messenger from William II expressed his disappointment. "How unfortunate," said he, "for I have news of very great importance to communicate to God from my master." "Of what does it consist?" "This is it," replies the envoy extraordinary, von Bethmann-Hollweg. "My master, the Kaiser, charges me to announce to God that he has just ennobled him, and that hereafter he may call himself von Gott."—Revue des Deux Mondes.

THE TRUTH SEEKER

Published weekly by the Truth Seeker Company, President, George E. Macdonald; Secretary, James A. Conway, 62 Vesey street, New York.

Entered at the Postoffice, New York, N. Y., as second-class matter.

Address communications and make drafts, checks, postoffice and express money orders payable to THE TRUTH SEEKER, 62 Vesey street, New York.

Subscription Rates.

Single subscription in advance . . $3.00
Two new subscribers 5.00
One subscription two years in advance 5.00
One subscription and one new subscriber, in one remittance . . . 5.00
To all foreign countries except Mexico, 50 cents per annum extra.
Subscriptions received for any length of time under a year at the rate of 25 cents per month. Can be begun at any time.
Single copies, 10 cents.

SPECIAL NOTICE.—We shall be obliged to our readers if they will send us the name and address of any Free-thinker who is not a regular subscriber.

OBJECTS.

It is the object of THE TRUTH SEEKER to educate the people out of religious superstition. It denies the inspiration and infallibility of the Bible, and asserts the human origin of that book. It denies the existence of the theological heaven and hell, but as to the existence and immortality of the soul neither affirms nor denies. It waits for evidence.

THE TRUTH SEEKER upholds the theory of Evolution, believing that to be the solution of the question of the origin, growth, and development of the animal kingdom, including man. THE TRUTH SEEKER believes that the answer to the questions Whence? and Whither? can be given only by Science.

THE TRUTH SEEKER holds that morality and ethics—or man's relation to man—are entirely independent of creed or religion, and are founded on rules developed by experience.

In current politics THE TRUTH SEEKER takes no side or part. In general it holds to the principles of freedom enunciated by the Founders of the Republic.

THE TRUTH SEEKER believes in Free Speech, Free Press, and Free Mail; in full discussion of all sides of all subjects, and affords those having new and worthy thoughts, clearly stated, a generous and welcome hearing, each contributor being responsible for his own opinion. We neither indorse an idea by printing it, nor condemn it by exclusion.

THE TRUTH SEEKER is the recognized medium of communication between the Liberals of the country, and is edited each week for their information, instruction, entertainment, and support against religious error and mental slavery and in maintenance of their equal civil and religious rights as citizens of the United States.

The Editor invites communications on the subjects to which these pages are devoted.

POLITICAL PRINCIPLES.

(THE NINE DEMANDS OF LIBERALISM.)

1. We demand that churches and other ecclesiastical property shall be no longer exempt from taxation.
2. We demand that the employment of chaplains in Congress, in the Legislatures, in the navy and militia, and in prisons, asylums and all other institutions supported by public money shall be discontinued.
3. We demand that all public appropriations for educational and charitable institutions of a sectarian character shall cease.
4. We demand that all religious services now sustained by the government shall be abolished; and especially that the use of the Bible in the public schools, whether ostensibly as a text-book or avowedly as a book of religious worship, shall be prohibited.
5. We demand that the appointment by the President of the United States or by the governors of the various states, of all religious festivals and fasts shall wholly cease.
6. We demand that the judicial oath in the courts and in all other departments of the government shall be abolished, and that simple affirmation under the pains and penalties of perjury shall be established in its stead.
7. We demand that all laws directly or indirectly enforcing the observance of Sunday as the Sabbath shall be repealed.
8. We demand that all laws looking to the enforcement of "Christian" morality shall be abrogated and that all laws shall be conformed to the requirements of natural morality, equal rights, and impartial liberty.

9. We demand that not only in the Constitution of the United States and of the several states, but also in the practical administration of the same, no privileges or advantages shall be conceded to Christianity or any other special religion; that our entire political system shall be founded and administered on a purely secular basis; and that whatever changes shall prove necessary to this end shall be consistently, unflinchingly, and promptly made.

Letters of Friends

Readers desirous of communicating with the writers of the letters in this department may address them in care of THE TRUTH SEEKER, 62 Vesey street, New York, N. Y., and the letters will be re-addressed and forwarded.

DIVINE MURDER.

From C. F. Hunt, Chicago.

To the Editor of The Truth Seeker:

The ruling Germans surpass the thugs of India by their adherence to divinely inspired murder. With them "God" means the rule of brute force, not spirit. The land of Bach and Mozart is ruled by the avowed ideal that human life depends on its destruction. "Real progress" requires frequent wars; the maimed always to mingle with the people, showing their scars and stumps to growing children, so they will grow up to love war.

People who wish to free Germany from this awful charge, tell us that Gen. von Bernhardt is a quack, or crazy, and not to be cited as speaking for the German nation. But in "Germany and the Next War" he quotes names that make Germany great. The book ends with an appeal to the war god: "We may, with Ernst Moritz Arndt, raise our hands to heaven and cry to God: 'From the height of the starry sky May the ringing sword flash bright.'"

Claus Wagner, page 19: "The natural law is the law of struggle. The super-social struggle . . . is war . . . This struggle is a creator, since it eliminates." Schiller, page 26:

"Man is stunted by peaceful days
In idle repose his courage decays.
Law is the weakling's game.
Law makes the world the same.
But in war man's strength is seen.
War ennobs all that is mean."

Treitschke, page 27: "A thousand touching traits testify to the sacred power of the love which a righteous war awakes in noble nations."

A defensive war only is righteous; but Bernhardt says might always justifies conquest. "Might gives the right to occupy or to conquer. Might is at once the supreme right, and the dispute as to what is right is decided by war. War gives a biologically just decision, since its decisions rest on the very nature of things."

Kuno Fischer, page 26: "Wars are terrible, but necessary, for they save the state from stagnation."

Goethe, page 37: "Peace schemes" . . . "must be denounced as unhealthy and feeble. . . The maintenance of peace never can or may be the goal of a policy. . . The apostles of peace must be confronted with Goethe's manly words:

"Dreams of a peaceful day?
Let him dream who may.
War is our rallying cry,
Onward to victory."

Luther, page 54: "War is a business, divine in itself, as needful and necessary as eating and drinking, or any other work."

The people are pawns, or cattle; killed or driven by the state, this being a divinely directed class; page 261: "The state is the transmitter of all culture, therefore entitled to claim all the powers of the individual for itself."

Backed by German genius, Bernhardt boldly utters his medieval theory, page 11: "War . . . the greatest factor in the furtherance of culture and power." Page 14: "War is not merely a necessary element in the life of nations, but an indispensable factor of culture." Page 17: "The desire for peace has rendered most civilized nations anæmic." Page 18: "War is a biological necessity of the first importance, since without it an unhealthy development will follow, which excludes real civilization. War is the father of all things."

In his economic ignorance, Bernhardt thinks that the producer must yield most of his product to an exploiter, then fight and die to provide a market for surplus wealth, (which, according to modern justice, the laborer should keep). Page 23: "In America, England, Germany, industries offer remunerative work to great masses. The native population cannot consume all the products of this work."

(This is the basic lie of the divine war theory. Try giving the product to the producer, and see if he can consume it).

Continuing: "The industries depend mainly on exportation. Work and employment are secured so long as they find markets which gladly accept their products, since they are paid for by the foreign country. But this foreign country is intensely interested in liberating itself from such tribute, and in producing all that it requires. We find, therefore, a general endeavor to call home industries into existence, and to protect them by tariff barriers. . . A state, under the necessity of providing work for its population, may be driven into war."

A freetrader could not improve on this candid statement of the exploitation of labor. A divinely appointed class is to take all products, without return, consume all it can, then wage war for markets to absorb the remainder. Plundering of labor gives means for culture, and war promotes still more culture.

Page 29: "'Love God and thy neighbor' can claim no significance for the relations of one country to another . . . it would lead to a conflict of duties . . . must inevitably lead men astray. Christian morality is personal and social; it cannot be political . . . Thus, according to Christianity, we cannot disapprove of war in itself, but must admit that it is justified morally and historically."

Materialism also justifies killing the producers. Page 29: "The state can also come from the materialistic standpoint to a decision to wage war, if it believes that by a certain sacrifice of human lives, conditions of life in the community may be improved. The loss is restricted to comparatively few, and since the fundamental notion of all materialistic philosophy inevitably leads to selfishness, the majority of the citizens have no reason for not sacrificing the minority in their own interests. . . Reflection thus shows not only that war is an unqualified necessity, but that it is justifiable from every point of view."

Instead of resting on "historical" evidence, the modern world is a unit in opposing the worn out and brutal (with apology to the brutes) theory of might is right, when applied to the exploitation and killing of wealth-producers. Shall this despotism, or democracy, win?

A SPECIMEN OF GOD'S WORK.

From W. Wilkinson, Canada.

To the Editor of The Truth Seeker:

DEAR FRIENDS: Enclosed find $7 for two renewals for THE TRUTH SEEKER. We cannot help calling you friends; we feel that way to all The Truth Seeker family. We commend your judgment in not allowing THE TRUTH SEEKER to be sidetracked with any "ism." Give us the straight goods as you have been doing for over forty years. I am a builder by trade. I was repairing a house this week for a good woman I knew years ago. She had a child—a helpless imbecile. I asked her if he was still living. Yes; she had placed him in an institution when he was nineteen. It was killing her to take care of him; said he had cost her thousands of dollars. He is now thirty-four years of age, weighs nearly 200 pounds and is as helpless as a baby. He never was able even to feed himself. I said to her: "Do you believe in God?" It jarred her. She hesitated, and finally said: "Of course, you know there is a God." I told her I could not believe in one and see such cases as that. But faith is blind.

THE SPIRITUAL SENSE RANK NONSENSE.

From E. H. Elliff, Illinois.

To the Editor of The Truth Seeker:

"That was a fine sermon," said one of the church-going squad as they came in from the morning service. "It sure was," assented another. "That text has always been a stumbling-block to many of us, but the way the minister handled it this morning made it as plain as A, B, C." "Well," responded the first speaker, "he went at it in the right way. You can't take that text literally. You have to take it in the spiritual sense, then it becomes as clear as day." "What did you think of it?" turning to me.

"Oh, he made it as clear as mud to me, and muddled it a little more." A chorus of contemptuous grunts greeted my remark, and then one of the party said, "That's about what I expected from you."

"However," I resumed, "he did fairly well, as well as anybody could do, considering the formidable obstacle he had to contend with, and failed to overcome."

"What was that terrible obstacle? I didn't see any obstacles that he didn't push aside."

"Still there was one that he failed to 'blow' away—his profound and hopeless ignorance of what he was talking about."

"That's pretty strong language and a slur on the intelligence of our learned pastor, and I think you would have some trouble in proving your statement."

"That would depend largely upon the class of people I had to deal with. There are some people to whom you can't prove that three times one are three, if the self-evident fact conflicts with one of their superstitious religious dogmas. I don't think I would have much trouble in proving it to rational, intelligent people who are amenable to reason, logic, common sense and scientific facts."

"You can't prove it by the Bible," snarled one of the pious group defiantly.

"As to the Bible, I don't mind telling you that its reputation for truth and veracity is a joke. It has been riddled and ripped up the back and shot to pieces by the criticism, research and discoveries of the ripest scholarship of the world, so that the highbrows of orthodoxy are even now arranging to put it on the theological dry-dock for the steenth overhauling and remodeling. Still, I would use the Bible and another thoroughly orthodox document—the Methodist discipline—in proving my case; also a standard text book on physiology and another famous book recognized by all educated people, Christians and non-Christians, as the standard authority on all subjects; a book in which one comes nearer to finding in condensed form the knowledge and wisdom of this world than in any other book ever printed. Compared with this great book the pulpit-touted omniscience of God, as set forth in the Bible, shrinks into crass ignorance, pagan superstition and imbecile drivel."

"I guess he means old Tom Paine's 'Age of Reason,'" sneered the most fanatical of the lot.

"No, you have another guess coming; I'm not thinking of Paine or Ingersoll, or of the late Judge Waite's merciless exposure of the falsehoods and fallacies of the Bible and Christian theology."

"Well, name your wonderful book, I'm anxious to know the name of it."

"Why, certainly; Webster's Unabridged Dictionary is the title of the book." The information was received in silence and with no signs of rejoicing over their success in worming it out of me.

"Well, go on with your proof; you haven't produced any yet."

"All right; I suppose you will admit that spirituality, the spiritual sense, and things of that nature originate with and come directly from the holy spirit, the holy ghost, God?"

"Of course, everybody admits that."

"The Methodist Discipline says: 'God is a being without body, passion or parts.' In that foolish jumble of words there is a positive, direct contradiction. A being is unquestionably a material thing having a body or parts, form and substance. Without those physical properties it can't be; it is no-thing—a perfect vacuum. The reckless and abandoned word-juggler who indiscriminately grabbed that bunch of nine inconsequent words, and, without rhyme or reason, welds them into what he calls a being; then, with a formidable theological knife in either hand, attacks the divine freak, skinning with one hand and gutting with the other, until the skinning operations meet the gutting process, cutting and slashing until there is absolutely nothing left. Not even a faint outline of the shadow of the proverbial grease spot—the popular synonym for total obliteration—can be seen. It reminds me of Eli Perkins' amazing story (and Eli was an expert liar, too) of the mutually destructive encounter between a snake and a bull frog, in which the snake got the frog by the hind leg and the frog grabbed the snake by the tail, and both got busy at swallowing and stuck to it until the frog disappeared inside the snake and the snake disappeared inside the frog."

"How in the name of common sense could they do that?" inadvertently asked one of the party; to which I replied seriously without turning a hair, "Why, they just 'moved in a mysterious way their wonders to perform;' moreover, the thing wasn't done in the name of common sense; it was a miracle, and miracles are never performed in the name of common sense, always in the name of uncommon nonsense." The inventor of the discipline having rendered his God-being conspicuous by their physical absence, leads me to fear that they, too, may have engaged in a mutual swallowing bout; but I shrink from describing it in detail for fear of committing the unpardonable sin of blasphemy. Still, learned scientists assert that in the early stages of his development man had a tail, and the Bible tells us that in the beginning God made man in his own image, hence if the image was a perfect duplicate and accurate as to detail, and the scientists are to be believed, then the logical inference is—but I suppose he has long since outgrown it, as we have. Or he may have reduced it to a rudimentary stump and discouraged its further growth by too frequent indulgence in his strenuous habit of sitting down hard on heretics, Free-thinkers and other undesirables, which he was in the habit of doing with crushing force and vehemence a few hundred years ago.

In the dictionary a variety of spirits are defined. Some of them are material things having form and substance, such as distilled liquids, alcohol in its various forms, etc. Others are immaterial, intangible, invisible spirits, including supernatural apparitions, specters, sprites, fairies and ghosts, not the holy ghost, just the common graveyard, "haunted" house and spiritualist seance breed of fakes, with which we have nothing to do. Under the theological head Webster gives the Bible definition of spirit as follows: "The spirit of God, or the third person of the Trinity; the Holy Ghost." When we try to consider this holy trinity riddle literally we get balled up at the start. Its mathematical crudity and farcical absurdity is enough to upset the gravity of the infant class in a school of lobsters. We are expected to believe that the trinity is one individual person, composed of three individual persons, either one of which equals the other two, while the two, any two of them, play no greater part in the scheme of salvation than the one. The inspired inventor of the trinity puzzle may have been divinely inspired of God, but to me he seems to have been more deeply inspired by a malevolent desire to discredit one of our oldest, truest and most honored proverbs, "Figures won't lie," which in order to be on the safe side, should be amended as follows: "provided, however, they are not divinely inspired Bible figures," which do lie outrageously.

When we consider this trinity sample of trifling with the English language, in the spiritual sense, the mental sledding becomes much smoother; the mathematical ruts and stumps seem to disappear and our credulity suffers no rough jolts. Spiritually defined, it foots up like this: One individual hunk of nothing composed of three individual hunks of nothing. So far as the human mind can conceive of nothing, it does not shock our credulity to believe that one hunk of nothing stacks up even with two hunks, or two million hunks, of the same, for that matter, and vice versa. That is the spiritual sense, or nonsense, of the trinity.

I will now cite a few physiological facts as they are in our schools and colleges, sectarian as well as secular. Nature has provided us with five senses, sight, hearing, taste, smell and touch. The sense of sight operates in this way: We fix our gaze upon a certain object and an image of that object is formed upon the retinas of our eyes. It is a very frail image, a mere shadow, yet it has the power to excite the optic nerves to action, causing them to carry to the brain knowledge of the impression on the eye. Then, and not till then, are we conscious of the presence of that object. Nor can we form the remotest idea of the nature of that object before the brain, the organ of thought, the seat of the mind, has been stimulated to action by the sense of sight acting upon it through the eye and the optic nerves. The other four senses operate on a similar plan. We can form no idea or conception of the color, sound, taste, odor or feeling of an object until the brain has been called into action by one or another of our physical senses coming in contact with a material object, thereby exciting the special nerves which serve that particular sense to action upon the brain. And don't forget this solid fact: Our physical senses cannot sense nothing; and I have shown unimpeachable testimony, orthodox and scientific, that the holy spirit is absolutely nothing, can not be seen, heard, tasted, smelt or felt, being without body or parts, form or substance, and being thus, it can not in the slightest degree, directly or indirectly, affect any one of our physical senses, causing them to function in the natural legitimate way necessary to produce thought, an idea, a concept or impression.

That is why I felt safe in saying that the learned pastor was profoundly and hopelessly ignorant of what he was talking about when he was presuming to straighten out a meaningless text according to the spiritual sense. When I hear a preacher or a number of devout Christians discussing spirituality, the spiritual sense and the spiritual birth, I am enlightened, edified and amused just as I would be when listening to a flock of geese explaining the nebular hypothesis or a caddy of educated oysters discussing the fourth dimension.

FREETHOUGHT MUST BE DEFINITE.

From Bennett Larson, Wisconsin.

To the Editor of The Truth Seeker:

When I read the editorial in THE TRUTH SEEKER of May 5, "The Tendency Toward Good," I imagined that I was reading Emerson.

All of your editorials are good, but this one was a classic. Keep on breathing this fresh faith upon the world; it needs it. It reminded me of Tennyson's saying that "there is more faith in honest doubt than in half the creeds"; and of that remark of Oscar Wilde's that "Agnosticism in order to be a success must become a religion," or words to that effect, and we need not shy at the word. The word religare, from which religion is supposed to be derived, means to bind fast, and surely we must fix our hopes on something if Free-thought is to be a constructive force in the world; and that confidence which the theist places in a god the Rationalist puts in the eternal processes of the universe, welcoming the edicts of change.

Another definition of religion is "right feeling towards god," and to the Rationalist this is simply adjusting ourselves to the universe and to its economy in which all things are utilized. Surely the seemingly barren tree of war whose roots are being nourished by the blood and tears of humanity must some time bear fruit. The sun of Liberty has already brought forth some blossoms on its eastern bough—Russia.

Waking from day dreams beside a stream upon a summer day, my companion watched the grass and twigs swirling backward in the eddies along the shore and remarked that the river seemed to have recoiled upon itself. But I pointed farther out toward the middle of the stream, where the driftwood was quietly borne along on the resistless current, to prove that the river was pursuing its accustomed course. It is the same with life and with institutions. We are deceived by the noisy shallows, but the deeps are dumb. Religion has given us ears to hear the noisy shallows, but Freethought and Rationalism will give us eyes to see and brains to think, faith in men and women, in real things, the ability to utilize the accumulated experiences of mankind in the "tendency to good."

RECALLING HANS SCHMIDT.

From W. E. Aughinbaugh.

To the Editor of The Truth Seeker:

In front of the Church of the Holy Decapitation, located at 125th street and Morningside place, passers have been importuned by dozens of girls and boys under ten years of age to give ten cents for a novena in honor of St. Joseph. Inquiry developed the fact that the holy gospel sharks associated with this holy Catholic church give a prize to the child bringing in the greatest sum daily. Can't this be stopped legally? It is wrong to teach children to accost persons and beg for money, especially for such a close relative of Jesus as Joseph is supposed to be.

It would seem that this church should be willing to keep in the background for some years to come, for it was one of its holy priests, the Very Reverend Hans Schmidt, who cut the head off one of his poor dupes after he had used her for his holy purposes.

The idea of holding up Jew, Protestant, Chinamen and others to get money to pay a Catholic priest to pray for some special purpose shows that the clergy connected with this gospel shop are lacking in common decency.

THE CHURCH AND THE NEGRO.

From Gordon Owens, Chicago.

To the Editor of The Truth Seeker:

It looks as though the white Christians both north and south have decided on a policy of making colored Christians become Rationalists. I cite a few instances for example. At the Alabama Sociological Congress a white Christian judge named Abernathy, speaking of the negroes, said: "From the top of his bone head to the bottom of his flat foot, there isn't a chance to educate a negro. God almighty made them to hew wood and draw water, and I'm opposed to educating them. Booker Washington has done more harm in Alabama than tuberculosis."

Several white ministers of New York city have recently been assailing the negro "invasion of Harlem." "The color question," they say, "is a great menace to us." In something the same way, I take it, the Gentiles were "a menace to the Jews" until Jesus Christ preached a new and unpopular gospel which the reverend doctors of that day stopped by a timely crucifixion.

Thus we can plainly see why the white church is failing. It dare not listen to the truth about present conditions. It dare not inveigh against the thief who is at the bottom of modern industrial organization. It dare not say of the negro, "love your neighbor as yourself." Compelled to be dumb on these great matters of morality and decency, it turns to assailing the negro, and to hell and damnation, and summons Billy Sunday to preach it.

Let the church continue this course and its colored jim-crow membership will melt away as the snow melts away on account of the rays of a warm noonday sun. Its conduct is doing more to make colored Atheists than all of the Rational propaganda, and I congratulate the colored people.

BILLY SUNDAY'S INCOME.

From Chas. F. Cobb, Colorado.

To the Editor of The Truth Seeker:

I notice in THE TRUTH SEEKER of May 12, page 297, an article entitled "The Revival Racket," quoting figures from Current Opinion purporting to have been the income of Billy Sunday during the last seven years from the cities mentioned. As I have been more or less interested in clipping various newspaper accounts of his various financial successes, I will herewith submit the figures to you, as I got them, and assure you that if space permits, I would like to see the list in THE TRUTH SEEKER.

The list begins about the year 1908, and is more or less interesting, on account of showing how his popularity grew.

Galesburg, Ill.	$5,600.00
Muscatine, Iowa	5,611.10
Decatur, Ill.	11,379.00
Charleston, Ill.	6,000.00
Sharon, Pa.	6,330.00
Jacksonville, Ill.	17,500.00
Ottumway, Iowa	7,353.00
Spokane, Wash.	10,868.00
Springfield, Ill.	10,374.00
Marshalltown, Iowa	6,320.00
Boulder, Colo.	3,496.94
Cedar Rapids, Iowa	6,900.00
Youngstown, Ohio	10,000.00
Newcastle, Pa.	13,000.00
Waterloo, Iowa	8,400.00
Centerville, Iowa	1,500.00
Keokuk, Iowa	2,500.00
McComb, Ill.	3,100.00
Burlington, Iowa	4,000.00
Dixon, Ill.	2,000.00
Rochester, Minn.	2,250.00
Princeton, Ill.	5,360.00
Worthington, Minn.	2,100.00
Murphysborough, Ill.	4,300.00
Fairfield, Iowa	3,608.00
Knoxville, Iowa	3,148.00
Galesburg, Ill.	5,000.00
Jacksonville, Ill.	7,500.00
East Liverpool, Ohio	7,000.00
Lima, Ohio	8,050.00
Stubenville, Ohio	11,345.70
Columbus, Ohio	20,959.58
McKeesport, Ohio	13,438.00
Toledo, Ohio	15,423.00
Wheeling, W. Va.	17,450.00
Springfield, Ohio	14,900.00
Newcastle, Pa.	14,000.00
Erie, Pa.	11,565.00
Portsmouth, Ohio	7,100.00
Canton, Ohio	12,500.00
Youngstown, Ohio	12,000.00
South Bend, Ind.	11,200.00
Beaver Falls, Pa.	10,000.00
Johnstown, Pa.	14,000.00
Colorado Springs, Colo.	5,611.58
Denver, Colo.	10,000.00
Wichita, Kan.	10,111.00
Des Moines, Iowa	13,000.00
Wilkes-Barre, Pa.	22,288.90
Scranton, Pa.	22,398.00
Pittsburg, Pa.	46,000.00
Kansas City, Mo.	32,000.00
Baltimore, Md.	40,000.00
Trenton, N. J.	35,000.00
Syracuse, N. Y.	25,000.00
Omaha, Neb.	20,000.00
Paterson, N. J.	25,000.00
Philadelphia, Pa.	51,136.85
Boston, Mass.	55,000.00
	$788,245.55

"ONSCREWING THE ONSCREW TABLE."

From A. Plumber, Pennsylvania.

To the Editor of The Truth Seeker:

Hitting the trail is part of the day's work for employees of oil refineries. To clean floors of oil-saturated surface, fresh sawdust is scattered over them, and then swept or shoveled, according to amount used. When this sawdust lies neglected in the corners or in places where a little effort is required, it becomes a sour smelling muck.

Occasionally when a new employee is filling barrels and probably thinking of "The Sweet By and By," he comes out of his trance by being in a fountain filled with oil. Old hands will say the barrel was not big enough; nevertheless the barrel slops over mightily and there is a rush for sawdust before the boss arrives.

In the Literary Digest about two months ago was a photograph of a Billy Sunday audience in Boston. The "goo goo" expression showed that the boss was not on the job and apparently they were glad of it, and some were rather old jaspers at that. They needed the sawdust, but were not familiar with its use as an absorbent adjunct of religion; consequently they soaked it up and became incurably religious. Yes, they were inefficient. Reason will look them square in the face and pass on.

CHILDREN'S CORNER FOR BOYS AND GIRLS YOUNG AND OLD

"Between the dark and the daylight,
When the night is beginning to lower,
Comes a pause in the day's occupations
That is known as the Children's Hour."

FREETHOUGHT CALENDAR.

CONDUCTED BY FRANKLIN STEINER.

Charles A. Watts, May 27, 1858.

The founder of the English Rationalist Press Association was born in London, May 27, 1858. He is the eldest son of the famous lecturer and debater, Charles Watts, whose biography appeared some weeks ago in this column. At the early age of twelve Mr. Watts was apprenticed to the then well known Freethought publisher Austin Holyoake, a brother of George Jacob Holyoake. By the time he became of age he had a fair knowledge of the printing and publishing business. His father acquired the business of Mr. Holyoake when the latter died in 1874. Five years later he transferred it to the subject of this sketch, who soon began to branch out in new directions. In 1885 he started Watts's Literary Guide, which was so successful that he was soon encouraged to enlarge it. In 1896 it was increased to its present size, the name of Watts being omitted from the title. From that date it has made steady progress and now has a circulation of about six thousand copies each month. The contributors comprise many of the foremost writers in the Rationalist movement. In 1899, Mr. Watts with a few friends founded the Rationalist Press Association, Limited, which has nearly three thousand members or subscribers residing in all parts of the world. It is no exaggeration to say that this organization has seriously revolutionized religious thought in England, mainly through the circulation of its sixpenny reproductions of noted Rationalist, scientific and historical books, of which over three million copies have been sold. Mr. Watts has been brought into contact with most of the celebrated Freethinkers of the last century, including Bradlaugh, the Holyoake brothers, Herbert Spencer, Sir Leslie Stephen, Edward Clodd, Moncure D. Conway and W. Stewart Ross ("Saladin"); and among his correspondents during the same period there has been nearly every eminent heretic within or without the church. He has one son, at present engaged in the great World War, and it is the father's wish and belief that he will in the course of years materially assist in carrying on the organized Rationalist propaganda in England. It is interesting to note that the R. P. A. (as the Rationalist Press Association is generally known) has already received several substantial legacies, and that nearly eight of its members have formally notified the secretary that in their wills they have left money to the Association—the amounts varying from £10 to £5000. There are more ways than one for a man to be of service to the cause of Rationalism. Mr. Watts in his career has demonstrated this by his fertility of resources and thorough knowledge of business, especially as it pertains to printing and publishing. Fortunately he is strong in these qualities, in which many others have been weak.

Other events of which the past week is the anniversary are:

May 27, John Calvin died, 1564. First telegraph in U. S., 1844.
May 28, Noah Webster died, 1843. Monasteries abolished in Portugal, 1834.
May 29, H. T. Buckle died, 1862. Gerald Massey born, 1828. Patrick Henry born, 1736.
May 30, Decoration Day. Voltaire died, 1778. Alexander Pope died, 1744.
May 31, Walt Whitman born, 1819. Paine's monument re-dedicated, 1881.
June 1, Hassell, employee of Carlisle, sentenced for selling Paine's works, 1824.
June 2, Giuseppe Garibaldi died, 1882.

POETRY IN PROSE.

"In substance of thought and in form of its presentation," says Dr. Marion Miller, "Lincoln's Gettysburg speech is as perfect a poem as ever was written, and even in the minor qualities of artistic language, rhythm and cadence, it excels the finest gem to be found in poetic cabinets from the Greek Anthology downward." Only because it was not written in the typography of verse, with capitalized and paragraphed initial words at the beginning of each thought-group of words, thinks the writer, has it failed of recognition as a poem by academic minds. Dr. Miller straightway proceeds to demonstrate his point. Here is the speech, thrown into the new poetic style:

Four score and seven years ago
Our fathers brought forth on this continent
A new nation,
Conceived in liberty,
And dedicated to the proposition
That all men are created equal.

Now we are engaged in a great civil war,
Testing whether that nation,
Or any nation so conceived and so dedicated,
Can long endure.
We are met on a great battlefield of that war.
We have come to dedicate a portion of that field
As a final resting-place
For those who here gave their lives
That that nation might live.
It is altogether fitting and proper
That we should do this.

But, in a larger sense,
We can not dedicate—
We can not consecrate—
We can not hallow—
This ground.
The brave men, living and dead,
Who struggled here
Have consecrated it far above our poor power
To add or detract.
The world will little note nor long remember
What we say here,
But it can never forget
What they did here.

It is for us, the living rather,
To be dedicated here to the unfinished work
Which they who fought here have so nobly advanced.
It is rather for us to be here dedicated
To the great task remaining before us—
That from these honored dead
We take increased devotion to that cause
For which they gave the last full measure of devotion;
That we here highly resolve
That these dead shall not have died in vain;
That this nation shall have
A new birth of freedom;
And that government of the people,
By the people, and for the people
Shall not perish from the earth.

The speeches and tributes of Ingersoll are rich with this kind of free verse. On May 19, 1888, he delivered before the New York legislature at Albany a tribute to Roscoe Conkling that is a noble poem from beginning to end. It closes thus:

"He was of the classic mould—
A figure from the antique world.
He had the pose of the great statues—
The pride and bearing of the intellectual Greek,
Of the conquering Roman,
And he stood in the wide free air
As though within his veins there flowed
The blood of a hundred kings.

And as he lived he died,
Proudly he entered the darkness—
Or the dawn—
That we call death. Unshrinkingly
He passed beyond our horizon,
Beyond the twilight's purple hills,
Beyond the utmost reach of human harm or help—
To that vast realm of silence or of joy
Where the innumerable dwell.
And he has left with us his wealth of thought and deed—
The memory of a brave, imperious, honest man
Who bowed alone to death."
And at a child's grave;
"The dead do not suffer. If they live again,
Their lives will surely be as good as ours.
We have no fear.
We are all children of the same mother,
And the same fate awaits us all."

Be Civil.

Who can estimate the value of civility? It costs little to those who show it and is worth much to those who are the recipients of it.

None of us can fully appreciate the value of a kind word to those who are more used to blows.

A lady abruptly turned a corner and ran up against a small and ragged boy.

Stopping as soon as she could, she turned and kindly said, "I beg your pardon; I am very sorry, but I could not help it."

The little fellow looked up in blank amazement for a moment.

Then, taking off the bit of a cap, all he had, he smiled until his face was lost in the smile and said "You may run ag'in me, miss, and knock me clean down, and I won't say a word."

As the lady passed away, he said, "I never had anyone ask my parding before, and it kind o' took me off my feet."

There is a pleasure in civility that is about equally divided between the two parties to it.

Always be civil.

Nothing Suits Everybody.

That it is impossible to please everybody this anecdote shows:

He had opened up a fishshop, and he ordered a new sign painted, of which he was very proud. It read, "Fresh Fish Sold Here." "What did you put the word 'fresh' in for?" said his first customer. "You wouldn't sell them if they weren't fresh, would you?" He painted out the word, leaving it just "Fish Sold Here." "Why do you say 'Here'?" asked his second customer. "You're not selling them anywhere else, are you?" "Why use 'Sold'?" asked the next customer. "You're not giving them away, are you?" So he rubbed out everything but the word "Fish," remarking: "Well, nobody can find fault with that sign anyway." A moment later another customer came in. "I don't see the use of that sign 'Fish' up there," said he, "when you can smell them a mile away."

Two and Two.

George and William, having entered the world in each other's company as twins, were most scornful of "little one babies" who did not arrive thus attended.

They greatly desired a small sister—and her twin—and every night they sent an order to heaven for two little sisters.

Their mother noticed that George added this petition to his prayers one night and William the following, with unfailing regularity.

"Why do you not both ask for your little sisters every night?" she asked.

"Well," said William, official spokesman of the pair, "we thought we'd better take turns about, 'cause if both of us prayed every night for two little sisters God might send us four."

If there is any one person on this earth to whom I take off my hat and wait until they safely pass, it is a school teacher. The most obscure teacher, back in the country hills, unknown, unthought of, unpraised, but with loving patience unfolding the secrets of knowledge to little frowzy headed boys and girls, can look into her mirror at evening and behold the face of an angel.—Dr. D. E. Croft.

They Took the Risk.

Auntie Mabel had sent the three Morgan children a very beautiful imitation fruit each, made of sugar and nicely colored.

Mrs. Morgan thought they ought to be saved; the kids thought differently.

"Now, you really mustn't eat them, you know," explained mother, in a last desperate effort. "They look awfully pretty, but I'm not sure that the coloring may not be dangerous. In fact," she went on, dropping her voice in an awesome whisper, "I have heard of children dying from eating colored things."

She thought that would do the trick, but early next morning she heard a sound out on the landing, and, going to see who was astir so early, found Elsie trotting along the passage.

"Where are you going, dear?" she asked. "It's not six o'clock yet."

"Going to see if Dick and Arthur are dead yet," replied the eight-year-old miss. "I'm not."—Tit-Bits.

An Odd Musician.

The well-known novelist, Jack London, who died recently, was in the habit of paying periodical visits to England to see his publishers and transact other business.

On the last occasion that he was over there he was introduced to a noted musician.

"I, too, am a musician in a small way," said Jack London. "My musical talent was once the means of saving my life. There was a great flood in our town in my boyhood. When the water struck our house my father got on a bed and floated with the stream until he was rescued."

"And you?" asked the musician.

"Well," said Jack London, "you see, I accompanied him on the piano."

Fatal Interruption.

Ralph's father is a doctor, and Ralph naturally likes to play he is one, too, using an old medicine case and hat of his father's to dress the part properly.

One day the telephone rang, whereupon Ralph called out, "Somebody wants me," and caught up his hat and case and hurried out.

"Come back and shut the screen-door, Ralph," called his mother.

Later, when he came in looking very sober, she inquired sociably, "Well, how did you find your patient, Ralph?"

"Dead," he replied, and then added pointedly, "died while I came back to shut the door."—New York Evening Post.

A Hotel with a Heart.

Edward Hungerford, a versatile and successful Watertown writer, writes to the New York Sun from Hannibal, Mo., of a "hotel with a heart" which he found in that city. It is fittingly named "The Mark Twain Hotel."

Over the entrance to the writing room one reads this sign:

"Boys! When did you write mother?"

And the reading of the breakfast card introduced itself with:

"Good morning! Be pleasant every morning until 10 o'clock, and the rest of the day will take care of itself."

The Saving Scot.

Donald McAllister, a Scotch farmer, was going to town for a day or two, and his daughter, Maggie, had a weary time listening to the hundred-and-one instructions he gave her as to care and economy.

"Mind the coal," "Don't waste any food," "Don't sit up burning light," etc.

Finally he set off, but in a moment he was back with a parting admonition:

"An', Maggie, there's young Angus. See that he doesn't wear his spectacles when he's no readin' or writin'! It's needless wear an' tear!"

Everybody likes and respects self-made men. It is a great deal better to be made in that way than not at all.—Holmes.

The talent of success is nothing more than doing what you can do well without a thought of fame.—Longfellow.

THE LETTER BOX.

WALTER HOLLOWAY, San Francisco.—The omission of your meeting notice from a few numbers of THE TRUTH SEEKER was accidental and involuntary. The notice has been restored, and may you live long to conduct flourishing meetings.

W. W., Canada.—You may be sure that THE TRUTH SEEKER will not be sidetracked. We keep the even tenor of our way, neither lured aside by the delights of political economy, nor being forced out to discuss the dull and uninteresting topic of sex.

WILLIAM I. R., Berlin.—We read the other day a poetical prophecy written about 105 years ago. It was as follows:

"You're now at war with Yankees,
But you will rue the day
You roused the sons of liberty
In North Amerikay."

G. A. MILLER, 644 South Seventh street, Clarksburg, W. Va.—The merits of your cause, the strength of your arguments, and the quality of your appeal to the Free-thinkers of your vicinity to join the Clarksburg Rationalist Society make the movement there look like a winning one. Keep it up. Be pertinacious, persistent and audacious. Continuous and unrelenting attention and work will overcome most difficulties and bring success even where the chances and the percentage are against it.

VAN DER WEYDE, New York.—Your pictures are hung. Some gallery! McCabe starts the line, which is finished by "September Morn," modestly. Next to McCabe is Dr. Ned Foote; then M. D. Conway, W. H. Harvey, G. E. M., George Seibel, Richard Carlile, Thomas A. Edison—all of the same being specimens of your work, except the peeled peach. The pictures of the Paine houses, in Bleeker street and at New Rochelle, fit well between the large pictures of Bennett, Paine and Ingersoll. The rest of our collection on view includes Professor Leuba, Mary Monico, and a picture of the animals entering the ark, the latter having been presented to us by Mr. Frank Hart of Pennsylvania.

THOMAS G. PATTEN, Postmaster, New York.—Yours of May 14, warning us against sending any advertisement of intoxicating liquors into certain bone-dry states, is received. Instructions will be obeyed, but THE TRUTH SEEKER never published a liquor advertisement anyway. Have you warned the Bible Society to cease vexing the inhabitants of prohibition communities with commendations of booze? The Bible says: "And behold, I will give to thy servants, the hewers that cut timber, twenty thousand baths of wine." The men thus to be rewarded were working on a meeting house. See 2 Chron. ii. And note the bibulous counsel of 1 Tim. v. 23: "Drink no longer water, but use a little wine for thy stomach's sake and thine often infirmities." Can a man serve two masters? Can he obey both the law and the prophets? We have a preacher here who tells us that when men say one thing and the word of God says another, the men may go to hell. That is the higher law.

THE CHRISTIAN MYTHOLOGY

A Work that Traces the Principal Features of the Christian Religion to Their Source in the Mythologies of Older Religions.

By BRIGHAM LEATHERBEE

Illustrated.

A feature of the work is the uncovering of the phallic principles in Christianity, to which the key is given in a series of illustrations.

"The Christian Mythology" is printed on light but substantial paper, convenient in size, handsomely bound in cloth, with gold sidestamp, and is provided with a sufficient index and a Bibliography that guides the reader to works drawn upon as authorities. The unpretentious little volume will bring light to thousands who know nothing about the origin of the dogmas they believe or the rites they practice.

Published by

The Truth Seeker Co.
62 Vesey Street New York
Price, 75 cents

THE REASON WHY. A Story for Freethinkers. By Ernest E. Russell. Paper, 50 cents.

The Ingersoll Birthday Book

Selections by
GRACE LELAND MACDONALD

(Mrs. G. E. Macdonald)

Preface by EVA INGERSOLL-BROWN.

(Granddaughter of Ingersoll)

Decorations by PAUL F. BERDANIER.

Cover by HUGH HENNESSY.

Printed in Color on Cameo Plate Coated Sepia Paper, 252 pages, Octavo.

Descriptive Circular sent free on application.

PRICE, $1.65 POSTPAID

The Truth Seeker Company
62 Vesey Street, New York

This Is the Book We Have Been Waiting For

The Belief In God and Immortality

A STATISTICAL STUDY

By JAMES H. LEUBA

Professor of Psychology and Pedagogy in Bryn Mawr College.

The work is the result of an inquiry among men of science — biologists, sociologists, historians, psychologists — as to whether they believe or want to believe in a prayer-answering God and in continuance of life after death. The answer is altogether different from what might be expected in view of the frequent affirmations of the supernaturalists that belief in Christianity, or at least its fundamental dogmas, is held by the majority of the men of science.

It puts into the hands of Freethinkers exactly the information they want on that subject, with the facts and figures verifying it.

As a logical conclusion, founded upon the general aspect of the case, we have held that science leads its votaries to a rejection of such undemonstrable propositions as the existence of gods and the survival of the "soul" when the body is dead. Here we have the evidence, in statistical form, which confirms our view.

To the inquiry into the attitude of the scientists there are added statistics regarding the thought of college students regarding the same religious dogmas.

The author is himself a man of science, an authority in his special branch, which is Psychology, and he knows and sets forth the origin and history of the beliefs with which he deals.

No recent book has attracted more attention from the press, or presented such a serious problem to the supernaturalists.

Cloth, 8vo., $2, postpaid

Sold by

The Truth Seeker Company
62 Vesey Street, New York

MIRACLES OF SCIENCE. A Record of Scientific Progress in This Century. By Henry Smith Williams. Price $2. Postage 15 cents.

The Candle from Under the Bushel

(Mark iv, 21); or,

1,306 Questions to the Clergy

And for the Consideration of Others.

Instructive, Interesting, and Laughable.

By WILLIAM HART

Price, paper, 50 cents; cloth, $1.00.

Address THE TRUTH SEEKER CO.

MYTH AND LEGEND IN THE BIBLE

By Keighley Snowden.

A valuable handbook for those who desire to keep handy a clear statement of the most assured results of modern thought as applied to the critical examination of the Bible.

Price, cloth, $1.50.

Address, THE TRUTH SEEKER CO.,
62 Vesey St., New York.

The Influence of the Church on

Marriage AND Divorce

By JOSEPH McCABE

Marriage law reform is a subject which is likely to assume greater prominence in the near future. There does not exist in English a complete study of the historical influence of the church on marriage. The lack is supplied by Mr. McCabe's new book, which deals fully with the Roman and medieval systems and the modern humanist development.

PRICE, CLOTH, $1.75

The Truth Seeker Co.

62 Vesey St. - New York, N. Y.

THE CASE OF BILLY SUNDAY

A complete exposure of the greatest charlatan of the age, exhibiting his coarse vulgarity in the pulpit, his medieval theology, his insane bigotry, his vulgar abusiveness, and his fundamental dishonesty. Contains the famous parallel columns showing his stealings from Ingersoll, and presents unanswerable proof of the deliberate falsehoods with which he has sought to turn aside exposure. Now is the time to circulate this most effective of all propaganda documents by the hundreds and thousands.

PRICE, FIVE CENTS

For sale by

THE TRUTH SEEKER
62 Vesey Street, New York City

SELF-CONTRADICTIONS OF THE BIBLE. By W. H. Burr. One hundred and forty-four propositions embodying the most palpable and striking self-contradictions of the Bible with a summary. Price 15 cents.

THE FOURTH DEMAND. Religious Teaching in Public Schools, with Reasons Why It Should Be Abolished. By Woolsey Teller. This is a fresh and up-to-date discussion of the subject. Price, 10 cents.

DESIGN ARGUMENT. Anatomically and Physiologically Considered. By an East Indian. Per copy, 10 cents; fifteen copies, $1.

ANTICHRIST. By Ernest Renan. Paper, 50 cents; cloth, $1.00.

The R. P. A. ANNUAL 1917

LIST OF CONTRIBUTIONS:

RELIGION AFTER THE WAR
Arnold Bennett

WILL ORTHODOX CHRISTIANITY SURVIVE THE WORLD WAR?

An attempt at Forecast by Representative Humanists: Sir Ray Lankester, Leonard Huxley, John A. Robson, Sir Bryan Donkin, Hon. John Collier, Professor J. B. Bury, Henry W. Nevinston, Sir H. H. Johnston, H. de Vere Stacpoole, and Right Hon. J. M. Robertson, M.P.

THEOLOGY AND THE WAR..
William Archer

THE GREATEST ILLUSION..
Adam Gowans Whyte

PRE-ANIMISM...Edward Clodd

THE NEOLITH: A POEM.....
Eden Phillpotts

THE PAPACY DURING THE RENAISSANCE

Joseph McCabe

WATCHMAN, WHAT OF THE NIGHT? ...Charles T. Gorham

Sold at

THE TRUTH SEEKER OFFICE

Or sent postpaid for

40 cents per copy

TENTH EDITION. Crimes of Preachers

A RECORD OF THE CLERGY WHO HAVE COMMITTED CRIMES AND IMMORALITIES.

As was said of previous editions, the record is startlingly instructive and will open the eyes of the people, proving as it does that in thousands of cases the Bible and the Christian religion have totally failed to keep even their exponents from committing acts of grossest immorality and deeds of darkest crime.

Cover in colors. 247 pages.

PRICE, 35 CENTS

Address, THE TRUTH SEEKER CO.,
62 Vesey St., New York.

Is The Bible Worth Reading? And Other Essays

By LEMUEL K. WASHBURN

Price, postpaid, $1.

Address THE TRUTH SEEKER,
62 Vesey St. New York

DEPARTMENT OF ECONOMICS.

The Economic Tide of Feminism.

Literally I have laid down my hoe which I have been using in my vegetable garden and turned to the typewriter in the humble endeavor to steer, if I possibly can, the discussion of feminism appearing in the columns of THE TRUTH SEEKER back to the paths of a dignity worthy of the subject.

This physical weariness that grips me I know is as old as the race. I look back down the millenniums and there labors woman at two tasks, feeding and clothing the race. When the race was very young she did all the feeding, while man busied himself with the chase and war. As the ages grew more settled less need of war arose and man gradually encroached on woman's field of creating food, crowding her little by little till most of her time was spent indoors with consequent physical deterioration. And there she has labored ever since till the eighteenth century. Her shuttles have flown and her spinning wheels have hummed. While the world's labor-driving power was the muscle of the human arm and back, she could not compete outdoors with man.

Social concepts arose in accordance with this situation. A man-made world-God was created as a man; woman brought the evil into the world and all the rest of the tenets and concepts. Through one channel alone she gripped man, through the channel of sex. Here he was caught in a power greater than his own, and woman used this, her only hold, almost to the race's undoing, because her dependence forced its use on her. She has sold this sex attraction for a song and been a prostitute, or held it dear and became a queen, like Anne Boleyn. In this sorry scheme of things it would seem that we would have a race of two distinct and utterly different sexes each possessing different virtues and different vices, and in the common discussions we find Yahoo sociologists trying to make it appear that way. They make Rome—poor old Rome—fall again through woman the slave, or woman the emancipated. They paint Elizabeth ruled by men (which scientific modern history has proven false, for England's greatest monarch did her own rulings), and then comes the retort that Louis XIV. was ruled by women. But why repeat such wearisome criticism? The fatal error made here is the failure to realize that wise old Mother Nature is constantly striking the average in the human race by making the child the child of both parents. Elizabeth was Anne Boleyn and Henry VIII. in one. That is why it is so foolish to claim all virtues for one sex and all weaknesses for another. There are sissy men and masculine women. But put all men into women's physical environment and all women into men's for a few generations and then let our embryonic sociologists try to figure out again just how this human brain is an organ of sex.

Prof. H. Morse Stephens of Oxford, Cornell and California Universities once told the writer that in all his years of experience he had found absolutely no difference in the quality of men's and women's brains. His testimony is universal among those of equal experience. The blood in all veins is red. We are human first and sexed afterwards. As Schreiner so wisely puts it: "The sexes are held together by the yoke of sex. One sex cannot develop very far ahead of the other for the iron law of heredity draws it back." And therefore again man has not developed as he should because he has denied woman educational privileges, and nature has wreaked her vengeance on him by giving his sons their mother's undeveloped intellect.

But the tide comes in. Woman is no longer confined to the doll's house. Toward the latter end of the eighteenth century a new power, steam, was harnessed to the wheels of industry. The driving power was no longer the muscle of man, and a woman could handle a lever as easily as a man. And she did it. For the first time in the history of the world woman worked for an employer who was neither her husband or father. She had become an economic unit. Hence she began to demand political recognition. Just as every other political unit that ever seized a place in the state. Economic power first, then the demand for political recognition. Coincident with the industrial emancipation comes emancipation in every other line. Industrial equality gives birth to all other equalities. New social concepts are forming to accord with the new arrangement. Woman enters the professions as well. She is coming back and demanding half the labor of the world which man took from her when he gave up the chase and uninterrupted wars. We may say the old arrangement was the best even though we profess to believe in evolution while saying it. But all the arguing in the world will not stop it. The tide will not obey King Canute. Let the church rail against it. Let parasitic women who love their parasitism denounce it as "unlady-like." Let Ridpath's History-of-the-World historians cause ancient empires to fall over it, just as though there really were steam-driven engines then, nevertheless the tide will continue to come in.

When the child is begotten in mutual equality and respect, and reared to believe that man and woman alike have the sacred right to choose their paths, then perhaps we may see the first faint flicker of the dawn of true democracy.

MARGARET MORE OLIVER.

COUNTER STRATEGY.

(The government commission on white paper has solved the problem of extortionate charges by advising consumers to use less paper.)

If all of the bakers go into cahoots
And boost up the tariff on bread
Don't sit 'round and fuss, nor get angry and cuss
Just cut out their product instead.

If all of the butchers go into a trust,
And raise the quotations on meat,
Don't riot and storm. You can make them reform
By simply refusing to eat.

If clothing goes up beyond reach of your purse,
It won't help you any to roar;
The easiest way is to vow from today,
That you will not wear clothes any more.

If coal can't be had at a price you can pay,
And the trust pulls the "Coal Shortage" wheeze,
Don't kick up a row, but serenely allow
That you'll do without fuel—and freeze.

And since the embalmers have put up their tolls
And coffins and headstones are high,
Don't worry at all. You can checkmate them all,
By merely declining to die
(Compliments of) GEORGE W. PERRY.

COMBINING CHRISTIANITY AND SOCIALISM.

This combination sounds good to Professor Rauschenbusch. But one word he never mentions, the brand he wants the Socialist to join. In New York city I find there are about eighty-five kinds of Christian churches, so that looks rather bewildering almost to a man of Professor Rauschenbusch's mind. How kind of him to tell us that the Christian religion is the very foundation of truth. Well, Professor Rauschenbusch, let us take away what you have stolen from the Jews, and then show us what remains of your Christian religion! You got the Jewish god, creation, garden of Eden, fall of man, the devil, and Noah the admiral, who was so holy when he was drunk that when his son accidentally happened to review the old sport, God cursed him and his seed forever, and they were made slaves to their brethren. Shem lived thirty-five years after the death of Abraham. Now there is a fine chap. He drove his eldest son and his wife Hagar out into the wilderness, gave them a jug of water and a loaf of bread. He married his half-sister and he hired her out to kings for revenue, and she was not as clean or free from venereal sickness as she should have been. He is not the father of Isaac—Abimelech most likely is. Jacob was a swindler. Read chapter xxxviii in Genesis. See the action of his son Judah. Then the sons of Jacob murdered a whole lot of good people. Moses was a murderer, and he gave the people this from the Lord: "Thou shalt not suffer a witch to live."

Then you have Samson, a trapper, fiddler, etc., the long-haired Hercules; then David the general crook; also his son with some 1,000 mothers-in-law, and some fancy songs; then there are the prophets; also Mary, Christ and all the apostles. You have also Jerusalem and all of Palestine, stolen from the Jews; also most of the names used today among us. Yet you have hunted the Jews like wild beasts. Subtract what you have stolen and then bring forward your Christianity. F. LARSON.

LABOR IS AGAINST IT.

On May 12 Samuel Gompers, head of the American Federation of Labor, addressed organized labor a vigorous letter asking for immediate protest to every Representative and Senator at Washington against the proposal to increase postage rates on second class matter and against the application of the zone system.

Asserting that the American Federation of Labor always has protested against unwarranted restrictions on a free press and will continue to protest until every court and judge in the land will fully observe this fundamental right, Mr. Gompers pointed out that a new menace had arisen in the attempt unduly to tax printed matter coming under the rules of second class postage.

"Profits and incomes should be taxed, but the very source of employment of our fellow workers and the maintenance of a liberal and free press should remain unimpaired," said the statement. "An immediate protest against this proposed increase in postage rates on second class matter and against the application of the 'zone system' should be directed to every congressman and senator. Every central labor union, state federation of labor, should immediately voice their protest against this menacing proposal. Action to be effective must be had at once. Respond to this appeal without delay. Act now.

"Underlying all of our achievements has been the unrestricted right to a free press, unhampered by unwarranted restrictions and not unduly burdened by excessive taxation in any form.

"Within the past few days a new menace has presented itself to the free press of our country in the legislative proposal to tax unduly printed matter coming under the rules of second class postage. Under guise of a war revenue measure, it is not only proposed to increase the postage rate of second class matter from one to two cents a pound, but it is also intended to apply a 'zone system' (district rates), thereby practically increasing the cost of carrying printed matter from one cent a pound to six cents a pound. No such exorbitant rate as this exists for any class of matter for the longest world's routes even in war times. Such a tax is strictly prohibitive. It spells disaster and ruin to the labor press of our country and will seriously hamper and retard that part of the public press sympathetic to the appeals and needs of the labor movement.

"To place a double and triple tax upon the public press is without warrant and excuse, and simply means that many publications will be forced out of existence. Such a condition will seriously menace the conditions of life and work of the men and women employed in the printing and closely related and kindred trades by throwing thousands of them out of employment."

SCIENCE DISCOVERS WHAT PITY REALLY IS.

According to the very latest laboratory investigations, science has discovered the true meaning of pity.

Pity is the feeling of compassion, mercy and sympathy brought about by the action of the gland substances in the body. It is not, as the average person supposes, the "playing on your heart strings." The heart, as a matter of fact, has little to do with this sensation except to act as a sensitive exposed camera-plate which reflects and develops the emotions caused by the glandular disturbances.

Laboratory experiments bring to light the fact that not everyone experiences the feeling of pity. Dr. Makensky of Buda Pest recently placed twelve people—three young girls, three boys, three women and three men—in his laboratory where he showed a series of moving pictures which displayed touching, pathetic and heart-rending scenes. The females displayed twice as much emotion as the males. Two of the males were entirely unmoved and showed no signs of sympathetic impression by the pictures. On the other hand, expression of pity, words of condolence and tear-filled eyes expressed the females' strong feeling for the striking situations portrayed on the screen. The other four males showed no signs of disturbances, yet were somewhat more kindly in their facial expressions and utterances.

According to Dr. Makensky, pity is an emotion uncontrolled by logic and sane reasoning. He states that in some instances pity is substituted by what he calls "dollars and cents charity." This, he says, is not an emotional disturbance at all, but simply a pretentious act of the idle rich who claim that a bank check offering is their "pity, their duty and their reputation."

Externally, to display any sensation of pity, sympathy, compassion or strong feeling for or with the sufferings of others means that your face takes on a "long look," is languid and listless, and many times the brow and forehead is furrowed and wrinkled for the occasion. Internally, the adrenal, pituitary, suprarenal, thyroid, sex and the other glands rush their contents onward into the streams of life. The thyroid is particularly responsible for such disturbances of pity as well as those of cruelty and ruthlessness, the contradictory of pity.

To pity a poor old woman on a crowded thoroughfare is nine times in ten a feeling unprotected by reason. If you step up to her and drop a few pennies in her hand, you do not reason with yourself that the city can well keep such people off the streets. Every city has ample room in the institutions built and kept up by the city or state for elderly pedestrians, beggars, "blind" couples and the like. Just "for the looks of the thing" you drop a dime or a quarter in the pencil-man's tin cup, and pat yourself on the back because you have put your pity into action. All the while you have done something to induce a beggarly attitude in these street people. But you call it pity and charity and let it go at that. To help such people to help themselves would have been the real sensation of pity and charity.—LEONARD KEENE HIRSHBERG, M. D., (Johns Hopkins University), in Unity.

A FEW SOPRANO NOTES.

I would not be President of the United States, for who would choose to be a goatherd?

* * *

It does not shock me to see a plutocrat perched upon his ill-gotten gains, saying: "I am the great I am"; for often have I beheld a cock crowing on a dunghill.

* * *

Four-fifths of mankind are mental castaways, chewing intellectual sea-boots and finding their flavor good.

* * *

Give me a knave before a fool. Weed-grown soil may be improved, but toil spent upon arid ground is wasted.

* * *

"A fool and his money are soon parted," says the proverb. That is no reproach to the fool: it constitutes his sole claim to existence.

* * *

Chamfort, the French philosopher and wit, among his aphorisms says that in the scriptures, when it is a question of crimes or rages the perpetrators thereof are referred to as the children of men; but that when it is a question of weakness or foolishness, the guilty ones are called the children of women. Well worth is it to delve among the contradictions and puerilities of the holy book, if one recover one such gem of truth as this.

* * *

Fabre, the French entomologist, tells of a certain moth that, having used the male of its species for the reproductive function, instantly falls upon him and slays him outright. So is it with average women; for having married a man and gratified their desire for offspring, do they not slay within their mate all that he once in young ambition hoped to be? Do not they kill within him all but his capacity to work?—and not to work, mark ye, with his highest powers so that he grows, but week after week to bring home the coin-equivalent of so many loaves, until all is dead within him but bare life.

MARY MONICO.

"Cursed by the Past: Blessed by the Future"

REMSBURG'S LATEST WORK

Thomas Paine

The Apostle of Liberty

BY JOHN E. REMSBURG

This is the Great Address delivered by Remsburg in Chicago last year, pronounced a masterpiece of thrilling oratory. To the Address is added

The Testimony of Five Hundred Witnesses.

This list of the names and words of eminent persons in all walks of life who have praised Paine is a revelation even to his admirers and students, and the eulogy of Remsburg is unsurpassed.

220 Pages; 12mo, Paper, 50 Cents

Published and sold by

THE TRUTH SEEKER CO.
62 Vesey St. - New York

DYNAMIC THEORY OF LIFE AND MIND. By James B. Alexander. An Attempt to show that all Organic Beings are Both Constructed and Operated by the Dynamic Agencies of their respective Environments. Over 400 illustrations, 87 chapters, 1,057 pages, and a 3-column index of 11 pages. Price, express prepaid, $2.75.

SEVENTH EDITION — REDUCED PRICE

BIBLE MYTHS

AND THEIR PARALLELS IN OTHER RELIGIONS

Being a Comparison of the Old and New Testament Myths and Miracles with those of Heathen Nations of Antiquity

CONSIDERING ALSO THEIR ORIGIN AND MEANING. WITH NUMEROUS ILLUSTRATIONS.

IT is a perfect Encyclopedia on the subjects treated, containing a vast amount of out-of-the-way knowledge not accessible to the majority of readers, and all the objections to the dogmas of Christianity one is likely to encounter, grouped under appropriate heads. No author has struck harder blows at the Christian religion. It is the most important Biblical criticism that has ever appeared, being the result of many years of study of the religions of antiquity. It is thoroughly reliable, every fact being verified by copious notes and authorities.

COL. ROBERT G. INGERSOLL said: "This work demonstrates the fact that there is nothing new or original in Christianity; that its maxims, miracles, and mistakes, its doctrines, sacraments, and ceremonies, were all borrowed; that its virgin mothers, miraculous babes, courier-stars, crucifixions, resurrections, and ascensions were familiar things hundreds of years before the founder of Christianity was born. It shows that all the machinery of the supernatural has been in active operation for countless generations; that all the nations of antiquity had about the same religious experience, and substantially agreed as to the correctness of about the same mistakes. Catholicism administered on the estate of Paganism, and appropriated most of the property to its own use. Christianity furnished new steam for an old engine. Fables, like most other things, wear out and have to be patched, gilded, or replaced.

"The author of 'Bible Myths' has succeeded in showing that our Bible is not the great central fire giving light to the world, but a collection of candles and tapers and sparks borrowed by the 'chosen people' from those whom Jehovah, according to the scriptures, had left in the darkness of nature."

REV. M. J. SAVAGE says: "To me, the volume is worth twenty times its cost."

THE BOSTON COMMONWEALTH says: "Here we have evidence upon evidence that there is no myth, legend, supernatural occurrence, doctrine, rite or ceremony recorded in the Bible which cannot be paralleled in some ancient record centuries older than the page on which the same thing is narrated in the Hebrew and Christian scriptures. We confess we are curious as to how the orthodoxies of the Christian world will greet this book. We more than suspect that they will not greet it at all, but will be content to pass it by in fearful silence."

Seventh Edition: Large 8vo, cloth, 614 pages, $2.

Address THE TRUTH SEEKER :: 62 Vesey Street, New York

In Best of Humor.

The Devil, You Say!—Recent reports indicate that the Devil, who was killed by Billy Sunday at Boston, is rapidly recovering.—Tampa Tribune.

Lost.—Judge—"Madam, have you anything to say?"

Prisoner's Husband—"Lord, judge! Now you've done it!"—Life.

Ah, Liberty!—First Cow—"It is going to be an awful summer for us."

Second Cow—"Yes, it will probably be treason to kick the farm help."—New York Sun.

Satisfaction.—Look here, Finklestein, when I bought this suit you guaranteed satisfaction," growled the irate customer. "Vell, vell, vot's de madder of you! I vos sadisfied."

Sensitive to Light.—"Here's a substance which breaks down when exposed to light," remarked the chemist.

"That must be the stuff reputations are made of," observed the politician.—Life.

The Last Word.—Your wife likes the last word, doesn't she? questioned the confidential friend.

"I don't think so," rejoined the other. "Anyway, she's mighty reluctant about reaching it."

Retributive Justice.—Judge—It seems to me that I have seen you before.

Prisoner—You have, your honor. It was I who taught your daughter to play the piano.

Judge—Thirty years.—Musical American.

Had No Pull.—A prison missionary was visiting one of the inmates of the institution.

"My poor fellow," said he, sympathetically, "what are you in here for?"

"For not havin' political influence enough to git me out."

Another Chicago Hold-up.—A Chicago business man found, yesterday, that he had overdrawn his bank-balance $145; he fainted. A doctor was summoned, and that set him back $5 more. Whereupon he instructed his stenog to look up his balance the next time he fainted, and, if it was found overdrawn, not to call the doctor.—Chicago Tribune.

A Profitable Career.—She—I want my boy to become an evangelist.

He—There you go again; always thinking of money.—Life.

Novel.—"I notice that you publish a verse from the Bible every day," said the caller to the editor of the newspaper. "Do your subscribers ever read it?"

"Should say they do," replied the editor. "Why, it is news to most of them."—Cincinnati Enquirer.

What Did She Change?

To buy her hat took half a day,

So careful her selection,

But when she tried it on at home

It clashed with her complexion—

If what she did you're guessing at—

We know she didn't change the hat.

—San Francisco Chronicle.

Not Effective.—"Now," said the doctor to the young married man, "if you will take this medicine, you will sleep like a baby."

The patient surveyed the prescription doubtfully.

"Well, doctor," he answered, "if you mean like our baby, I guess I won't take it."—New York American.

The Usual Way.—"Time is precious," said the parson.

"It is, indeed," rejoined the business man, "and I've wasted an awful lot of it."

"By indulging in foolish pleasures, I suppose?" suggested the good man.

"Not exactly," replied the other. "I wasted most of it by being punctual in keeping my appointments with others."—Indianapolis Star.

A Mixed Desire.—Early piety combined with a certain worldliness found expression in a city schoolroom when the teacher of a class of small girls asked them to write on their writing pads what they would like to be when they were young women. One little girl wrote:

"I would like to be a dancer on a tight rope if it is the will of the Lord. If not that, a missionary."

The Burial of Hopes.—F. Peter Dunne, of Dooley fame, once told a story about the evening paper in which Mr. Dooley first made his appearance—an ill-fated sheet which the gods loved. One day, just before the end, a funeral passed the office with a band playing the Dead March from "Saul." The editor and Mr. Dunne watched it with emotion and fear. "Can it be," they whispered, "our subscriber?"—Christian Register.

His Rights.—"Why did you strike this man?" asked the Judge sternly.

"He called me a liar, your honor," replied the accused.

"Is that true?" asked the Judge, turning to the man with the muddled-up face.

"Sure, it's true," said the accuser. "I called him a liar because he is one, and I can prove it."

"What have you got to say to that?" asked the Judge of the defendant.

"It's got nothing to do with the case, your honor," was the unexpected reply. "Even if I am a liar, I guess I've got a right to be sensitive about it, ain't I?"—Topeka State Journal.

THE SOUL AND ITS BEARINGS

SHOWING

The Material Quality of the Soul and the Mechanical Nature of Its Functions and of the Business Relations It Sustains with the Environment on One Side and the Rest of the Corporal Organism on the Other.

BY JAMES B. ALEXANDER

This is a Materialistic book. The author does not believe that the soul survives the body. He says: "Is it right to lie for the concealment of a disagreeable truth—to inclose the vital truth in a pleasant husk of fiction by tricking the people with the delusion of agreeable falsehoods? No! Tell the truth! Let not the truth be brought into disrepute by unworthy and debasing associations."

A very frank book; serious, scholarly, convincing.

Price $1.00

Sold at THE TRUTH SEEKER OFFICE

Paine's Age of Reason

By THOMAS PAINE, M.A.

This edition of Thomas Paine's masterpiece is the one that is sure to become the standard for all future correct editions. It is reprinted from one of the first copies in English published by Barrois at Paris, January, 1794, and the proofs were probably read by Paine. It enables the world of the twentieth century to read Paine's AGE OF REASON as Paine wrote it in the eighteenth century. It is printed from large new type. 180 pages. 15c. T. S. Co.

THE CHRISTIAN HELL

From the First to the Twentieth Century

By

HYPATIA BRADLAUGH BONNER

There is no book in the English language which describes the theory and experience of the doctrine of the Christian Hell with such fulness of details as this work by Mrs. Bonner. No one who wishes to know what this doctrine means when carried to its natural conclusions, as in the teaching of the Roman Catholic church, should fail to secure a copy of this startling work. Mrs. Bonner's sources are entirely authentic, and the reader is held spellbound by her graphic descriptions, which grow in intensity as she reaches the climax of her subject. There are some twenty-eight illustrations in the book, taken from pictures actually circulated by the churches, which serve to bring to view all the horrifying phases of this most inhuman of conceptions. This work alone is sufficient to condemn Christianity as a thoroughly unnatural institution.

PRICE, PAPER, 30 CENTS
CLOTH - 45 CENTS

The Truth Seeker

62 Vesey Street - New York

EXEMPTING THE CHURCHES

A Presentation of Facts and Reasons to Show Why

CHURCHES SHOULD BE TAXED

Argument of

JAMES F. MORTON, JR.,

Before the Committee on Taxation of the Constitutional Convention at Albany, New York. Expanded into a pamphlet of 84 pages, to which is annexed a tract by John E. Remsburg.

It Covers All the Ground

The many pretexts for the exemption of church property from taxation examined and exposed.

Price 25 Cents

Write for rates on quantities.
THE TRUTH SEEKER CO.

ETERNITY

World-War Thoughts on Life and Death, Religion, and the Theory of Evolution

By ERNST HAECKEL

(Professor at the University of Jena)

Author of "The History of Creation," "The Evolution of Man," "The Riddle of the Universe," etc.

Of highest importance are these latest thoughts of Professor Haeckel, which embody the ideas of a Monist philosopher and Humanitarian Freethinker on War, Religion, and the nature and origin of Man. The conclusions of the evolutionists on these questions are restated, emphasized and strengthened. Apart from severely scoring the hypocrisy of nations that profess to be followers of a Prince of Peace, and yet enter upon wars of conquest and make arms and munitions their trade, what the author has to say on the merits of the parties to the present war is given in an appendix. In the main he confines himself closely to the themes indicated—science, religion and humanity. He rejects utterly the Christian scheme of this world or any other.

Cloth, $1.25 net.

THE TRUTH SEEKER COMPANY

62 Vesey Street, New York

SELF-CONTRADICTIONS OF THE BIBLE. By W. H. Burr. One hundred and forty-four propositions embodying the most palpable and striking contradictions. Price 15 cents.

News of the Week.

A divorce was granted May 25 to Mrs. Anthony J. Drexel, wife of the Philadelphia banker.

Marshal Joffre and former Premier Viani arrived at Brest, France, May 23, on their return from the United States.

The Singletax campaign committee of New York has entered the municipal campaign with a full ticket, headed by George Wallace, candidate for mayor.

At least fifteen persons were killed and fifty injured May 25 when a tornado struck Andale, Kan., fifteen miles northwest of Wichita.

Ex-Premier Ivan L. Goremykin of Russia, arrested during the revolution and imprisoned in the fortress of Sts. Peter and Paul, has gone insane.

The Italian War Mission to the United States arrived at Washington May 23 and was welcomed with distinguished honor and extreme cordiality.

It was announced at Bryn Mawr College, Pa., May 23, that Miss Helen Herron Taft, daughter of ex-President Taft, had been unanimously elected dean of the college.

Every pier in New York Harbor has been made a barred zone into which no enemy aliens will be permitted to enter under any circumstances.

An automobile in which two Bridgeport, Conn., priests were joy riding May 23, was overturned, and the Rev. Father V. Murphy was killed and the Rev. Father Pankowski mortally injured.

Arthur Warren Waite died at Sing Sing May 24 for the murder of his father-in-law, John E. Peck. He entered the death house at 11 o'clock. Two shocks were necessary to kill him.

Six hundred young Jews have been admitted as students in the Military Medical Academy in Petrograd, which up to the revolution barred all Jews from studying there.

The hundred-million-dollar principal of the Rockefeller Foundation has been swelled to more than $125,000,000 by a new gift from John D. Rockefeller.

Protest to Germany against the detention of American citizens was made by the State Department May 22 through the Spanish government.

Rear Admiral William S. Sims, who is in command of the American naval forces in European waters, has been appointed Vice-Admiral by the President.

Confirmation of the report that President Carranza had filed a protest with the German government against unrestricted submarine warfare came May 24 from the Mexican News Bureau.

Guglielmo Marconi, the inventor of the wireless, who is with the Italian Mission which arrived May 23, has brought to this country several devices intended to combat the submarine.

William Conant Church, editor of The Army and Navy Journal, and brevet lieutenant colonel of volunteers during the Civil War, died May 23 at his home in New York. He was eighty-one years old.

Damage amounting to between $2,000,000 and $3,000,000 was done May 21, and probably 20,000 people were rendered homeless by a fire which swept the northern residence section of Atlanta, Ga. on that day.

Sarah Bernhardt left Mount Sinai Hospital, New York, May 27, for a hotel at Briarcliff, in Westchester county, there to complete her amazing recovery from an illness of many weeks.

The government refuses passports to Socialist delegates to the Stockholm conference, and intimates that any American taking part in proceedings calculated to induce Russia to make a separate peace will be liable to heavy punishment.

Two warrants, each for $75,000,000, were delivered May 25 by the Treasury Department to the representatives respectively of Great Britain and Italy as parts of the loans heretofore arranged to be made to those countries.

Dr. Henry van Dyke, former American Minister to the Netherlands, who has been at the battle front in France, returned May 25 by a liner that had twice eluded by narrow margin torpedoes hurled by German submarines.

The Germans have resumed the deportation of Belgians, according to information received by the Belgian government. Three thousand persons are reported to have been deported from the suburbs of Brussels since the beginning of May.

Two American Red Cross nurses were killed May 20 by a practice shot from a six-inch naval gun on the stern of the American steamship Mongolia, taking them to active service in France. A third nurse was seriously wounded.

Italy paid honor to America and her first President May 27 through the Italian War Mission, which made a pilgrimage down the Potomac to Mount Vernon and laid on the tomb of George Washington a bronze wreath.

A national movement in America to aid the radicals in Germany in overthrowing the autocratic, militaristic regime of the kaiser and establishing a democracy has been launched by Socialist leaders in New York.

Twenty thousand Jews have been released by the order of the Provisional Government from Siberia. All these Jews were exiled for alleged "political untrustworthiness." Most of the exiles were torn away from their homes on the slightest of pretexts.

Before almost three thousand persons Eli Persons, negro murderer of Antoinette Rappal, was burned at the stake near the scene of the crime, a short distance from Memphis, Tenn., at 9 o'clock May 22, after being tortured. The body was mutilated. And all this in a Christian country!

About fifty persons were killed and more than 300 were injured when a tornado struck Mattoon, Ill., May 26. The entire business section has been wiped out, as well as almost the entire northern half of the town, no building being left standing in a path several blocks wide.

More than 100 Germans in the line that waited May 23 in the Federal Building, New York, for the permits without which they scarcely can venture from their homes after June 1 said that their employers had discharged them rather than indorse their applications for permits.

General Pershing will precede the American expeditionary force to France, in order to acquaint himself with the field conditions under which his forces must operate, and to further learn the part his army will play in action against the German lines.

The loss in this country on account of fire has increased in the past year from $170,033,200 to $214,530,995. The underwriters' statistical experts report this means the fires in this country have cost each person in the last year $2.10, which is 29 cents more than the year previous. Most of the fires are preventable, being due to carelessness.

Kissing games played at church socials and in the homes of members of the Calverton Methodist church at Calverton, near Riverhead, L. I., figure largely in an action for separation and support begun by Mrs. Ellen Schweimler against William Schweimler, until recently pastor of the church. Justice J. Addison Young reserved decision in the action May 25.

The British War Mission left American soil and crossed into Canada May 25, after six weeks of conferences which have reached into every phase of American life and are expected vitally to affect the future of this country, if not of the world.

Premier Bratiano of Russia has announced to the Chamber of Deputies that the government requests Parliament to insert in the Rumanian constitution the principles of universal suffrage and expropriation in favor of the peasants.

The charge against the 88 corporations and individuals indicted by the Federal Grand Jury at Boston, May 24, is that the defendants have maintained a national association of onion dealers who buy up the onions during the summer and early fall, store them in warehouses owned or controlled by the various members, and put them upon the market from September to April. Last year's onions were bought at 2 cents a pound by the conspirators and sold at 15 cents.

On the ground that proof of the "bad faith and evil intent" of the defendants had not been shown, Supreme Court Justice Kelly in Brooklyn directed the jury trying the case to acquit Charles Commissioner John A. Kingsbury and William H. Hotchkiss, who were charged with having unlawfully tapped a private telephone wire during the strong investigation of the Charities Board in 1916. District Attorney Lewis announced he would ask for the dismissal of indictments found against Kingsbury and Hotchkiss charging them with having eavesdropped on the wires of the Rev. Father Farrell and of the late Rev. Daniel C. Potter.

THE WAR.

The British transport Transylvania was torpedoed on May 4 in the Mediterranean, with the loss of 413 persons.

A Swedish ship engaged in the work of the Belgian Relief Commission was sunk May 18, despite the fact that it held a German permit to sail.

Japan's Admiralty announces that Japanese squadrons are operating in the South Pacific Ocean and in the Mediterranean Sea against enemy submarines.

The steamship Feltria, of the Harland line, was sunk by a submarine off Iceland on May 5 and fifty-three of her crew, including two American negro firemen, are missing.

A Copenhagen dispatch to the Exchange Telegraph Company says that since the beginning of the war Denmark has lost 150 ships through submarines or mines.

Reviving activity at several points on the Russian front is announced by army headquarters May 24, the Riga district, near the Baltic coast, being particularly mentioned.

The first sanitary squadron of the American expeditionary corps received a warm welcome on its arrival at Paris May 26, from London on its way to the front.

Seventy-six persons were killed and 174 injured May 26 by a German airplane raid which spent most of its force upon an unnamed town in the southeast of England.

Forty-eight passengers and eighty-five members of the crew of the Spanish steamer C. de Eizaguirre are believed to have perished as a result of the sinking of the steamer.

Italian troops engaged in the offensive movement south of Gorizia have captured the fortified heights north of Jamiano. The Italian positions have been extended still further.

With the capture May 25 of another strongly fortified position on the Southern Carso, the Italians under General Codorna took 3,500 additional prisoners, making a total of 22,419 captured since the offensive began.

The Italians May 23 broke through nearly ten miles of Austrian fortification on the Carso Plateau, from near Castagnavizza to the sea, captured several towns and hill strongholds, and swept in over 9,000 Austro-Hungarian prisoners, winning one of the clearest cut victories of the war.

While the British guns continued their pounding of the 2,000-yard stretch of the Hindenburg line west of Bullecourt which remains in German hands, the French, May 22, hurled back three counter attacks by the Crown Prince on the Champagne heights and captured one thousand additional prisoners.

Lectures and Meetings

The Sunrise Club.—The Sixteenth and Last Dinner of the season takes place Monday evening, June 4, at The Cafe Boulevard, 41st Street and Broadway (entrance on 41st Street), at 6.45 o'clock. Subject: "Our deadly Cancer of Race Caste—The Negro and American Democracy." The opening speaker is Edwin C. Walker. Mrs. Lottie Lytle Cowan will preside. The discussion following the address will be introduced by the Hon. Joseph C. Manning, of Alabama, and closed by James F. Morton, Jr. Dinner, $1.25, including tips. If you will attend, notify Edwin C. Walker, 211 W. 138th Street. Telephone, Audubon 4295.

The New York Secular Society. Mr. Irving Meirovits of this society will speak at Thirty-seventh Street and Broadway every Wednesday and Saturday night.

The Boston Freethought Society meets in Paine Memorial Hall, Appleton street, every Sunday at 3 P. M. J. P. Bland, B.D., is resident speaker, and THE TRUTH SEEKER is for sale at the door.

The Rationalist Society of Toledo, Ohio, meets in the Arcade Bldg., Room 133, St. Clair and Jackson sts., Wednesday evenings at 8.

The Chicago Freethought Society meets in Corinthian Hall, Masonic Temple, Sunday mornings, at 11 o'clock; H. Percy Ward, lecturer.

The Freethought Congregation of Cedar Rapids, Iowa, meets every second Sunday of the month at the C. S. P. S. Hall, corner Eleventh Avenue and Third Street; Jos. J. Hajek, Speaker.

The Columbus Rationalist Association meets the second and fourth Tuesday evening of each month, 7.30 P. M., at the Hotel Vendome, Third street, opposite State House. O. C. Weatherby, president; Olin J. Ross, 23 East State street, Columbus, O., secretary.

The Friendship Liberal League, (Inc.) of Philadelphia, meets every Sunday at 2.30 and 7.30, at 1417 Columbia avenue. O. J. Latford, The Truth Seeker and liberal literature on sale. F. Garfield Bowers, secretary, 245 N. Ninth street.

The Milwaukee Rationalist Society meets every Friday evening in Convention Hall, Republican House. Joel Rubin, Pres., 9, 10 Cawker Bldg.

The Denver Rationalist Association meets the first and third Thursday of each month at 319 Kittredge Building; Olive Oliver, president.

The Meetings of the Independent Lectureship of San Francisco, Walter Holloway, Rationalist and Lecturer, are held every Sunday night at 8 o'clock, at Golden Gate Commandery, 2135 Sutter Street, San Francisco, Cal.

The Church of This World, Rationalist. John Emerson Roberts, lecturer. Meetings every Sunday morning at 11 o'clock in Willis Wood Theatre, Kansas City, Mo. Mr. Roberts' services may be secured for wedding and funeral occasions. Address, 4011 Kenwood ave., Kansas City, Mo.

The Toledo Rationalist Society meets every Wednesday evening at 8, Room 133, Arcade Building, St. Clair and Jackson streets. W. M. Braun, secretary. Speakers, Dr. Rullison, J. Carl, J. Braun and K. Pauli.

Tacoma Rationalist Society. meets every Sunday at 3 p. m. in Macabees Hall, 1109 Broadway, Tacoma, Wash. S. T. Hammersmark, Secy., Colonial Hotel.

The Ferrer Association holds public meetings at the Ferrer Centre, 63 East 107th street, New York, every Saturday and Sunday evening. May 28.—"Shelley." By Jacob Robbins.

The Detroit Society of Truth Seekers (Lithuanian) meets the second Sunday of every month at 2 P. M. in C. O. F. Hall, Chene, cor. Trombly st.; Karl Rutkus, organizer, 338 West End ave., Detroit, Mich.

The Clarksburg (W. Va.) Rationalist Society holds its meetings every Sunday in the Court House at 2 P. M. A lecture course is now being prepared. Address G. A. Miller, Secy.-Treas., 644 S. 7th street, Clarksburg.

INFIDEL DEATHBEDS

BY G. W. FOOTE.

An account of the passing away of the noted Freethinkers of the world, to which are prefixed brief accounts of their lives and of the work they did for mental liberty. "Infidel death-beds" have ever been a fertile theme of pulpit eloquence, and the clergy have drawn harrowing pictures of fear and terror and recantations and repudiation of sentiments held when living by the great Infidels of the world. This book shows that such sermons are "just preaching," and totally false as to statements. Every Liberal should have it for reference. The author founded the London Freethinker, and was one of the ablest writers in England. Price 25 cents.

Immortal Verses

Address THE TRUTH SEEKER
62 Vesey Street, New York

WHAT IS RELIGION?

And Other Essays

By ROBERT G. INGERSOLL

The essay, "What Is Religion?" which gives a title to the collection, was Ingersoll's last published address. The others are:

Declaration of the Free (A Poem)
The Bible Not a Moral Guide
A Vision of War.
Declaration of Independence
Faith that Surely Wanes.
A Look Backward and a Prophesy
The Oath Question.
God in the Constitution.

In pamphlet form, 25c.

Address

The Truth Seeker
62 Vesey Street - New York

MARTYRDOM OF MAN. By Winwood Reade. Cloth, with portrait and biographical sketch, $1.00.

A synopsis of universal history, showing what the race has undergone in its rise to its present plane. It shows how War and Religion have been oppressive factors in man's struggle for Liberty; and the last chapter, of some 150 pages describes his intellectual struggle from the animal period of the earth to the present. Winwood Reade's reputation as a writer of fine English for deep study and careful reasoning, needs no word of praise.

THE TRUTH SEEKER

A Freethought and Agnostic Newspaper.

Vol. 44.—No. 23.

PUBLISHED
WEEKLY

New York, June 9, 1917.

62 VESEY
STREET

$3.00 Per Year

PAINE AND HIS WARDS.

The Bonneville and Their Distinguished Son to Whom He Opened a Career in America.

BY HISTORICUS.

June 8 is the one hundred and eighth anniversary of the death of Thomas Paine—a good occasion for recalling incidents of his life and an instance of his benevolence and influence not widely mentioned and traced. This article has to do with his friends in France and wards in America, the Bonneville. The writer, who is a resident of that section of Pennsylvania made historic by the Revolution and as the scene of Paine's literary labors, has been a reader of THE TRUTH SEEKER and a contributor to its columns and its cause for at least forty years. He is a local historian of repute about York and Lancaster, and an industrious Paine collector.

A SKETCH of the noted officer, Gen. Benjamin L. F. Bonneville, of the United States army, must naturally be preceded by some notice of his ancestry which was probably French Huguenot.

A biography of the general's father, Nicholas Bonneville, was published in Michaud's French Biographical Dictionary (to which, however, we have not had access). This was annotated by his widow Margaret Brazier Bonneville.

It would seem that in 1797, in Paris, Thomas Paine met Bonneville at the house of an official, and an acquaintance speedily took place between the two men, since Bonneville could speak English, while Paine never mastered the French language very well.

At first Paine was received as a guest, but the visit lasted for a period of five years, until 1802, when he took his departure for America.

Bonneville's first floor in his house was occupied as a printing office. The house was all occupied, but Bonneville gave up his study and a bed-chamber of Paine, who here occupied himself with reading and writing and perfecting the model of his iron bridge, in which he took an enthusiastic interest. He also received many visitors of note, and he brought forward a machine for planing boards.

He was consulted by Bonaparte in regard to mechanical measures in the proposed descent upon England.

He lived in the house of the Bonneville's five years and frequently pressed them to go with him to America, stating that he would do all he could for them and that he would bequeath his property to their children.

He had frequently intended to go to America, but the British cruisers were constantly on the lookout for him since the government had an old grudge to settle with him. But the time now was opportune, and moreover, republican principles were now at a low ebb in France.

He left Havre in 1802 and landed in Baltimore late in the Fall of the same year.

The Bonneville family did not accompany him, but Mrs. Bonneville, with her three children, Benjamin, Thomas and Lewis, came over the following year (in 1803). Mr. Bonneville, owing to pressing business, did not come with them.

The boy Lewis after a time returned to the father. He probably died in the interim as we hear nothing further concerning him.

In 1807, five years after leaving France, Paine wrote to Bonneville urging him to come to America saying his family had learned to speak English very well and that Thomas had forgotten his French. He repeated that he intended to provide for the boys but wished to have the father come over. He said that Mrs. Bonneville and an English woman were keeping an academy for young ladies.

It would seem that a surveillance had been placed upon Bonneville which Paine through influential friends in Paris sought to release. In this letter he also proposed, after Bonneville's coming over, to publish all his works which he thought would make about five volumes, octavo, of 400 pages each. But Bonneville did not come during Paine's lifetime.

After the fall of Napoleon in 1815, Bonneville was relieved of surveillance, when he came to New York and was united with his family after a period of twelve years. Washington Irving, who became the chronicler of the son's adventures in the far west from 1831-36, thus speaks of the father: "He was a worthy old emigrant who came to this country many years since and took up his abode in New York. He is represented as a man not much calculated for the sordid struggle of a money making world, but was possessed of a happy temperament, a festivity of heart that made him proof against its rubs and trials. He was an excellent scholar, well acquainted with Latin and Greek, and fond of the modern classics. His books were his elysium; once immersed in the pages of Voltaire, Corneille or Racine, or of his favorite English author Shakespeare, he forgot the world and all about him. Often would he be seen under one of the trees on the Battery or the portico of St. Paul's church in Broadway, his bald head uncovered, his hat lying by his side, his eyes riveted on to the page of his book, and his whole soul so engaged as to lose all consciousness of the passing throng or the passing hour. His wife was born in 1767 and was 36 years of age when she came to America. Some thought her prepossessing while others expressed a contrary opinion."

"HISTORICUS."

Nicholas Bonneville and Paine were both republicans and deists. Probably Mrs. Bonneville entertained similar opinions. After Paine's death her expressions were tinged with prudence. Perhaps her function as a teacher, to whose care young ladies belonging to the higher classes were instructed, conduced to this tendency. Later in life she became a devout Catholic, and in the same faith the future general also took refuge. The parents returned to France several years later.

William Cobbett, who had been a bitter enemy of Paine's after the latter published "The Decline and Fall of the English System of Finance," later became his ardent admirer. It was predicted in this work that there would be a suspension of gold payments by the Bank of England, which followed the next year (in 1797).

Cobbett in 1818 took up Paine's remains and proposed giving them a public funeral in England since he claimed America had been derelict in its duty towards Paine. He also purposed to write a life of Paine in 1819, and had Mrs. Bonneville furnish material for it, for which he proposed to give her one thousand dollars. Paine had left two volumes of autobiography from which she drew material and with which she was to furnish letters by Paine and from his contemporaries. Cobbett was to obligate himself to publish the biography in Great Britain only, without any other additions in the same connection.

Probably Cobbett paid the money; at least he got the excerpts, but owing to lack of enthusiasm by the British people in relation to the public funeral, neither intention was carried out. Cobbett died in 1835, and Paine's remains passed from hand to hand, and eventually all trace of them was lost, yet it may not be impossible that eventually, like those of Paul Jones, they may be recovered or traced in the future. Just what the Bonneville's attitude was in this connection we have not learned, as they were still in this country and later arrangements were entered into concerning the biography. Bonneville died in Paris in 1828. In 1833 his widow returned to America and made her home with her son, the future general, and died in his home at St. Louis in 1846, aged 79 years.

Benjamin Bonneville, the son and future general, was born in 1795 and graduated at West Point in 1815 when twenty years of age. To whom he owed his appointment does not now appear. Mrs. Bonneville generally remained at Bordentown and New York during Paine's life. The sons, as a rule, remained with Paine and were placed at various schools by him.

A farrier by the name of Carver, who came from Paine's native place in England, thrust himself upon Paine's attention and wrote some angry letters, the contents of which he afterward disclaimed as true, but which Cheetham obtained. These would seem to have been the basis for the stories that did duty so long in his biography of Paine, published the year of Paine's death. Mrs. Bonneville sued the author for slander and obtained a verdict for damages.

Reports of Mrs. Bonneville's antipathy against Paine would seem to have been without foundation. In fact, Paine during his last hours expressed his satisfaction with the treatment he received at her hands. Moreover, in the Cheetham trial for slander, matrons of the highest respectability bore testimony to Mrs. Bonneville's good reputation and character. Carver lived till after 1840 and notices concerning him are found in Vale's Beacon of that period. While he repented and retracted the injustice he had done Paine, yet his last years were embittered by neglect and poverty. Truly the way of the transgressor is hard.

Paine died in New York, but was buried on his farm at New Rochelle, twenty-two miles away, where the funeral was held. Mrs. Bonneville, in her biographical sketch of Paine, relates that the interment was a scene to affect and to wound any sensible heart. Contemplating who it was, what man it was that they were committing to an obscure grave on an open and disregarded bit of ground, she could not help feeling most acutely. She wrote: "Before the earth was thrown upon the coffin, I, placing myself at the east end of the grave, said to my son Benjamin, 'Stand you there at the other end as a witness for grateful America.' Looking around me and beholding the small group of spectators I exclaimed as the earth was tumbled in the grave, 'O Mr. Paine! My son stands here as testimony of the gratitude of America and I for France.'" This was the funeral ceremony of this great politician and philosopher. It is said there were but seven persons present, about the same number as were present at the funeral of Edgar A. Poe. But both have survived and their memory is growing.

It would seem that the son Benjamin alone of the two boys was present at the funeral. Paine left the bulk of his estate to the Bonneville family. Mrs. Bonneville, in her sketch, expressed great thankfulness towards Paine when at his death she said: "It was impossible for me not to exert myself to the utmost in taking care of a person to whom I and my children owed so much." Paine left some small bequests to personal friends and larger ones to his biographer, Clio Rickman, and to Nicholas Bonneville. To Mrs. Bonneville he left about $1,500 of insurance stock, with his movable and personal effects, which included his unpublished writings.

The farm, which embraced nearly 300 acres, he disposed of as follows: The north side was to be sold and the proceeds to be applied as later directed; the south part of the farm, containing upwards of one hundred acres, in trust, to rent out the same or otherwise put to profit as should be found most advisable and to pay the rents and profits thereof to the said Margaret Bonneville in trust for her children, Benjamin Bonneville and Thomas Bonneville, for their education and maintenance until they came to the age of twenty-one years; the rent or interest of the money for which it may be sold to be employed in their education. After they became of age the property was to be conveyed to them share and share alike.

This was to be the practical result or outcome of this legacy. It shows that Paine was not in poverty although his means were in a manner tied up.

He had sold from his farm of 300 acres about 60 acres for over $4,000, showing that his land was worth over $60 an acre. At a small estimate his estate at one time would be presumed to be worth from fifteen to twenty thousand dollars. Could his unpublished writings have been placed in safe keeping, till an opportune time offered for publication, they would one hundred years after his death have been priceless. The Paine farm fell into other hands eventually.

Gilbert Vale was instrumental in erecting, about 1840, a monument over the empty tomb of Paine. He later bought the farm, or a part of it, for about $4,500, and succeeded in raising some $1,500, leaving the remainder to be secured by a mortgage, which, owing to inability to satisfy, was foreclosed.

The Bonneville family, after the arrival of Nicholas, boarded for a time in the Paine house. What became of the son Thomas we have been unable to learn. That he made any particular mark in the world does not appear. Mrs. Bonneville outlived her husband 18 years. What led her to find refuge in the Catholic church we have no means of knowing. Possibly her trials in France, with her expatriation and troubles through the slander of Carver and Cheatham, may have caused her to form new associations that cut her adrift from her former suffering. But this new connection also presumably induced her to erase some passages earlier in Paine's writings, as she disposed of them for publication. The remainder, it would seem, were with the library and effects which the general's widow says were destroyed by fire in St. Louis about 1846. If they had not perished thus it is not probable they would ever have seen the light of day.

Such is an account of the Bonneville family. It is to be regretted that so few portraits exist of the family, some of the general and possibly of Mrs. Bonneville. Daguerre brought forward the process of taking pictures in 1839, which was not popularized until 1850. In this day of illustrated newspapers hardly any individual can avoid the camera. There are persons still, however, who have scruples of conscience against having their pictures taken voluntarily or even having looking-glasses in their houses or pictures upon their walls.

It remains for us to touch upon the career of Benjamin Bonneville, the last of the family, so far as we know, to survive.

After graduating at West Point in 1815 he became lieutenant of artillery and in 1820 was engaged in the construction of a military road in Mississippi.

He became a captain of infantry in 1825, and in 1831-6 engaged in exploration in the Rocky Mountains and in California. His journal, edited and amplified by Washington Irving, was published under the title of "Adventures of Captain Bonneville, U. S. A. in the Rock Mountains and the Far West." He was promoted to major in July, 1845, and fought through the Mexican War, taking part in the march through Chihuahua, in the siege of Vera Cruz, the battle of Cerro Gordo, the capture of San Antonio, the battle of Churubusco, where he was wounded, the battle of Molino del Rey, the storming of Chapultepec and the assault and capture of the City of Mexico. For gallantry at Contreras and Churubusco he was brevetted lieutenant-colonel. He was promoted to the full rank of lieutenant-colonel in May of 1849, and to the grade of colonel, 1855. He was commandant at Santa Fe in 1856-7, and commanded the Gila expedition in 1856; resumed the command of the department of New Mexico in 1858 and was retired, Sept. 9, 1861, from active service for disability. During the Civil War he served as superintendent of recruiting in Missouri, and from 1862 to 1865 was commandant of Benton barracks in St. Louis. On March 13, 1865, he was brevetted brigadier-general for long and faithful service.

At the time of his death, which occurred at Fort Smith, Arkansas, in 1878, he was the oldest officer on the retired list, reaching 83 years. Such is an outline of an exemplary record of active service in a career that is open to close inspection. In his exploration of the Great West, which was by permission of the War Department, he had enlisted a party of one hundred and ten men, most of whom were experienced hunters and trappers. He was given permission to be absent until October, 1833. Captain Bonneville was at this time connected with what has since become the noted seventh regiment of infantry. Year after year elapsed without his return. The term of his leave of absence had expired, yet no report of him was made at headquarters at Washington. He was considered virtually dead or lost, and his name was stricken from the army list. When he returned in six years, instead of three years, he hastened to the War Department to have his affairs straightened out, which he accomplished in due time. He returned with a mass of written material and specimens of exploration which were indeed curious.

Washington Irving, who later put his journal into shape with additions and emendations, met Captain Bonneville at the table of John Jacob Astor, the patriarch of the fur trade in the United States. He took a great fancy to Bonneville especially in the light of his adventures.

It would seem that the captain's wanderings in the wilderness, though they had gratified his curiosity and his love of adventure had not particularly benefited his fortunes. In fact, Irving thought he had too much of the frank free-hearted soldier and had inherited too much of his father's temperament to make a thrifty trapper or a scheming bargainer.

There was something in the whole appearance of the captain that prepossessed Irving in his favor. He was of middle size, well made and well set, and a military frock of foreign cut that had seen hard service gave him a look of compactness. His countenance was frank, open and engaging; well browned by the sun and had something of a French expression. He had a pleasant black eye and a high forehead; and while he kept his hat on his head he had the look of a man in the jocund prime of his days; but the moment his head was uncovered a bald crown gained him credit for a few more years than he was entitled to, although he was but about forty years of age.

Irving was much impressed by Bonneville and his mass of material from the fact that Irving had made "A Tour on the Prairies" in front of the Rockies, which served to whet his appetite for a still more extended description of travel in this region. Lewis and Clark had made their memorable overland trip in 1805. It was the trapper, the scout and the hunter, James Bridger, who first saw Salt Lake about 1825, antedating later discoveries. Bonneville more fully explored it during his famous journeys in 1831-7. It was Captain Stansberry who surveyed the territory in 1850. Thus there has been a series of observations, bearing upon this far-off region, extending over the greater part of the nineteenth century.

The ordinary mode of transportation in these great inland expeditions of the fur traders had been on mules and pack-horses, but Captain Bonneville made a new departure by substituting wagons. He was to travel through a trackless desert, yet the greater part of his route would be across plains destitute of forests and where wheel carriages could pass in any direction. The chief difficulty occurred in passing deep ravines cut through the prairies by streams and winter torrents. Here it was often necessary to dig a road down the banks and to make bridges for the wagons.

It may be surmised that these accounts must have been very interesting to Irving in the light of his own experiences on the prairies in 1832 as recounted in his "Tour." When John Jacob Astor desired him to put facts in relation to his enterprise at Astoria into shape he was nothing loth and from the journal, records and letters of Mr. Astor's managers and those in his employ he wrote "Astoria," a sketch in two volumes, in 1836.

That completed the experiences of Bonneville and he published the material from the explorer and also bought it from him. These books netted him a considerable sum and probably returned very little to Bonneville. These sketches with the reports of Stansberry in 1850, preceded by those of Fremont in the '40's, served to awaken an interest in the country. "The Santa Fe Trail," "The Trail of the Great Salt Lake," by Inman, and the "Oregon Trail" by Parkman, all had their part in preparing the way for the immigration to the Pacific coast. They also prepared the way for the California and Mormon hegiras and later the transcontinental lines of railway, no less than seven lines being now in operation. There have been momentous developments during the past generation.

The colossal undertaking by Hubert Howe Bancroft which he has recorded in no less than forty volumes of massive size containing facts relating to the Pacific and Mountain States is a complete summing up of what was once a terra incognita.

How much America has been indebted to Paine and his influence directly and indirectly to which our narrative is incidental may be imagined if it is not yet accepted. His work and part in making the United States of America, while not generally known nor acknowledged, is a fact nevertheless which will eventually be recognized. His provision for the Bonneville family made the career of General Bonneville a possibility. If the latter did not attain or reach the highest possibility it must be remembered that the laws of heredity are powerful and may stand in the way of such an idea. The career of General Bonneville was highly meritorious and respectable.

We have touched upon and indicated the early influence which underlaid such a career. Its outcome at that early period could hardly have been foreseen nor expected. Still we must remember the helping hand that made it a possibility such as it was. That it should have been bound up and nurtured by the author-hero of the American and French Revolutions, however, is a fact, little known as it is, by the general public. One more laurel is added to Paine's career, for his aid and assistance and rare benevolence when so much needed. That it should have borne fruit as a natural result is gratifying to all friends of liberty and justice.

A Vision.

"The tongue is held in honor by such men
As reckon words of more account than deeds."

—Sophocles.

Last night I had a vision—I saw a loathsome hovel,
Where sottish men and death's head girls in degradation
grovel;
And I saw one come among them, with bread and hope and cheer,
Who comforted their misery and bade them cast out fear,
And shared with them his meager store of simple charity—
But it wasn't Billy Sunday that my vision showed to me.
The vision changed.—The skies were red. I saw a field of blood,
And the ghastly eyes of dying soldiers staring up to God;
And among these knelt a comforter, with a cross upon his breast,
Breathing words of hope and solace and a promise of sweet rest.
As he laid his hands upon them, in their hour of misery—
But it wasn't Billy Sunday that my vision showed to me.
The vision changed.—The years rolled back. I saw an honest man,
Imprisoned in a dungeon for studying God's plan;
I saw him taken from his cell and laid upon a rack, While brutal men, with savage hate, laid whips upon his back;
And, as years passed on, this martyred man was raised to sanctity—
But it wasn't Billy Sunday that my vision showed to me.
The vision changed.—A host of men and women drifted by,
Each bearing to the brother man some need of charity:
A widow's mite, a crust of food, a helping hand in need,
A gentle word of comfort, a kind uplifting deed,
Words of love to make men holy, sacrifice to make men free—
But it wasn't Billy Sunday that my vision showed to me.
The vision changed.—I saw a man that hung upon a cross,
Who gave his life to other men, not counting gain or loss,
Who preached a perfect charity that casteth out all hate,
And held God's promise out to him that cometh, soon or late;
And a thousand martyrs followed him, with brave humility—
But there was no "Billy Sunday" in the vision shown to me.

FREDERIC W. PANGBORN.

CHRISTIANITY AND WAR.

Bishop Brown of Ohio, Not Agreeing with the Churches, Submits His Views.

I hope THE TRUTH SEEKER will be interested in the enclosed article of mine entitled "Christianity and War." It is calculated to bring home to us as Christians a sense of our heavy responsibility for the many wars which have occurred since the triumph of our interpretation of religion and for the evils by which they have afflicted the world.

In the United States the rights of reason and appeal are happily among the recognized inalienabilities, and at such crucial times as the one through which our country is now passing, every citizen not only feels free to make up his mind as to the course which he would pursue if he were in its President's place, but considers it to be his duty to do so and to give expression to his conviction.

For myself I have done this with the result of reaching the conclusion that if I were in President Wilson's position and saw things as I now see them, I would use my influence and authority in securing adequate protection against invasion; but, rather than run the risk of losing and maiming many of our young men and of bringing the wholesale sorrow to its people, especially to the mothers and the poor, which will be the inevitable consequences of sending our navy and army abroad, I would do what I could to suspend commerce over the closed seas until they are opened by the termination of the war or by concessions to us on the part of the belligerent nations which are interfering with it, England as well as Germany.

It is not necessary to the honor of the people of the United States that they should involve themselves in a foreign warfare with Germany, but their happiness and welfare do require that they should not bring upon themselves the sorrow and suffering that would be connected with it.

Belligerents contend that our safety requires war with Germany because we have engendered its enmity. If therefore we do not secure the good will of England the Germans will bombard our coast towns as soon as their comparatively powerful navy is free. No doubt this is a possibility, perhaps even probability. Nevertheless it is, as pacifists insist, but a future contingency against the materialization of which we can meantime provide by conciliatory and preparatory measures.

Let this, then, be our motto: Every sacrifice of life and treasure necessary to defense; but none of either for aggression. All for prevention. Nothing for retaliation.

Unless I am mistaken, the majority of our citizens would be glad to have the government pursue such a course, and this being the case, if they could be united in an overwhelming petition their influence might bring about this modification of plans.

It is claimed that our declaration of war against Germany is in the interest of "the rights of mankind," particularly the right of the United States and generally that of other nations to open seas for free and equal navigation, but this is the very claim by which the Germans chiefly justify their tremendous warfare against the English. There is nothing to fear from any dominancy. That of England is doomed and it will not be succeeded by a German one.

Should we send our navy and army across the Atlantic with a view of punishing Germany because of its wrong-doings to us, we would not reach those who are responsible for them, but kill and maim the husbands, sons, brothers and friends of innocent peoples; and, besides we would sacrifice many of the husbands, sons, brothers and friends of our own people.

Belligerents who are orthodox Christians in their contentions with pacifists justify war on such grounds as these:

1. War increases religion. But the supernaturalistic conception of religion, of none more than that of traditional Christianity, involves belief in a conscious, personal, anthropomorphic God who governs the universe and bears a special relationship to man, analogous to that of a father to a son. How is it possible that war should prove to be advantageous to such a belief?

2. War jeopardizes the lives of the combatants. However life on earth would in any case be short and full of woe and its ending is the beginning of life in heaven which is eternal and full of joy. But according to the standard conception of Christianity there are besides this earth two spheres of existence, one on its roof, heaven, for those only who believe and accept the gospel terms of salvation, which terms include love to enemies, liberality to those who have robbed us, and the turning of the other cheek to the smiters of one. How can soldiers fulfill these conditions, yet for all who do not, there is another sphere in the cellar of the earth, hell, in which life is equally everlasting but utterly miserable!

A desire and effort to render service to humanity is the most essential characteristic of all virtues, of affection in homes, of patriotism in states and of morality in churches. The desire and effort to serve is the love that fulfills every social, political and religious ideal. This love never makes for aggressive warfare. How could it? On both sides such wars unnecessarily make corpses, cripples and invalids of the men, widows of the women, orphans of the children, sufferers of the poor, and mourners of all. Without the love to keep him from this warfare a man is lower than many beasts. With it he is higher than most gods. Jesus is a higher god (symbol of the ideal man) than Jehovah or Allah, because in his name men go forth, as under an ensign, to found state and church by the helping and winning power of love, not by the destroying and compelling power of the sword.

Galion, Ohio.

WILLIAM M. BROWN.

THE CHURCH'S WAR RECORD.

By BISHOP WILLIAM MONTGOMERY BROWN, D. D.

As a religious movement Christianity started out with the view of promoting peace and good will among men, but ever since its triumph over rival interpretations of religion it has been staggering under an accumulating burden of responsibility on account of war.

The pretensions of Christians to a religion which promotes forbearance and peace must be so many bywords to Jews, Mohammedans and Buddhists, for they cannot help seeing that no other religionists have destroyed themselves and ruined their progeny by a murderous and calamitous warfare on any such scale as the one which Christian Europe inaugurated nearly three years ago on the slightest and most sordid of pretenses, and which Christian America is in imminent danger of greatly enlarging and prolonging, for reasons which are certainly no more if indeed as justifiable.

From the beginning the attitude of the Christian churches in Europe has been a source of great discouragement to the lovers of our Zion, who have vainly hoped that its influence might yet be used as a power that makes for pacific measures, but the hearts of such must now sink within them because of the action of the great Federation of Christian churches in the metropolitan city of New York of which the press gives an account. It voted overwhelmingly, 158 against 52, in favor of the extensive military preparations which are recommended by the belligerent enthusiasts who are trying to force our country into this war.

It is popularly supposed that Christianity has been the means of rendering war much less frequent and of greatly reducing its evils, but the sad truth is that the world has never seen as many wars or suffered as much by them as ever since the triumph of the Christian church with the accession in the year 325 of Constantine to the throne of the Roman Empire.

Nor was this more true of the age preceding the Protestant reformation than it has been of the period which followed it. Indeed quite the contrary is the case. The wars growing out of it in Germany alone resulted in the reduction of the population of that nation from thirty to twelve million in the course of the seventeenth century.

And Protestantism rather than Catholicism may justly be charged with the responsibility for the existence of large standing armies, which, next to ignorance and superstition, constitute the most insuperable barrier to the progress of civilization. The empire of Rome, extensive and heathen as it was, never had one of more than half a million, but those of the Christian nations within the comparatively small territory of Europe have gradually been growing until even in times of peace they are sustained at the astonishing magnitude of fifteen millions, and the Protestant nations have by far the larger ones.

The chief combatants in the war that is now in progress, the most destructive in the history of the world, are Germany and England, in which Protestantism predominates. Hungary is a stronghold of Catholicism, but the church of Russia is of the Greek-Catholic type, and allied with the Church of England rather than that of Rome.

As for France, its religion, morally the best in Europe, is predominantly of the Rationalistic or scientific character, not Christian in the theoretical sense, but preeminently so in the practical, the only sense which is of any real value or general interest to the world.

In a passage which is sure to become a classical reproach to belligerent Christianity, Mark Twain causes his angel of history and prophecy to give this ironic yet conservative and just expression to a melancholy truth:

"You perceive that you have made continual progress. Cain did his murder with a club; the Hebrews their murders with javelins and swords; the Greeks and Romans added protective armor and the fine arts of military organization and generalship; the Christian has added guns and gunpowder; a few centuries from now he will have so greatly improved the deadly effectiveness of his weapons of slaughter that all men will confess that without the Christian civilization war must have remained a poor and trifling thing to the end of time.

"It is a remarkable progress. In five or six thousand years, five or six high civilizations have arisen, flourished, commanded the wonder of the world, then faded out and disappeared; and not one of them except the latest ever invented any sweeping and adequate way to kill people. They all did their best, to kill being the chief ambition of the human race and the earliest incident of its history, but only the Christian civilization has scored a triumph to be proud of. Two or three centuries from now it will be recognized that all the competent killers are Christians; then the pagan will go to school to the Christian—not to acquire his religion but his guns. The Turk and the Chinaman will buy those to kill missionaries and converts with."

Humane readers who are Protestant church members will blush (none more than Episcopalians, both Methodist and Anglican) when they see the names of their respective churches in the following shameful exhibit. Catholics will be spared, but only because their churches are not represented in the confederation:

	For War	Against
Baptist	16	1
Congregational	10	0
Disciples of Christ	3	0
Seventh Day Adventists	1	1
Protestant Episcopal	27	3
Reformed Episcopal	0	1
Evangelical Association	1	2
Society of Friends	0	2
German Evangelical Synod	0	1
Lutheran	14	7
Methodist Episcopal	23	4
Primitive Methodist	1	0
Moravian	4	1
Presbyterian	27	20
Reformed	19	3
Unitarian	1	0
Universalist	1	2
Union Protestant	10	4

Among the churches with a large membership, the Presbyterian has the least to regret in connection with this showing, but it is a misfortune that it has even seven votes or that any church has one vote on the wrong side.

The Presbyterian church also has the good fortune of having the most influential of all pacifists, Mr. William Jennings Bryan, as a member. But again it is unfortunate that Mr. Bryan did not get his pacifism from inside his or any church. The movement against war, like that against slavery, was started, as all reformatory movements have been outside of the churches, or if inside, by heretics who were forthwith put out.

It is Holy Week. The week in which during many and long ages benighted people sacrificed their Christs to Shylock gods. If Jesus lived and was one of them, unhappily, he was neither the first nor the last, for there were many both before and after him. Were they who superstitiously led these victims to their Golgathas greater sinners against humanity than those who are avariciously driving large armies of young men to the trenches, a wholesale sacrifice to the lords of power and wealth? No. Both are in need of the prayer, forgive them for they know not what they do.

Morality may be defined as the law of mutual respect for the general and private equal rights of man, for the purpose of securing general human happiness. Everything that injures or undermines this happiness and this respect is evil—everything that advances them is good. In accordance with this definition, evil consists only in degeneracy or the encroachment of human and private egotism upon this general happiness and the interests of the fellow man.—Büchner.

Each and every form of polytheism exhibits the slimy track of the deification of the sex. There is not a single one of the ancient religions that has not consecrated by some ceremonial rite even the grossest forms of sensual indulgences, while many of them actually elevated prostitution into a solemn service of religion.—J. Hartmann.

Eternal sleep is better than eternal pain. Eternal punishment is eternal revenge, and can be inflicted only by an eternal monster.—R. G. Ingersoll.

THE TRUTH SEEKER.

FOUNDED BY D. M. BENNETT, 1873
CONTINUED BY E. M. MACDONALD, 1883-1909
G. E. MACDONALD Editor
L. K. WASHBURN Editorial Contributor
Sixty-two Vesey Street, New York, N. Y.
Post Office Box 1610.

SATURDAY - - - JUNE 9, 1917

Let the world think more on its feet and less on its knees.

Good health and good living is all the heaven that most persons want.

The church which holds that the Stars and Stripes, the flag of our nation, is not sacred enough to enter its doors is not fit to live under the flag of the free.

The world at the present time affords great opportunities for divine assistance, but Providence is nowhere about. The German pretends to think that the submarine is doing God's work, while the Englishman sees in this diabolical invention the genius of his Satanic majesty; and in the meantime the rest of human beings look upon the murderous machine as a mid-ocean assassin.

What beautiful things have been said of God! and these beautiful things have been said just as though there was a God who deserved them. But there is no such God, and that is what makes these beautiful sayings repulsive. They are repulsive because they are false. God has never helped a human being on this earth when that human being was in danger. What is God good for if he cannot help men?

It is said that the black-robed "sisters" teach in parochial schools without remuneration. Would these sisters go out to housework, where they would be doing a commendable service, for the same wages? Would they teach in public schools for nothing? "All for the church" is good for the church, but what is good for the church is not always good for the world. These "sisters" should be freed from the power of the priest.

In olden days we read that God defended himself. Why does he not do it today? He cannot need man to defend him. All human defenses around the divine name do not strengthen or help divinity, if there be a divinity. "Whom are you defending?" is my question to Christians! I say to these believers: Your God is dead. Civilization has killed him. Yes, the supernatural lies dead in the dust that follows men's march to freedom.

I would like to look upon just one soul that a priest got out of purgatory by saying masses for its salvation. Instead of having bones and hair and old clothes, let the Romish church advertise that it will exhibit a soul rescued from purgatory by masses. That would be only an honest, fair act towards those who pay for such a job. These persons ought to see that they get something for their money. All they have now is a priest's word, which is cheaper than continental shipplasters.

L. K. W.

Framing Up the Freethinker.

The devices by which our police and magistrates' courts contrive to silence Freethought speakers on the street are exhibited in the transcript of a recent case. The court is described as First Division, Fourth District, which we believe is the Fifty-seventh Street tribunal. The defendant was Irving Meirowitz, and the charge "disorderly conduct," and although disorderly conduct was disproved the defendant was convicted. The personnel of the courtroom was not favorable to a Freethinker, the arresting officer (there present) being Michael J. Jordan, the magistrate Daniel F. Murphy, and the stenographer Thomas Corrigan. That conviction should follow was not unexpected.

The first act of Mr. Murphy was to put the case over until 9 o'clock the next day. The defendant inquired: "On my own recognizance?" and the humorous magistrate said: "Yes, with fifteen hundred dollars in addition." That the prisoner should not be bailed was thus made tolerably certain. He would be penalized even though presumed to be innocent of offense.

Arraignment occurred as set, and Michael J. Jordan, of the police force, swore to a complaint charging Meirowitz with "using threatening, abusive and insulting behavior, with intent to provoke a breach of the peace." The proceedings developed the fact that Meirowitz did nothing of the kind, but it does not appear that the complaint was amended or the officer reprimanded for making it. What the officer said on the stand was that Meirowitz had been talking to a crowd of two thousand persons, extending so far into Madison avenue from Twenty-third street that traffic was blocked. (A chauffeur called later testified that there was room for two automobiles to pass, which is all the regulations require.) Michael the cop then swore that he asked the speaker to cease or move to some other place, and that the speaker inquired, "Suppose I don't?" The arrest followed, and the short dialogue thus taking place between the defendant and the policeman is what the latter described in his complaint as "using threatening, abusive and insulting behavior, with intent to provoke a breach of the peace." Further along in the proceedings the Court instructed a witness that disorder was not charged.

The policeman told the Court that Meirowitz got on his stand "right after another policeman had made an arrest on that square of a speaker who was holding another meeting in violation of the same traffic rule"—which is not according to our recollection of the facts; for as we got the story at the time the other speaker was taken off his stand for reading from his Testament the pacifist sentiments of Jesus Christ, and Meirowitz succeeded him in order to vindicate Christian liberty of expression. That speaker went to the workhouse, not for blocking traffic but for opposing war.

The defendant was allowed to question the policeman Jordan, and asked: "Was there any disorder in the meeting?" and Jordan said, "No, sir." Yet the charge was disorderly conduct! On behalf of "the People" Leo Ring, a chauffeur, was called. Meirowitz asked him how many automobiles there was room for, and he answered, "I should figure two could pass very neatly." And with room for two automobiles to pass the officer held that traffic was "blocked."

One witness appeared for the defendant. He was Mr. Edward J. Meehan, a salesman, who indignantly declared: "Traffic was not being obstructed—positively not." Mr. Meehan corroborated the testimony of the officer that there was no disorder, and it was at this point the Court said: "He is not charged with that." To the witness's asseveration that neither was the street obstructed, the Court replied, "He is charged with not obeying the order of the officer."

The officer had said nothing about an order; but testified that he "asked" the speaker to cease or move to some other place. Meirowitz testified that he took the stand and submitted to arrest to test or "uphold" the right of free speech, which had been violated.

At the conclusion of the testimony, according to the transcript, the Court said to the defendant Meirowitz: "I find you guilty of disorderly conduct." A dozen lines above, on the same page of the transcript, the Court had told the witness Meehan that "he [the defendant] is not charged with that," but "with obstructing traffic." Having been charged with three separate offenses—namely, not obeying an officer, obstructing traffic and disorderly conduct—and it having been shown by witnesses and then virtually admitted by the Court that he was guilty of neither, the defendant must have begun to wonder what he was there for.

The record closes with "Defendant fined ten dollars," but previously he had been "fingerprinted." Also before the proceedings ended an attorney appeared and requested an adjournment, which the Court denied. At the same time the Court took occasion to define the "disorderly act"—the act of Meirowitz in submitting to arrest in order to bring the matter before a magistrate to be adjudicated upon. We quote:

"The Court (to defendant): Of course it is almost impossible to tell gentlemen like you anything, because generally you know it all; you know all about conditions economic and otherwise, and know all about law and order. It is a great pity some of you gentlemen cannot sit in these courts. . . . Keep quiet. That was the disorderly act I found him guilty of. It has nothing to do with free or expensive speech, nothing to do with that at all. The sooner men of this type who are trying to educate the public to their peculiar ideas learn it the better off they will be. This time I am going to impose a fine, with a warning to all such people that if under similar circumstances they commit a similar act it will then not be a fine; it will be imprisonment."

The proceedings here dealt with took place in April. For a month Mr. Meirowitz conducted street meetings without incurring the charge of disorderly conduct, blocking traffic or disobeying a policeman. Then, in an evil moment, as we recorded last week, he read to an outdoor audience an excerpt from a sermon by the Rev. W. A. Sunday, D. D., and being arrested therefor by an officer who thought the language was the speaker's own and threatened the peace of the people and their dignity, was fined five dollars by Magistrate Fuchs. Contemporaneously Mr. Nicholas Mitchuly, another Freethought speaker, was arraigned on the charge of a woman who accused him of "creating prejudice against the Jewish religion."

The prosecutions on these trumped-up, framed-up and frivolous charges make it appear that the police are actuated by something other than zeal for protecting the streets from obstruction or the peace from being broken.

Catholicism and Nature.

Owing to the reported reduction in the ranks of the Roman Catholic clergy in Europe as a consequence of the present war, the question is now being raised as to the advisability of admitting clerical converts to Catholicism from other religious bodies, without requiring them to separate from their wives. The simple thought of a change of this kind in the disciplinary policy of Rome is at least a faint token that necessity may at times accomplish what common sense found no room to achieve.

As one might readily conclude, this alteration in ecclesiastical methods has not been contemplated with any idea of casting disapproval upon priestly celibacy either as regards its peculiar efficiency or its sanctity for the work of religion, for it is still maintained with all the pertinacity of pious conviction that "celibacy is the ideal" for the Christian minister. The church's warrant for this conception of life as stated by its authorities is "Tradition" and "Holy Writ." To include the Bible in this manifest untruth simply enlarges the field of our accusation, and gives entire credibility to the oft-repeated criticism that Christianity is an unnatural religion.

The lesson taught the world by the old Greek and Latin philosophers that to live close to Nature was the secret of a happy and useful life has lost none of its truth and power for the men of our present age. Cicero's fine work, "De Natura" (According to Nature), still maintains its charm and beauty for all those prepared to live a life conceived on the plan unceasingly unfolded by Nature, and not that one artificially contrived within the purloins of monastic seclusion, and amid the unrealities of religion. To live according to Nature is the noblest apprehension of life conceivable; and for a book or a church even to suggest a method that would defeat the great purposes of the Universe on the ground that by sacrificing natural and legitimate desires the man is living an "ideal" existence and gaining favor with God, is to set up in the world a false standard of living, and to encourage gross forms of immorality under the guise of a spiritual idealism.

Catholics are much disposed to insist upon a contrast being drawn between the spirituality of their clergy and the marked worldliness of the clergy of the Protestant denominations. This disposition is so notable among many of them that one might easily conclude that it is the intention of the church to place Roman Catholic priests in the category of the superman, quite apart by themselves, in fact a different order of being from that generally known as the genus homo. If the Roman church ever knew that human nature was much the same everywhere, both within the church and outside of it, she certainly has not acknowledged the fact so far as the emphasis she has laid upon her own devotees, both clerical and lay, is concerned. But like many other papal falsehoods, this estimate of hers regarding her own people and likewise those outside her fold is fundamentally untrue. Her policy is to make people believe that the highest fruits of righteousness as witnessed in noble lives are the result of communion with her and her sacramental system; and that aside from this fellowship the most enthusiastic endeavors on the part of the Christian alien are profitable for nothing better than the attainment of natural religion.

As an outgrowth of this false teaching she has always disparaged the ministrations of Protestant ministers; she speaks of their ecclesiastical functions as "cold and perfunctory"; she pictures them in their comfortable rectories as "armchair Christianity"; and she maintains that "spiritual things" when made the means of providing for a wife and family soon degenerate into a bald materialism, and lose their essential efficacy for good. Now we hold no brief for the clergy of Protestantism nor for any phase of religionism whatever, but if there is any religion in the world that surpasses Roman Catholicism for greed of money, for lavish provision for the maintenance of its army of priests, for distinguished materialism in its forms of worship and popular superstitions, for nice distinctions deftly drawn between what is moral and what is immoral, so that the unlearned feel no compunction of conscience in following the latter, we have no knowledge of that religion.

For the Catholic church to teach that celibacy is the highest and most completely ideal conception of life either for a clergyman or those men known as laymen is to impart a philosophy which is plainly immoral, and to underrate a body of men known as Protestant ministers, who, whatever may be the mistakes honestly attributed to them, must be accounted free from many of those immoral conditions which are the normal consequences of a system of enforced celibacy. There is not a scintilla of evidence that the sexual life of the Roman Catholic priesthood is superior to that of any other body of ecclesiastical officials; and if we are to believe the testimony of history and the frequent experience of men of travel and investigation, we must reach the conclusion that the ordinary decent and upright man whom we meet every day of our lives is, in his generative life, the equal and in most cases the superior of the body of the papal clergy; and for this obvious reason, that the ordinary honest man seeks to live in accordance with Nature, who is the mother of us all, while the celibate priest seeks to defy the law of Nature under the specious cloak of a false supernaturalism.

Every man, even the Catholic priest, knows that this can not be done in justice to himself and to the sublime purposes which Nature had in mind when she constituted man a physical and a thinking being. Man is no more all mind than he is all body; and it is just as wrong to educate the mind to the disparagement of the body as to be guilty of the opposite process. To use the phraseology of religion, to educate the spiritual faculty to the neglect of the physical forces in man is an irrational violation of the law of Nature, which is the law of God. If it be true that the Catholic church believes that Nature is an expression of the mind of God, it would seem to follow conclusively that any misconceived violation of that divine revelation must be looked upon as an effort to coerce the intentions of divinity itself. To appeal to another-world philosophy, in which it is said that in heaven people "neither marry nor are given in marriage," has no pertinency for this world of ours. A sexless human being is conceivable only to the mind of the person vitiated by religion.

It is the wisdom of man if he would reach his best estate to live in accordance with the requirements of nature. It is because many men are not thus living that there is so much vice and crime in the world today. A religion that teaches that celibacy is a superior state to honorable marriage either in its ministers or laymen, is an institution immoral in essence, and consequently injurious to the well-being of society. Any phase of life that savors of the unnatural no matter what form it may take is highly reprehensible. The fact of such things being taught in the New Testament is of no consequence to the moral man, but is very injurious to the value of the revelation that would lead men astray from the fulfillment of their natural and legitimate desires and impulses. The Roman Catholic church may be supernatural, which is but another term for unnatural, but to say that it truly responds to the mental and moral instincts of the normally-constituted man is in direct violation of the law of Nature, and in consequence of truth itself. Christian teaching does violence to the will of Nature; and the chief exponent of this mischievous opposition is that false philosophy of life and death known as Catholicism.

God on a Stick.

I am always curious about so-called divine things. I have always tried to find some evidence of a deity. We hear so much about gods that it seems as though we might run into one somewhere when about our business or our pleasure. But all I have run into so far has been disappointment.

I recollect, a few summers ago, while I was in Brunswick, Maine, of hearing some young girls talking about religious matters. I can recall only two remarks distinctly that were made by the group. One of the very smallest of the girls said that she knew where God was. When asked by another to tell, she said he was in the graveyard, on a big stick. Of course I was interested to know what the little girl had seen that would fill her mind with such a strange theology, so I made a brief visit to the cemetery and lo! there was the child's God on a stick. A huge crucifix was planted in the cemetery, by far the most conspicuous object in the place. It dominated the graves as a high peak overshadows foothills. But what a disgusting god for childhood to believe in! The earth should not be polluted with such a hideous image.

I had never imagined such a horrible piece of wooden sculpture as met my gaze—and I said to myself: If Roman Catholicism can conceive of no more attractive deity than a god on a big stick the wonder is that civilization permits such a religion to exist and teach its monstrous dogmas!

There is perhaps a worse feature to this episode than the making of this clumsy image of man a god. A second little girl said, "Yes, and he is holy too." Now, who taught those children such foolish notions? The priests of Romanism, of course. The cheap idolatry of the Romanist is due to his slavish obedience to his church.

An emancipation proclamation needs to be read in every Roman Catholic church in the world. Give liberty to the benighted subjects of the pope. Free their minds from fear of the priest. And free the small, cringing priest from the big, domineering one.

It is almost impossible for the enlightened mind to realize the thick darkness of Romanism, in which a picture of a crucified man is taught as holy, and more than that, as the God of the universe. Every crucifix on earth ought to be destroyed. This emblem of a foolish superstition ought no longer to be treated as a symbol of religion, but as the trade mark of the most heartless graft the world has ever known. L. K. W.

From Harry Weinberger, Esq., general counsel and executive secretary of the American Legal Defense League, 261 Broadway, New York, comes a cordial invitation to print an advertisement of the League—copy for which is inclosed—as a contribution to the battle in the courts for liberty. The advertisement is rather long; the composition on it would cost us five or ten dollars, and we would rather follow another suggestion of Mr. Weinberger and "give us a reading notice," saving the money for possible expenses in defending our Freethought speakers, in whom the American Legal Defense League has not shown an interest as yet. As Mr. Weinberger will observe by reading THE TRUTH SEEKER, the Freethinkers are having troubles of their own; and while we assume that they are more or less in sympathy with the purposes of the League, which is pacifist, Socialist and anti-conscription, they must be particularly concerned in maintaining their own propaganda. Surely the pacifists, even pro-Germans, have their rights under the constitutional prohibition against abridging the freedom of speech or of the press or of peaceable assembly; and yet in our mind there arise such doubts of the wisdom of appearing to take sides against the government at this time that we can summon up little enthusiasm for the agitation. As the situation appears, the political and other opponents of the administration are taking advantage of these troublous times to embarrass the government as much as they can, and the agents of the government, the foes of free speech and press, the war-at-any-price patriots, and all that class, are using the same occasion to overthrow popular liberty. Freethought, beyond standing always for free speech and press, is not allied with these combatants. Its speakers ask the liberty to be heard on another subject, not connected with war or conscription, without interference by the police and religious cranks. If the courts could put up an argument to show us how criticising and exposing Billy Sunday interferes with the defense of the realm, as does pro-German pacifism, we might admit that the government had a case against Freethought as presented at our street meetings; but nothing of the sort is alleged, and if it is suspected the accusation has not yet been made. As for the war, now that we are in it, the people ought to concentrate and bring the conflict to a quick termination by the only possible way, which is by winning it. Frankly speaking, our position may be dictated by selfish and personal considerations, for with a son in the army and in line for service in France, we hope to see the entire strength of our nation marshaled for the support of the young men it sends abroad to fight its battles. Nevertheless we give the pacifists, the pro-Germans, the Socialists, the Anarchists, the anti-conscriptionists and other non-resistant advocates this reading notice, with the address of their general counsel and executive secretary, that the champions of free speech may join their League and assist them to realize its objects. Unless we demand free speech for all we cannot consistently ask it for ourselves.

Same Here.

We say that in the main the press of this country [Great Britain] in relation to religion—we are not concerned with any other issue—has deliberately fostered the growth of beliefs which it knows to be false, and it has done this by methods of suppression and falsification. For all the general public may gather from the public press, a deliberately organized attack on the Christian religion does not exist. So far as the press is concerned, the public would be unaware of the fact that a large proportion of our public men in literature, in art, in science, and in politics have ceased to be Christian in any genuine sense of the term. With rare exceptions, no reports of Freethought meetings are published, no reviews of avowedly Freethought works are permitted to appear, and when a Freethinker's work in social or political life compels an obituary notice, the fact that he was an anti-Christian is carefully suppressed. The consequence is, that, save for those who are brought into direct contact with Freethought propaganda, the public is either unaware of its existence, or is taught to regard it as the mistaken hobby of a harmless handful of cranks. They are kept in leading strings by the priests, largely by the interested connivance of the public press.—The Freethinker (London)

THE PRIEST AND SOLDIER.

A Partnership Shown by the Present War Not to Be in Force Now as Formerly.

In his Thoughts on Life and Death, Alfred Loisy, the distinguished French Modernist, deals with certain mystic and romantic apologists for the church who are trying to rationalize Catholicism and so save it from extinction among the thoughtful. He takes the occasion to review and criticise a novel with a religious purpose, "The Voyage of the Centurion," which appears to be by a grandson of the heretical Ernest Renan, with a preface by M. Bourget. Loisy's paper was presented before the members of the "Union for Truth" (Paris) under the head of "Talks of Noncombatants on the War," and is translated for THE TRUTH SEEKER by Joseph McCabe.

BY ALFRED LOISY.

IV.

"The Voyage of the Centurion" indicates or signifies the various stages of a conversion which many seem disposed to regard as a symbol of the general movement which, according to them, would bring back France to Catholicism, its national religion and the only true religion. In itself the conversion of Ernest Psichari represents nothing, and proves nothing, except the evolution by which he was conducted from anti-clerical unbelief to what may be called rationalist Catholicism; which is rather a different thing from the old traditional Catholicism, the official religion of the Roman church today. The individual fact is full of meaning, because the grandson is opposed to the grandfather, Ernest Renan, without any reflection that the case of the grandfather may be just as representative as that of the grandson, and even more. If Ernest Psichari is only a young man driven to the Catholic church in disgust at anti-clericalism, Ernest Renan may also be only a seminarist who falls away through reading too many German books. If Ernest Psichari is not an isolated case of conversion, Ernest Renan was not an isolated case of secession; and it is very far from clear that the movement inaugurated by the ancestor has a less important range than the movement which is, we are told, represented by the grandson. Although they were related, the two men were very different, and the respective religious experiences they have had may very well differ, not merely in the directions they have taken, but in solidity, depth, and significative value.

It is not, in the first place, a very remarkable thing that the man of genius and conspicuous wisdom, the sincerely mystical soul, the cleric engrossed in the study of Christian philosophy and theology, should have been brought in spite of himself—for it was certainly against his desire and inclination—to renounce, not only the profession which he loved, and for which he seemed to be made, but also the faith for the sake of which he embraced that profession? And the reason was because he could not confine his mind in the world to which he wished to confine it; because he lost the faith in proportion as he studied it. The breaches in the faith were those that science—science in general, not merely German science—made in Catholic teaching, and it is not clear up to the present that these breaches have been repaired; on the contrary, they have grown wider.

The modernist crisis of French Catholicism, the causes of which have been sought everywhere, and which malicious people—and possibly some simple people—trace to Germany, was neither more nor less than the crisis of the seminarist Renan, sustained, multiplied, and intensified in the bosom of the church, in the person of priests who, wishing to remain in the household, endeavored to accommodate it to the needs of their mind and soul. A crisis of intellectuals, some say, who took their poor human reason for a measure of the truth. Unfortunately the same poor reason is used by the faithful when they look into their faith, and even the humblest of them is not really sure that he may not some day be discomfited by what he finds there. We cannot believe ourselves to be in possession of the truth in despite of reason. After all, however little the instrument may be worth—and it is certainly imperfect—the intelligence is a dominating part of man, and every crisis of the faith resolves itself, even when it has not originated in speculative beliefs, into an intellectual crisis. Faith does not proceed from the active intelligence, but it is formulated in the intelligence, and it is in and by the intelligence that its failure is manifested. The intellectual crisis of Catholicism which made its appearance in Renan has continued under our eyes, if not to ourselves, and it would not be hazardous to predict that our grandchildren, if it be given to them to record its alternate periods of rapid progress and stagnation, will not see the end of it.

On the other hand we have a young man whose literary ability will not be questioned—though it would not be wise to read even his best pages after reading any single page by his grandfather—but one who had not the intellectual wealth of Renan, nor his calm reason, nor his depth of thought, nor his patience of spirit, nor his subtlety of observation. His natural faculties have not, if we may believe him, received any substantial nourishment. No doubt he exaggerates when he says that his education had no moral direction. He would have us believe that he was taught only the most brutal and narrow anticlericalism. It does not seem as if in his youth he had been as studious as his grandfather, and he himself tells us that in those days he was tolerably irregular. At a certain moment, he intimates, he felt the emptiness of his life and was filled with disgust: a sentiment which does honor to the man who felt it, but is evidence of nothing except a disordered life. The unbelief of this young man was such as we should expect in one who was perfectly ignorant of religious matters; it was not a conviction, acquired, involuntarily, by serious study, that there was no supernatural revelation in Christianity. Of such an experience, which Renan sustained throughout his laborious career, and always held free from prejudice, whatever his opponents say, the grandson does not seem to have had the least idea. He might have read the learned works of his grandfather without profiting by them, but it looks as if he has never even read most of them. To judge by his "Voyage of the Centurion" he must have read "The Priest of Nemi," though he does not seem to have grasped the profound idea of it; and one may suppose that he went as far as to read "The Abbess of Jouarre;" but we see nothing to persuade us that he has seriously read the seven volumes of "Christian Origins" and "The History of the People of Israel." He might therefore have spared himself certain attacks he makes upon pseudo-savants and demi-savants, not himself being a savant of any description, and having missed the opportunity of knowing a real and complete savant in the person of his grandfather. The military profession imposed upon him a discipline which did him good. He was a militarist out of love of his trade, and also perhaps by a reaction against the environment of his origin. He presently came to believe that Catholicism was as necessary a discipline for the national life as military discipline is for the preservation of the army. In Africa he felt that, in face of Islam, Catholicism and France formed an indivisible unity.

These are the narrow views of a feverish mind which was in some degree duped by ready-made formulæ, and pleasantly believed it had made a quite new discovery. An internal restlessness, the acutely felt need of a rule and a moral assistance, or of a spiritual communion, impelled Ernest Psichari toward the church; and his sated imagination still finds in Catholic mysticism a suitable nourishment. His final conversion was the result of a series of convergent impressions, not of close observation and experience properly so-called. His faith is not in point of doctrine more correct than the thesis of the new apologists who now rejoice over his conversion. As an ardent neophyte he believed whatever they wrote. He says that he believes in God only because he believes in Jesus; and no doubt he believes in Jesus only in the mystic sense of the Christian communion. All that is real faith; but, good heavens, it is not orthodox theology! The conversion was not according to the formula. However, the church congratulates itself upon that conversion; and nothing is more natural, since it certainly never expected such compensation for "The Life of Jesus."

The compensation is not adequate, because the conversion of the grandson has not the same character of durable experience, nor the same representative significance, as the apostasy of the grandfather. Not that the case of Ernest Psichari should be regarded as accidental and isolated. Circumstances have thrown it into relief, but it is not a unique case. Apart from the dreams of nationalists and the exaggerations of others, it is certain that a pretty large number of young men, not less ignorant than Ernest Psichari of theological and doctrinal Catholicism, are joining the church out of a feeling of horror of the moral void from which our laity seems to them to suffer. They also have a very real, but very restricted, experience. They find only in the church the kind of support and the mystic atmosphere which they need for their peace of conscience and gladness of heart. The teaching of the church would disturb them if they examined it closely, the politics of the church would scandalize them if they did not refuse to pay attention to it. Certain official actions of the church trouble them, but they are careful to forget them, because the church alone has given them the rule of life which they wanted, the house of recollection, of fine emotions, and of fraternity, in which their heart is satisfied, their soul is at peace, their being expands and improves. Outside they see—perhaps wish to see—only conflicting interests, antagonistic passions, hatreds, rivalries and unrestrained disorder. Fanatical anticlericalism, full of denials and intolerance, inspires them only with disgust, and in their condemnation they confuse with it the abandonment of ancient beliefs out of love of the truth.

That is assuredly an experience: an experience differing from that of Renan, but, being less complete than his, it does not contradict his. Renan's experience of the church had been chiefly intellectual. He found it impossible to live in it, and his experience, felt by others, continues to have the same results. Ernest Psichari and his like have tested the world as impressionists and sentimentalists. Suffering morally in it, they turned to the church, in which they feel better, without having examined it otherwise than by way of this intimate satisfaction. Thus the two experiences are quite different, and one does not destroy the other, for they have no meeting-ground. The first may seem to be more solid, since it is more methodical and has not ceased to fortify its positions. The second may, as it takes care to do, make a point of its moral advantages, its social usefulness, and of what might be called its intimate necessity for the individual. But the first experience shows that the church is not the sole and indispensable source of the advantages in question, and that these advantages are compromised by increasing difficulties, by the fact that so many now find belief impossible. The question is, then, whether the traditional center of our moral life does not tend to be displaced; whether some souls are not disposed to place themselves, not so much in opposition to the old creeds, as independently of them, and especially of the Catholic church.

The alliance of the sabre and the cassock is, like that of the throne and altar, very ancient, but very much shaken. On his way to Damascus the penitent Centurion regarded that city as indestructible. "In the system of order there are the priest and the soldier. In the world of disorder there is neither priest nor soldier. . . . Everything is interconnected in the system of order. Just as France cannot reject the cross of Jesus Christ, so the army cannot reject France. And the priest can no more do without the soldier than the soldier can do without the priest. . . . Loyalty to France soon leads to loyalty to Christ, while disloyalty leads only to disloyalty." ("The Voyage of the Centurion," pp. 8 and 9.) That is an insinuation that disbelief in Christ is disloyal to France: a theory which is wrong not merely in its rhetorical excess, but in its lack of justice and truth.

In itself Christianity was an economy of salvation which appealed to all men, collectively and individually, with a view to their eternity. Under the symbol of a happy immortality it purported to be a discipline of true humanity. In fact, in taking the place of the older national religions it became itself, at least on one side, a national religion: at first the religion of the Roman Empire, then of the nations which were born of its dismemberment, all of which have, in their various ways, adapted it to the development of their national conscience. It became national by entering into the life of the nations, and thus it is that amongst Catholic peoples the priest marches by the side of the soldier. One might—in generalizations of this kind a little generosity is always needed—imagine them as the two guardians of the social order; the priest the guardian of the moral order, the soldier protecting the external order of society.

In the Catholic days of France this association really existed to the extent to which such things do exist: that is to say, approximately, a little more or less, not absolutely and perfectly, as the Centurion thinks he sees it in his glow of faith. There was priest and priest, as there was soldier and soldier; and this function was what it could be in the generality of the social body in which they played their parts. Richelieu was priest, Vincent de Paul another; and their relations to the army were not quite the same. The former would have approved the declaration of the Centurion, while St. Vincent would not at first have understood it, and would always have taken it with a good deal of reserve, considering that his Christian order of society had in the soldier of his time too inaccurate a servant. The truth is that the idea is mainly political, and has not been derived from the ancient history of France. It belongs to a certain form of contemporary nationalism, which, as it wishes to use Catholicism and the army for its own ends, assigns the priest and the soldier the parts which suit its own plan of an absolutist regime, with the priest to direct souls in the interest of the state and the soldier to meet the external enemy and, on occasion suppress disorder at home. Thus Napoleon thought in his time.

And Napoleon on that very account came to an end. No nation, not even France—and Germany may see this some day, to its cost—is made for eternal warfare. On the other hand, Catholicism—this is not said by way of depreciation—is not quite suitable for this police-function. In substance, it is not part of the state-service; it has its own ideal, which is superior to forms of government, and it at times recalls this. The soldier himself, the absolute soldier, who is supposed not to have changed since the days of the soldier of Capernaum; to incarnate forever the principles of obedience, is not an unchanging pillar of the social order. He becomes more and more a citizen, and is now, in the days in which we live, but an armed citizen. An agent as much as you like, but less and less of an instrument. Already the twin-symbol of the priest and the soldier has become a mere matter of theory. The Centurion has passed in spirit from the army to the church; but the path from the one to the other existed only in his imagination.

(To be continued.)

Truth.

Who shall prescribe the realms of thought—
"Thus far, nor farther shalt thou go?"—
Who say that Inspiration taught
Enough for thinking minds to know?

Or who with dogmas shall oppose
The best results of honest thought
And say that "knowledge only flows
From what inspired authors taught"?

While grand unnumbered worlds revolve,
From inspired author's eyes concealed,
Are other problems to be solved,
Are other truths to be revealed.

Truths wrung by Reason from the laws
That govern natural things, to trace
From each result the proper cause,
And leave for Miracle no place.

Mind thus directed will expand,
And only thus its mission prove;
"The reason why," it may demand,
Without offending aught above.

Know thou the truth; it is thy right;
Nor fear the blustering bigot's zeal,
Thine efforts 'mid the darkest night,
Some glittering star may yet reveal.

GEORGE SMITH.

Twain's "Mysterious Stranger."

"The Mysterious Stranger," by Mark Twain, is a book well worth reading. It at least shows the views of an independent thinker who seeks the real truth. The author uses fiction freely in order to give vividness to his feelings. God and Satan are of course free subjects for man to handle, and Twain's great aim is to show that these characters are purely phases of nature. His Satan has infinite power, and is a superb miracle worker. Wine is created without the aid of water, and a pint bottle already full of the royal liquor has a like quantity poured into it without overflowing. Also a priest, Father Peter, has a niece called Marget who gives a sumptuous feast at her house; many of the villagers as well as intimate friends being invited. White and red wine flowed freely and numerous dishes of substantial food and dainties are miraculously provided by Satan's power. The wonders of this feat eclipse the scriptural one—the marriage at Cana in Galilee, when Jesus is said to have turned the contents of six stone jars full of water into wine. Marget could furnish, in fact, by the aid of Satan, anything in the way of food, and when a fish was frying on the griddle, then taken off, another would appear in its place. True, he does many things that we must term cruel. He creates, for the amusement of the boys present, a small village with five hundred diminutive people in it; then builds a castle for them, and places in it artillery, horses and soldiers, but many of the men are deformed, their legs not being of uniform length. This causes them to reel and sprawl about in a most ridiculous way. Satan then said, "Now we will have a storm, then an earthquake."

Rain now falls, lightning flashes; the castle takes fire, and the people come rushing out of it, frightened and imploring help. Next the magazine blows up, the castle is but a wreck, and the boys, looking on, were greatly grieved at so much suffering. "Don't cry," says Satan; "they are of no value." "But they have gone to hell," said the boys, being Catholics. "Oh, it is no matter, we can make plenty of men." The boys thought a hell must be the destination of these little people, as no sacraments were administered.

Satan is now asked for his real name, and his reply is "Satan." He claims to have been named after an uncle, the fallen angel, and says his family was blameless before the fall, and this uncle of his was the only member of his family "that had ever sinned." Satan claims he "can't do wrong, and has no disposition to do so, for he as an angel doesn't know what it is." He also claims that fatality is a thing in itself—a part of life which we or "nothing can change." It follows from a link of causes that cannot be broken. This view of life is too precipitate, and does not take in all the factors. Man is not a mere instrument to be played on; he is a living working fact.

Here I think Mark Twain has shown too vividly one side of life's shield, but science and a close study of man shows another. Both sides of the shield have a lesson for us. We must not ignore either of them or assume that any one source contains all the truth.

Satan has only contempt for the way the human race is ruled by "minorities, and seldom by majorities." He says that sometimes the noisy minority are right, sometimes wrong, but no matter, "the crowd follow it." He speaks of the foolish custom of killing supposed witches; "not one person out of one hundred really approved of it," still the crowd had their way. One of Twain's characters, Ursula, claimed that only the "poor and God have feeling for the poor; the rich don't care for anybody but themselves." This remark seems to stir up Satan, who says: "What makes you think so?" "Because I know it," replies the woman. "Not a sparrow falls to the ground without his seeing it."

We can easily understand how Satan must have regarded this pious view of God taking cognizance of every earthly trifle. We find in the Bible (Matthew xxi, 19) the story of a fig-tree which Christ is said to have cursed because it had only leaves on it and no figs. Our Lord was hungry and vented his wrath on the unfortunate tree, by condemning it never to bear again. I think that Mark Twain considered the story a silly one, lacking point, so he has given us the cherry-tree planted by Satan which grows in five minutes, to a large tree. Many persons come with baskets to gather the fruit. The remarkable tree was a surprise to everyone, for the branches were loaded with fruit of various kinds—oranges, grapes, bananas, peaches, etc. Not only this: the tree grew new fruit as rapidly as the old was picked. The owner of the land where the tree grew was cross and ill-natured. He cried out: "Away from here, clear out, you dogs; the tree is on my land and is my property."

Satan said: "Please let them have their pleasure for an hour only, sir—only that, and no longer. Afterwards, you may forbid; and you will still have more fruit than you and the state can together consume in a year."

These words made the land owner angry, and he asked, "Who are you, you vagabond, to tell your betters what they may do, and what they mayn't!" and he then struck Satan with a cane.

The fruit on the tree instantly rotted, the leaves withered and fell; then Satan said to the man: "Take good care of the tree, for its health and yours are bound together. It will never bear again, but if you tend it well, it will live long. Water its roots once in each hour every night—and do it yourself; it must not be done by proxy. If you fail once only in a night, the tree will die, and you likewise." Satan also said to the man: "You must not go home to your country any more; you would not live to reach there." The man feared Satan, but was too proud to beg for any privileges, though he looked at Satan as if he wished to do so. While he stared, the latter vanished.

Satan next visits the boys in the same place in the woods where they first met, and the boys ask him for a show for their pleasure. "Very well," said he. "Would you like to see a history of the progress of the human race?—its development of that product which is called civilization?" "Yes," cried they; so he turned the place into the garden of Eden, showed Cain killing Abel with a club; we heard the blow and saw the blood flow. Next came a view of unknown wars, with numerous cruel murders and tortures; next the Flood and Ark; then Noah appeared, and he is overcome with wine; next, Sodom and Gomorrah, and "the attempt to discover two or three respectable persons there." Next, the Hebraic wars, and the murder of survivors after battles, the killing of cattle, and saving of young girls to be distributed to priests and soldiers; next Jael enters a tent and drives a nail into the temple of her sleeping guest; then Cæsar is pictured. Hell is shown and its torments, and at times, Satan is sarcastic, when he sums up

Christian progress. He says. "It is remarkable progress. In five or six thousand years, five or six high civilizations have flourished, commanded the world, then faded and disappeared."

In speaking of Christian inventions for killing people, he says: "Sometime the Turks and the Chinaman will buy these to kill missionaries and converts with."

I will here say, if we view God as eternal, infinite, and Satan as all powerful, which is taught by Christianity, then they are about equally creative in heavenly work. True, God is said to work for good and glory, and Satan for evil and destruction. If God is all-powerful and Satan not so, and if the Creator feels personal interest in us and love, as we understand these qualities, should he not come to our rescue and save us from hell?

Some may say that God has use for Satan and does not wish to destroy him; that if it were not for evil how could good exist? Goodness must have degrees, and if so, when do they terminate? Some say we are free agents only to a limited degree. One point seems clear; right and wrong are entities and do not imply the existence or non-existence of what we call God.

Moral and immoral acts rest on a foundation of their own, on our relations to life and the things of life. Satan is the personification of evil, and God of good.

I think Mark Twain was a Rationalist like Ingersoll, but he had a very different way of expressing it. Twain was disgusted with the Christian scheme of salvation, the dogmatism in regard to God and the need of a savior. Satan and God are, he feels, two figure-heads in the Christian religion, and it is as easy to argue for the good or evil of one as of the other. He really leaves the Christian church to fight it out as best it can; though in his book many statements are made that serve Twain's private sentiments. Satan is a curious character as the "Mysterious Stranger" pictures him, but no more so than in the Christian scheme.

His last visit is to Theodor and he comes to say good-bye; but Satan adds: "We shall not see each other any more."

"In this life, Satan, but surely in another? We shall meet in another surely?"

"There is no other; have you never suspected this, Theodor?"

"No. How could I? But if it can only be true"

"It is true."

Satan then defines life as a vision, a dream, and adds: "Nothing exists, all is a dream, God—man—the world—the sun, the moon, the wilderness of stars—a dream—all a dream; they have no existence; nothing exists save empty space and you!"

"I!"

"And you are not you—you have no body, no blood, no bones, you are but a thought. I myself have no existence; I am but a dream—your dream, creature of your imagination. In a moment you will have realized this, then you will banish me from your vision. I shall dissolve into nothingness out of which you made me."

I feel that this is not a true picture of what is needed in life to spur us on and give deep hope of some form of a bright future; still Twain's speculations are plainly a possible truth.

Who can determine that what we call the realities of life are not purely mental pictures that ultimately perish? Though the majority of us will not, I think, endure a view that things we seem to see and feel are not realities, we should nevertheless give these views serious thought.

If Twain goes to extremes, so does the system of Christianity, and let them fight it out.

Faith that seeks to smother speculation is only an evil.

Yarmouth Port, Mass.

FRANCIS ALGER.

Against the Church.

It is often said:

"How is it possible that any person can talk against the church, especially if he or she has children?"

Let us analyze the church's work through a week and estimate the harm instead of the good it is supposed to do.

A young person, from the time of the arrival at the age of say fourteen, if being brought up in the church, is by this same church hindered and handicapped in an effort at obtaining an education more than by any other influence bearing on the life of the student.

The organization of the youth of the church body is in the hands of the pastor and a committee of the older ladies generally, and besides attendance at prayer meeting and choir meeting, usually Thursday and Friday evenings, includes attendance upon Y. M. C. A. and C. E. meetings, church help meet-necessity to be held in the evenings of the various days of the week, and a student is kept out of touch with his school work excepting possibly Monday evenings. With a long list of pastors in my mind I have found that the most of them and most of the lady chaperons of the young ladies of the church believe in marrying young, and their interest is more in the line of matchmaking and shooing the young people into the bonds of matrimony than in imparting any special powers of grace, or ability to understand the ethics or science of religion.

Any student of our schools that is an active church worker at the age of 14 to 16, in a large majority of cases, soon marries and is by the exigencies of the case hustled from the school to the active work of breadwinning for a young family. I have noticed also in my personal life that the pastor and choir leader are the means of a large contingent of the young people of the church attempting the study of music whether they have any natural aptitude for it or not, and as the study of the music question will show that the undertaking is always attended with complete failure and disappointment with the most of these, the church can be accused of this misdirected work.

In fact, there is nothing outside the church that is the cause of as many abandoning their school education as music, and the feeder of this class is the church. From personal observation it is my conviction that of the youthful class of church workers at least 80 per cent. become discouraged in their school work and soon drop out unless they drop their church work. I have also noticed that it is usually the most emotional of the students, those that are poor in mathematics and the sciences, that are the best helpers at church work. If some good skeptic in some large city would get at the records of the public school children of the age of 14 up, and see what percent. attend church, what percent. take active part in church work, and what percent. of the church workers arrive at anything like success in their efforts at school work, I think it would result in conclusions that would surprise many.

In regard to the actual church work being of any earthly moral use, I am sincerely convinced that it weakens moral character and starts a youth with entirely unfit conceptions of his relations to the actual world of life. The prayer meeting as I have so many times seen it conducted, is a school for hypocrisy. As a school of suggestion, mimicry, and the assuming of conditions that in time are accepted as facts, it establishes a base for false reasoning and unsound thinking that is entirely prejudicial to a sound mental development, or moral either.

The choir meeting is, as a rule, a school for scandal and petty spite, with flirtations and coquetry more in evidence than any appreciation of music, or the ability of their choir leader.

Business methods of conducting church work are so optimistic as a rule that at the close of a campaign for money a resort to further appeal to some liberal-hearted member is necessary to accomplish the end sought. Suppers are advertised and sold at less than half the actual cost of the contributions, and excursions are planned that are financed by begging committees from start to finish.

Lecture courses are financed for no other purpose than to set them over against the same course by some other society or school that may have something on its list that is objectionable to the censors of the superfluity.

The same amount of energy and tact and personal supervision along practical lines of true education would lead to a truer conception of morals and a better idea of the real and actual in life. We are of the earth and must learn its secrets in a material way, and for our children to be brought up in an atmosphere that smacks of nothing so much as of dreams, is not for the best understanding of the problems of waking hours. I have heard preachers discourse on vision and dreams, and the result of their teaching would have justified the placing of a trance medium in our schools and the adding to the curriculum of our colleges a course in mediumship. It may be that after all the preacher looks at it right: that one-half to three-fourths of the public are incapable of being taught, or accepting anything that does not appeal to their emotions, and therefore the church must take them in hand and lead them, or they would become the prey of some other organization that would do them much more harm than the church.

But of this I am not assured. I have always felt that if each individual had the advantage of skilled teaching and leadership, with scientific diagnosis of his adaptability, something better than a hewer of wood and a drawer of water could be made of each of us. Or at least we could be so taught that we would come to an appreciation of life and its purposes and beauties and obtain more from living it than we now obtain with the only purpose of our lives, as one preacher puts it, to save our souls—a very blind sort of purpose at the best!

S. A. BASSETT.

Evangelism Gone Stale.

On "What I Think of Billy Sunday," Rose Falls Bres, a woman editor and lawyer, writes to the New York World. Her criticism is called the best that has appeared in the daily papers of this city. We quote:

"A farmer set up a scarecrow so fearsome it not only prevented the crows from stealing that season but made them bring back all they stole the year before.

"That story and the one that Billy Sunday grabs the heart and conscience of every hearer and tosses it straight heavenward is believable in proportion to your information.

"He started out a live wire—but he has grounded.

"Sincere? Probably. But a more relevant question would be, is the result of Mr. Sunday's revival work worth while? Go down in poverty's alleys in the slums and ask if conditions are bettered because of some great moving influence for good in the community. Ask the women trudging home at nightfall, weary with work and figuring how to make a dollar stretch to three or four in purchasing power, if converted employers have added a few pennies a week to their wages recently.

"Ask the probation officers if the procession of Magdalens is falling off because of a new purifying influence in New York. The answer is the only worth while.

"The Tabernacle is anchored in the running stream of the city's affairs, but it hasn't allowed much of its Sundayism to filter through the pine walls. The sawdust trail is a spectacular religious highway, but it seems to lead only to the brand of religion acquired by the woman who was noted for her gorgeous jewelry and, appearing at a social function without, she explained: 'It is sinful. I have hit the trail and been converted. Diamonds are but evil decoration and I cannot bear to look at them any more.'

"'Splendid,' ejaculated a good friend in response, 'and did you give them to the poor?'

"The woman looked skyward.

"'No,' she said, 'I gave them to my sister.'

"The religion of the Tabernacle stays too close home—it seems just a family affair. Why? Well, a torrent of words rattled off as Mr. Sunday feared he would miss a train, punctuated with 'I don't care a whoop,' 'Go to the devil,' and allusions to Sheol spelled with two l's, isn't argument, and if real lasting results are to be obtained in the hearts and souls of the average crowd which flocks to hear Mr. Sunday, he will need a fresh grip on a new vocabulary, to coin some new phrases to startle and some new stunts to attract."

An evangelist named Mitchell has been doing the usual thing at Mount Carmel, Illinois. He preached on repentance, which he thus illustrated: "You owe at your grocer's $100. You say to him, 'I mean to turn over a new leaf. I shall pay cash for all my purchases hereafter. You do that. What about your unpaid $100? Repentance pays the old bill, and keeps the account square.'"

A friend in Mount Carmel informs us that after having made this exhortation, Evangelist Mitchell left town with bills unpaid. That, however, is not quite so bad as the act of a predecessor in the Christian ministry at Mount Carmel, who after preaching there for several years ran away with his brother's wife and left his own wife without support. We are again reminded of the philosophy of the Baptist editor who said ministers use up so much of their strength phrasing morality that they have none left for its practice.

The town of Hibbing, in Minnesota, has or has had the services of an evangelist who introduces innovations not ventured upon even by the acrobatic revivalist of the tabernacle. The Hibbing Journal reports that upon a recent occasion, when Miss Alice Congdon, on behalf of the high school students, presented the evangelist with a large bouquet of roses, the Rev. Mr. Aldrich, that being his name, "returned the compliment by standing on his head for the students on the pulpit."

If people, when they speak of Christianity, include the virtues common to all religions, they should not give Christianity credit for all the good that has been done. There were millions of virtuous men and women, millions of heroic and self-denying souls before Christianity was known.—Robert G. Ingersoll.

NOTES AT LARGE.

The religious value of the work of the professional evangelist, Billy Sunday, has been repeatedly called in question, and, it would seem, for the very best of reasons. A man who sets out to accomplish a definite purpose ought to be estimated, not by his ability to do other things, but by the degree of perfectness he has achieved in the doing of that particular thing which he set out to accomplish. That Billy Sunday is a remarkable entertainer, and that much of what he says has "keen humor and verbal art," not to speak of horse sense; that he has a certain element of magnetism about him which is effective in alluring to his meetings a crowd of curious people who are anxious to see and hear him, will scarcely be denied by anyone who has followed his career in New York; but that he is making any marked improvement upon social conditions as he found them is a matter which is only now receiving from thoughtful persons the consideration which it certainly deserves.

Few persons have analyzed the situation more clearly than Mr. Francis Hackett in a recent article published in the New Republic. Mr. Hackett writes: "In spite of the thousands who have hit the sawdust trail, it is difficult to believe that more than a tiny proportion of his auditors are religiously affected by him. The majority of those who hit the trail merely want to shake his hand. Very few give any signs of seriousness or 'conversion.' The atmosphere of the tabernacle, bright with electric lights and friendly with hymn-singing, is not religiously inspiring, and in the voice and manner of Billy Sunday there is seldom a contagious note. . . . For all his pugnacious vociferation, he leaves an impression of being at once violent and incommunicative, a sales agent for Christianity, but not a guide or a friend."

After reading this description of the Sunday performances we felt that we have reached solid ground. There is absolutely nothing about either the evangelist or the tabernacle calculated to inspire a spirit of uplift in any person willing to use his common sense. Those alleging that they have been saved through the instrumentality of this erratic preacher are talking nonsense, very much as some men do under the influence of a glass or two of sparkling wine; for we read that in the New Testament days religion was associated with strong drink, since an apostle on one occasion had to explain to the crowd that the peculiar behavior of his converts was not due to the fact of their being "filled with new wine." Sunday's troupe has scored a "success" in New York very much as might Barnum and Bailey's Circus; but when the preacher has departed, carrying with him his little "plunder" of $100,000, men will remember him no more, not even the "oft-converted," unless, perchance, this clerical grafter should make up his mind to call again.

There are but few more clearly marked evidences of the immoral character of Romanism than the prospect constantly held out to Catholics of saving their souls by the bequest of money or property, both in life and in the hour of their death, to the cause of religion. The credulous are unceasingly reminded of the text in "Holy Writ" which tells how that "charity covers a multitude of sins." And as most Catholics are desirous of having their sins overlooked, at least at the moment of their departure from this earthly sphere, they are readily won by this attractive inducement to relinquish their worldly goods to the care of the church, in order to secure a clean passport to heaven. The present world-war has created a new and powerful incentive in the minds of the Catholic hierarchy to call upon the "faithful" to give alms in abundance for the maintenance of their denominational institutions, for there can be no doubt of a man's saving his soul if he give in behalf of such an urgent need. The immorality of this position is plainly manifest to anyone whose heart and mind are in the right place. To barter heaven for gold, to be pardoned a life of sin for a money compensation, to be esteemed righteous and of good character by a commercial transaction after years of vicious indulgence, is a condition of unethical procedure which only a religion could devise.

Our theological education was neglected, but we believe that the following sentiment, attributed to an evangelist who carries the D. D. of Westminster College, is a good Calvinistic doctrine; to wit:

"The doctrine of the fatherhood of God and the brotherhood of man is the worst rot that was ever dug from the pit of hell, and every minister who preaches it is a liar."

The paragraph was used in an editorial article in THE TRUTH SEEKER of April 14. A Washington reader writes: "I have been challenged on several occasions to produce a copy of Sunday's lecture wherein he made the statement above quoted, and this I have promised to do; but to date I have not been able to locate it."

The sermon illuminated by the language under discussion was probably delivered in Boston last year and reported in the daily press of that city. Our regard for the output of the evangelist has not been such as would prompt us to preserve his printed discourses. However, the disputed passage may be found in a tract written by the Rev. Charles W. Wendte, D. D., 25 Beacon street, Boston, who quotes it from "Billy" Sunday.

The "Sundayites" who challenge our Washington friend to verify the quotation do not know their theology, for whatever the language may be, the idea is strictly orthodox and is held to by many Calvinists and taught to Sunday school pupils. The leading Sunday school paper of the country recently committed itself to the doctrine, and was criticised therefor by Dr. Lyman Abbott in the Outlook.

It appears that in order to be saved Presbyterian-wise it is necessary faithfully to believe that God is not the father of all men, but only of those who get him right; and that all men are not brothers, but only those can claim to be brethren who accept brotherhood in Christ Jesus our Lord. The rest of mankind—the heathen, Infidels and unregenerate—are children of the devil or of the world, and are of the brotherhood of sin. They do not belong to God's family, not having partaken of the redemption purchased by Christ. See John one and twelve: "But as many as received him, to them gave he power to become the sons of God." None others have the power; hence the fatherhood of God is restricted.

The doctrine of the fatherhood of God and the brotherhood of man is preached by liberal ministers who are dissatisfied with the old faith, which is narrow. Theologically speaking, the doctrine is no better than Universalism. We have no doubt that among readers of THE TRUTH SEEKER are better theologians than we are that can set those Sundayites right who suppose that the evangelist is discredited by the quotation, which is only a testimony to his orthodoxy.

The fundamentally different attitude of our modern age toward nature as compared with the days when the dominant factor in human life was religion, is seen in the wonderful advance made in medical practice. In surgery, it is true, the ancient world had acquired great facility, as is evidenced not only by reports of very difficult operations, but also by the collection of surgical instruments from Pompeii preserved in the museum of Naples. But in dealing with disease equal progress had not been made. It has always been easier for men to mend a broken bone than to cure a cold. This difficulty was met by the early Christians in a very simple fashion. They laid disease upon Satan. He sent miseries upon the world, and minor devils into people. If a man was crazy, he was possessed of a devil. If he had boils, he had devils. If a woman was bent over by some disease, she had been bound by Satan. Indeed, devils might be said to have been the bacilli of the New Testament world. The way to cure a man was to find some way to induce the devils to leave him. Sometimes this was done by conjuring the devil into a certain plant, and then attaching the plant to the tail of a dog, and then forcibly inducing the dog to pull it up. Sometimes it was done by giving a dose so nasty that the devil could not abide in the same body with it. Sometimes it was done by using magic names. Such methods did not exhaust the medical practice of the early Christian world, but they were so widespread as to enable us to appreciate the great difference between the age of the gospel and our own as regards scientific attainments.

The conception of the orderly succession of purposeful changes played no part in the society of Judaism and the gospel. The eclipse was more significant than the sunrise. In our modern world the wonder born of awe of the unexplored universe has all but disappeared. Our capacity for surprise has been largely overcome by the spectroscope, radium, the X-ray, and the experiments of such scientists as Professor Loeb. There is no man so bold as to prophesy how deep our science with its theory of evolution may probe into the mysteries of existence. One after another the great secrets of the universe are being disclosed, at least in the sense that we can tell the conditions under which certain phenomena invariably appear. Our ignorance of the remainder no longer is lightened by the appeal to devils or to angels. We are classifying phenomena so rapidly as to be convinced that such classification means knowledge, and that the universe is everywhere sane and law-abiding. Health and disease have become matters of investigation, and in so far as they involve the problem of evil, they have become phases of the all-absorbing search for the final unity of the evolving cosmos.

Is there a Christian nation in existence today? Has there ever been such a nation? Assuredly there is not, and never has been one that can claim to be Christian in anything but a partial sense. We need not speak of Germany; she has frankly reverted to the worship of Odin and Thor, to a gospel of force and hatred, to an avowed policy of fraud and outrage. Which of the Allies can be described unreservedly as a Christian nation? It is the hope of many people that the fire of trial, burning away much dross, will reveal in each of them an unsuspected proportion of pure gold, which will form the basis of a new religious venture as regards Christianity. These people claim that there is being liberated a force of Christian sentiment—sometimes concealed under strange names, such as Socialism or Agnosticism—that promises to control the action of the future. The citizens of each, say these ardent religionists, growing more conscious day by day that the cause they are fighting for is neither more nor less than Christian civilization, are slowly learning the truth the nineteenth century had obscured, that the spiritual is more than the material. This is a typical illustration of religious reasoning. The war conditions that exist today are the direct result of centuries of Christian teaching, both as found in the Bible and as demonstrated in the practice of the church. Nor can one rightly speak of Christian civilization, for the best that men enjoy today, in the civilization of our age, is due in no respect to religion, but to the labors of progressive minds freed from the childish and narrowing influences of a superstitious church. It is a sorry day for religion when it becomes necessary for its devotees to lie in support of its credibility.

In the catalogue of the Harned collection of paintings, American historical portraits, etc., just sold in Philadelphia, the half-tone plate of the Bass Otis copy of Romney's Paine is described as "Bass Otis, by Tom Paine." The labeler who did not know that Paine's name was Thomas, was ignorant also that Paine was the historical character and not the artist. The plate offered for sale is 29 x 35 inches, and regarding it the catalogue says: "This is the only copy from the original Romney. Bass Otis painted two portraits of this great patriot. One hangs in Independence Hall, which was painted from a copy of Sharp's engraving, by Thos. Thompson, an English artist, and the present portrait, which was copied from the original by Romney, owned by Dr. Thomas Cooper of South Carolina. His executors gave permission to Bass Otis to copy it for Dr. Wm. Wright, the former owner of the painting in question." The picture is the one favored by J. B. Elliott of Philadelphia for use in the programs of Paine meetings, and has more than once been printed in THE TRUTH SEEKER—the last occasion being December 19, 1914.

Before a meeting of five hundred Methodist ministers held in Brooklyn, the Rev. E. I. Weise of Bridgeport, Conn., declared: "I do not want to lose my soul, but if I choose between my country and my God I have made up my mind to choose God. I am an American, but a Christian first." In the newspaper reports it is said that the conference was threatened with an uproar, and that there were cries of "Traitor," etc. And no wonder. The confession of the Rev. Mr. Weise implies that there is a conflict between Christianity and Americanism, and that a choice must be made; which is a reflection on the religion of any American. But perhaps he is right, and one cannot be a Christian and an American at the same time. Nobody ever had to choose between being an American and being a Freethinker.

Nine English bishops, four Presbyterian moderators, a field marshal, Sir William Robertson, the chief of staff, several peers, an admiral, a cabinet minister, the editor of the Spectator, and representatives of all the Free churches and leading missionary societies in England have signed a document, transmitted to Canada and the United States, headed: "Call to United Prayer for the Greater Realization of the Presence and Power of the Holy Spirit; the Growth of Christian Unity; and for a Spiritual Revival." Each of the signatories would be glad, doubtless, to have all sects unite in believing as he does. Even the pope has a plan for Christian unity. It is that all should join the Roman Catholic church and acknowledge him as the head of Christendom.

Jacob Bentz of Kansas City, Kansas, is held for a mental examination. Bentz was found kneeling beside his six-year-old daughter Helena, whom he had killed as a sacrifice to God. He had his Bible in his hands and was praying. Interrogated as to his motive for killing his child, he replied that it was "God's will," and the precedent of Abraham and the example of Freeman of Pocasset, Massachusetts, are recalled. The account appears in the Arkansas Gazette of May 21. Such tragedies will occur while the Bible, which teaches the holiness of human sacrifice, is regarded as an inspired book and forced upon the attention of children and child-minded persons in public schools, the Sunday schools, and the churches.

At the Memorial Day meeting in the tabernacle, the newspapers say, Billy Sunday's preaching brought salvation to 1480 souls, such being the number who "hit the trail." But on the same day the Rev. Mr. Sunday damned and consigned to hell the whole German nation. It is as we have said: he damns as many as he saves. After putting sixty millions on the list of the lost at one clip, how long will it take him to even the score?

The countrywide attention now being paid to agriculture should popularize those words of Ingersoll: "To plow is to pray; to plant is to prophesy, and the harvest answers and fulfils." This the doctrine the country is practicing while professing to believe that prayer is communion with the supernatural and that the fulfillment is a miracle.

The Weekly Bulletin of M. M. Mangasarian, the eminent Rationalist speaker, formerly of Chicago, now comes from Spokane, Washington, where Mr. Mangasarian addresses the First Unitarian Society in Clemmer Theater. He has large audiences, "a packed theater," and is reported at length in the daily press.

In the Trail of the Evangelist.

Kansas City, May 21.—Jacob Bentz went mad and applied the tale of the biblical sacrifices in his own home Saturday night.

He dragged Helena, six years old, his oldest child, into a room and beat her to death with a sewing machine. Two hours later he was found with his Bible open at Genesis xxii, 1, kneeling beside his dead child, his hands clasped in prayer.

He did not resist arrest and murmured: "It was God's will that I kill my child," as he was taken to jail. In another room Mrs. Bentz lay prostrated, clutching her three remaining children.

Bentz was known to be deeply religious. He read his Bible at every opportunity. The sacrifice of his daughter was premeditated. Abraham, of biblical times, went on a three days' journey before offering Isaac to the Lord. Bentz quit work three days ago.

Early Saturday night he took out his Bible, and turned to his favorite theme. Suddenly he closed the book and taking Helena by the hand he made her leave her mother and enter another room with him. The mother tried to follow, but Bentz pushed her back and locked the door.

Half an hour later the Rev. A. S. Sixta, who conducts Bethel Mission, visited the Bentz family. Bentz opened the door slightly and peered out. He saw the minister.

"You are a servant of God and welcome," Bentz said. The minister inquired who was home, and the madman replied: "I am praying beside the child I have sacrificed to God."

Sixta, fearing to excite Bentz further, remained with him and the dead child until 10 o'clock. Then he managed to withdraw and call a policeman.

Bentz allowed himself to be taken, clutching his Bible. In his cell he again opened it to the tale of the sacrifice.

Kansas City is on the route recently covered by the evangelistic showman and hysteria-producer, the Rev. W. A. Sunday, whose trail is marked by cases of religious insanity more or less pronounced.

Would you be free, would you have health—get rid of your beliefs, nor any longer drag this dead weight of the past. Grandsire, to be sure was a good man, but why should we burden ourselves with the vast encumbrance of his beliefs? He lived in his day; let us live in ours. He succumbed to his beliefs at last; must we inherit these? That were dear at any price.—S. D. Kirkham.

Who waits and sympathizes with the pettiest life,
And loves all things, and reaches forth to Truth
With thanks and blessings—he alone is living!
—J. B. O'Reilly.

THE TRUTH SEEKER

Published weekly by the Truth Seeker Company, President, George E. Macdonald; Secretary, James A. Conway, 62 Vesey street, New York.

Entered at the Postoffice, New York, N. Y., as second-class matter.

Address communications and make drafts, checks, postoffice and express money orders payable to THE TRUTH SEEKER, 62 Vesey street, New York.

Subscription Rates.

Single subscription in advance . .	$3.00
Two new subscribers	5.00
One subscription two years in advance	5.00
One subscription and one new subscriber, in one remittance	5.00
To all foreign countries except Mexico, 50 cents per annum extra.

Subscriptions received for any length of time under a year at the rate of 25 cents per month. Can be begun at any time. Single copies, 10 cents.

SPECIAL NOTICE.—We shall be obliged to our readers if they will send us the name and address of any Free-thinker who is not a regular subscriber.

OBJECTS.

It is the object of THE TRUTH SEEKER to educate the people out of religious superstition. It denies the inspiration and infallibility of the Bible, and asserts the human origin of that book. It denies the existence of the theological heaven and hell, but as to the existence and immortality of the soul neither affirms nor denies. It waits for evidence.

THE TRUTH SEEKER upholds the theory of Evolution, believing that to be the solution of the question of the origin, growth, and development of the animal kingdom, including man. THE TRUTH SEEKER believes that the answer to the questions Whence? and Whither? can be given only by Science.

THE TRUTH SEEKER holds that morality and ethics—or man's relation to man—are entirely independent of creed or religion, and are founded on rules developed by experience.

In current politics THE TRUTH SEEKER takes no side or part. In general it holds to the principles of freedom enunciated by the Founders of the Republic.

THE TRUTH SEEKER believes in Free Speech, Free Press, and Free Mails; in full discussion of all sides of all subjects, and affords those having new and worthy thoughts, clearly stated, a generous and welcome hearing, each contributor being responsible for his own opinion. We neither indorse an idea by printing it, nor condemn it by exclusion.

THE TRUTH SEEKER is the recognized medium of communication between the Liberals of the country, and is edited each week for their information, instruction, entertainment, and support against religious error and mental slavery and in maintenance of their equal civil and religious rights as citizens of the United States.

The Editor invites communications on the subjects to which these pages are devoted.

POLITICAL PRINCIPLES.

(THE NINE DEMANDS OF LIBERALISM.)

1. We demand that churches and other ecclesiastical property shall be no longer exempt from taxation.
2. We demand that the employment of chaplains in Congress, in the Legislatures, in the navy and militia, and in prisons, asylums and all other institutions supported by public money shall be discontinued.
3. We demand that all public appropriations for educational and charitable institutions of a sectarian character shall cease.
4. We demand that all religious services now sustained by the government shall be abolished; and especially that the use of the Bible in the public schools, whether ostensibly as a text-book or avowedly as a book of religious worship, shall be prohibited.
5. We demand that the appointment by the President of the United States or by the governors of the various states, of all religious festivals and fasts shall wholly cease.
6. We demand that the judicial oath in the courts and in all other departments of the government shall be abolished, and that simple affirmation under the pains and penalties of perjury shall be established in its stead.
7. We demand that all laws directly or indirectly enforcing the observance of Sunday as the Sabbath shall be repealed.
8. We demand that all laws looking to the enforcement of "Christian" morality shall be abrogated and that all laws shall be conformed to the requirements of natural morality, equal rights, and impartial liberty.

9. We demand that not only in the Constitution of the United States and of the several states, but also in the practical administration of the same, no privileges or advantages shall be conceded to Christianity or any other special religion; that our entire political system shall be founded and administered on a purely secular basis; and that whatever changes shall prove necessary to this end shall be consistently, unflinchingly, and promptly made.

Letters of Friends

Readers desirous of communicating with the writers of the letters in this department may address them in care of THE TRUTH SEEKER, 62 Vesey street, New York, N. Y., and the letters will be re-addressed and forwarded.

AN ATROCITY OF WAR.

From Democritus, Pittsburgh, Pa.

To the Editor of The Truth Seeker:

War without atrocities is unthinkable. Ever since the carnage in Europe began, we have been fed upon stories of horror. Now we are in the war ourselves, and with our accustomed prowess we are going to surpass the atrocities of effete Europe if we have to lie awake all night to do it. Incidentally, also, we are going to appropriate and expend all the money that can be cajoled or squeezed out of the people.

These words of general introduction are a prelude to the tale of what the great commonwealth of Pennsylvania is doing. As soon as war had been declared, the legislature, then in session, proceeded to make an appropriation of two million dollars for public defense. Although Pennsylvania is not in any apparent danger of attack by submarines or Zeppelins, the chance to appropriate two million dollars is too good to miss. Under the circumstances, any legislator or citizen who might object could be called a traitor, and that would settle him. So every one voted for the appropriation, except perhaps a lonesome Socialist or two, who don't count.

Now the question was who should expend the two millions. There are two factions in Pennsylvania politics, who may be called the Penrose gang and the Brumbaugh gang, from the two men who are most conspicuous in the rival camps. Each calls the other ugly names, and the long-suffering public believes both. The Penrose gang controls the legislature, but Brumbaugh is governor and has the veto power. So, if the kaiser were on his way to Harrisburg, he would probably catch them wrangling about the appropriation instead of lining up before the outer walls.

Somebody in Philadelphia hit upon the clever idea of organizing a committee of public safety in a hurry, thinking that the appropriation would naturally be turned over to the Early Worm Patriots. The result was the Committee of Public Safety for the Commonwealth of Pennsylvania, with George Wharton Pepper as chairman. They engaged a press agent at a salary of several thousand a year—for you can't defend the commonwealth without a press agent. Alexander and Napoleon managed without press agents; Teddy was his own; but the present methods of warfare require a press agent above all things, who can get the pictures of the heroes on the front pages of the afternoon papers.

The press agent in Philadelphia got busy at once to earn his salary. He sent out bulletins to everybody advising them to plant spring onions, assassinate potato-bugs, pin flags on everybody, etc. This was all right, for spring onions ought to be planted, potato-bugs ought to be assassinated, and the flag manufacturers must live. But the press agent was not content with these utilitarian activities. Like Silas Wegg, he dropped into poetry. And this is the first atrocity of our war.

When the amateur versifier wishes to produce a pome, a real patriotic pome, he invariably adopts the meter of "America." The words of this national hymn, perpetrated by a Baptist preacher, the Rev. Samuel Francis Smith, and first sung in a Sunday school at Boston by children who did not know any better, contain more piety than poetry. "The Star-Spangled Banner" is a splendid and stirring ballad, but "My Country, 'tis of Thee," is punk piffle. A self-respecting press agent ought to be able to do better if he is worth his salary, especially when the commonwealth of Pennsylvania is in such imminent deadly peril as it is at present. Here is what the press agent produced:

"God of all world, to Thee,
Spirit of Unity,
To Thee we pray.

Grant us the vision clear,
Save us from hate and fear,
Help us Thy word to hear;
Thine be 'The Day!'

"Peace and on earth good will!
In this quest may we still Face martyrdom,

If we must die to save,
This the reward we crave
Victory beyond the grave;
Thy Kingdom Come!

"Let us go forth to fight,
Our faces toward the light,
Our flag unfurled.
Not for ourselves alone,
Not to have State or throne,
But to give Thee Thine own;
God save the World!"

It is said that when the kaiser received a copy of this he turned pale, and said: "Ach, mein Gott!" He would be perfectly willing, no doubt, to let the press agent have "Victory beyond the grave," but to call upon God to save the world is a terrible usurpation of the imperial prerogative. Besides, God has quite a large contract on hand to save the commonwealth of Pennsylvania when the legislature is in session and Brumbaugh at the helm.

At any rate, another patriotic poet has got busy and produced a fourth stanza to complete the job. It may not be quite as lofty and sanctified as the three above, but it is far more to the point. Here it is:

"Jahveh, or Jove, or Joss,
We will obey the Boss,
Early and late!

Help us to grab the Mon;
Help us to slay the Hun;
Brumbaugh, thy will be done—
God save the State!"

According to the latest reports, Brumbaugh has refused to let the Philadelphia committee spend any of the two million dollars. So the press agent will be out of a job. He might go over and help out Robert Bridges, poet laureate of King George, who has been a nervous wreck since he tried to find a rhyme for Gallipoli.

A LIVE QUESTION.

From James J. Dooling, New York.

To the Editor of The Truth Seeker:

The Roman Catholic church does not forbid its adherents to fight in a war of aggression; certainly not in a defensive war. The church does not deny the right of self-defense. It would permit a mother to kill in self-defense, her own son. It recognizes the right as absolute. Even if the son were irresponsible because of insanity, still the mother would have the right to kill her son in self-defense. If at the time of an assault with intent to kill by an irresponsible son, a third person were present, the church would not forbid a mother to direct that person to kill the son, if she deemed his destruction necessary to save her life. The fact that there was a chance that the irresponsible son might drop the uplifted axe and spare her life would not deprive the mother of the right of self-defense or of the right to direct another to kill him. A reasonable probability of losing her life would be sufficient justification.

We are now ready to inquire: Why should the Roman Catholic church forbid a mother to direct a doctor to take the life of her unborn child, if she deems such action necessary to save her life?

And why should the Roman Catholic church forbid Catholic doctors to perform in childbirth cases certain life-destroying operations deemed legitimate by high-class physicians of other faiths?

THE "SOULOLOGISTS."

From S. H. Van Trump, Oregon.

To the Editor of The Truth Seeker:

During the past twelvemonth there has been an unusually large crop of psychic sentiment produced in the columns of THE TRUTH SEEKER. As an interested observer I have been wondering if this unusual display could be traced to the European War. Whether the immense number of souls unwilling released from their mortal tenements were not coming back to this earth to protest against our "materialism" and "skepticism." Humbly and patiently have I read all these testimonials of the past year. Humbly, patiently, silently and prayerfully have I listened; and I have honestly endeavored to get the right thought, and a few of the genuine psychic ideas though my head. But I am getting discouraged; I am almost ready to give up in despair.

In reading these protracted and sometimes heated discussions between the spiritists and the monists, one is tempted to wish that the contending parties had really taken the trouble to inform themselves upon the subject and that they would confine themselves to facts and adopt methods of moderation in discussion. For the most part the spiritists dream entirely too big for even the report of the Society for Psychical Research; while on the other hand the monists who have appeared in THE TRUTH SEEKER seem disposed to deny in toto, or ignore entirely all psychic phenomena. Now, it seems to me that no candid Rationalist or Freethinker can afford to ignore a class of natural phenomena that has gained the acceptance of such eminent scientists of the past and present as, Lombroso, Crookes, Wallace, Sir J. J. Thomson, Thos. Edison, Luther Burbank, Dr. T. J. J. See and very many others in all countries.

It seems no longer by any possibility a question of genuine phenomena, but merely a problem of scientific and correct solution. I have read many of the most eminent advocates of the spiritistic theory from M. J. Savage and Wm. James in this country to Wallace and Flammarion in Europe. These eminent authorities are by no means agreed either in matters of fact or theory. Some of the most cogent and indefatigable investigators, as Sidgwick of England, after a life time devoted to the subject were inclined to give it up in despair as a barren or hopeless field.

So far as I know no American authority has handled this subject with more knowledge, ability, and devotion to truth than Prof. James H. Hyslop, formerly of Columbia University. There is no doubting the fact that Hyslop is a first class psychologist; that he knows the value of a "fact," that he knows how to classify psychic "facts," and what they are worth in their several classes as proof of the spiritistic theory. And while it is true that Hyslop is strongly inclined to accept the spiritistic theory, yet it is plain that he still has serious doubts and considers the case not proved.

"Jesus wept" And I, too, weep for the cause of truth in this profound and sacred subject when I read such bombastic blasts as that from Mr. W. S. Bryan in THE TRUTH SEEKER of May 12. Mr. Bryan starts out by charging Mr. Dewar as guilty of ignorance and dogmatism. He then proceeds to erect a new kingdom of knowledge, fearfully and wonderfully made, himself enthroned in that kingdom above all the scientists of the world. Mr. Bryan tells us that "these is a vast literature on spiritualism by some of the best, the purest, and the most sensible men and women that the world has produced." He seems to think that these authorities are more trustworthy than such scientists as Lodge. Why did not Mr. Bryan name some of these peerless ones? Mr. Bryan's comment on Haeckel's knowledge of the soul is modest and edifying. According to his theory the more ignorant a man is of science, including the science of biology, the better equipped he is to qualify as a "soulologist." Shall we seriously subscribe to the thesis that the man of science, he who has taken apart the human body and critically studied every organ and every function in health and in disease, and has observed the evolution of the body with the corresponding evolution of the soul, has observed the decay of the body with the corresponding decay of the soul—shall we say that such an authority is no better qualified to express an opinion on the nature of the soul than the most ignorant introspective soul sleeper in the land? Of such an authority in physiology and psychology as Herbert Spencer is not qualified to define the soul, then for the present it must remain an unknown element.

Mr. Bryan inquires: "If consciousness is not outside of the body why does the man cease thinking when he is dead? Simply because the thinking part has gone somewhere else." I would ask, why does man cease thinking when he is sound asleep? Why does he cease thinking when he has had a hard blow on the back of the head, or when a clot of blood forms in the region of the Isle of Broile? And when his soul comes back after that sound sleep why does it hopelessly fail to recall its wanderings?

Will Mr. Bryan please tell us what the soul has left to carry on into a future world after the passions, appetites and ambitions of this physical life are spent? With most of us the zest of life has fled long before the heart ceases to beat. All the sweets of life turn to ashes, on our lips at last. Years ago Lafcadio Hearne observed that very old persons cared little for the promises of immortality, that all the tired soul seemed to long for is rest. Hearne's observation is correct, and the reason is that very old persons, in annihilation have little to lose, in immortality nothing to gain.

Mr. Bryan holding to the notion that the soul is a "principle" that goes into and out of the body according to its own volition, seems inclined to think also that gravity may be such a "principle." In asking Mr. Dewar to tell him "what gravity is," it may be that he is asking for an explanation of the most elementary fact in nature. Newcomb said that all theories so far offered to account for gravity—were subject to the fatal objection of proposing complicated systems to account for the most simple and elementary fact. It may be that Dr. See's theory of gravity—which seeks to identify that force as a form of electro magnetic energy—will prove correct. If so it will greatly strengthen the monistic theory of the universe. Mr. Bryan is in error, however, when he says that Dr. See's theory of gravity is "at complete variance with all previous theories." That the theory is original with Dr. See I have no doubt, but a theory in some ways similar was enunciated years ago by a couple of young German scientists. Some months ago I spent two days with Dr. See at his home on Mare Island. Much of my time was given to an effort to comprehend his theory as elucidated in manuscript, but the work being largely mathematical I did not get a very comprehensive idea of it. I had hoped to hear of the publication of the work before now.

CHRISTIAN SCIENCE.

From E. Edwin Freeberg, New York.

To the Editor of The Truth Seeker:

Christian Science is new deception for old Christian corruption—Aladdin's new lamps for old ones. They have invented a new precept: "Think not that you are ill and you will not be ill." These neurotic, hysterical, religious epileptics call themselves Mystics. The phenomena of dreams to them are mysterious. We already know that the flow of the blood to the brain is greater during sleep than waking. Therefore the mystery of dreams is solved. Their victims are given the Christian Science treatment. When completed, they become thorough neurotic, hysterical, epileptic, mystic; that is to say, they prey upon their victims until they are mentally infected with hallucinations. They also chatter about truth and love, that God is Love and Love is God. The old Christian system of arithmetic is three times one equals one; the new Christian scientific system of arithmetic is one and one equals one.

Christian Science is the creator of the denial of the will to cure. In reality it preaches the will to destruction, or the will of a still deeper instinct of self destruction. They deny matter. In denying matter why not deny mind? It is true the materialists cannot define matter, neither can the psychologist define mind. Ask the Christian scientists what able. They repeat parrot-like that psychology is the science of the mind. How absurd! Can we have a knowledge of that of which we have not the least conception? This is a new way of deluding the people so as to uphold Christianity. The additional word science does not only deceive Christians, but Jews as well. This new idiotic form of absolute spiritual debauchery is a curse upon all intellect. Will the people ever let go of that old malignant form of falsehood—Christianity—today known as Christian Science? A woman was the founder of this degradation.

THE CASE OF ANDY LOCKHART.

From W. Lloyd Clark, Illinois.

To the Editor of The Truth Seeker:

I am writing to ask you to give as much publicity as possible to the case of Andy Lockhart of Milbank, S. D., editor of Chain Lightning, who has been railroaded to the federal penitentiary on the charge of sending obscene matter through the mails. His sentence was three years, but a letter just received from his sister indicates that he will get a new trial on appeal. Lockhart secured liberty for a Polish woman who shot a priest in St. Paul, the priest having formerly attacked the woman while she was sick in bed. The Knights of Columbus are leading the fight against Lockhart because of his activity in behalf of the unfortunate woman. Lockhart is a young man (26), fine education, able writer, a member of no church, liberal in his views and a loyal friend of humanity. I am writing to the papers that favor free speech and press, hoping that they will unite in a campaign of publicity and if necessary carry this case to the Supreme Court of the United States.

A MIRACLE EXPLAINED.

From V. Sprague, Tennessee.

To the Editor of The Truth Seeker:

"Then the same day at evening, being the first day of the week, when the doors were shut where the disciples were assembled for fear of the Jews, came Jesus, and stood in the midst, and saith unto them, Peace be unto you." (John xx, 19.)

During the past eighteen hundred years, the credulous have looked at this miracle in awe; others with varying degrees of belief. Some think that Jesus did this to show that he was no longer controlled by human conditions but was free to come and go as he willed; even as the wind bloweth where it listeth, thou hearest the sound but canst not tell whence it cometh, or whither it goeth. This feat of Jesus can be equaled by anyone, for is it not written, "So is everyone that is born of the spirit." (John iii, 8.)

The disciples being so afraid of the Jews, not only had the doors shut, but probably bolted. No one, not even Jesus, could have entered without detection. Then, how did he get in the midst? Let us look at this miracle from, as I think, a new point of view and see if it is not reasonable to suppose that he did enter at the same time as they, and was in the room when they shut and bolted the doors, but they were not aware of his presence until later.

There are those that claim that it is only by the vibration of the atoms of an object which causes it to be visible to the eye; that if the vibration ceased or became exceedingly fast, the eye would be unable to detect the object.

As Jesus had a material body after his resurrection (see John xx, 27), it was composed of atoms; so to make himself invisible all he would have to do would be to stop his atoms from vibrating or make them vibrate so swiftly that the eye could not follow; in all probability, Jesus being born of the spirit, had this power.

Seeing his disciples assembling, he thought it a good opportunity to mystify them and thus strengthen their faith by slipping in with them with his atoms at high speed. Then at the desired moment, apply the brakes, and lo! he stood visible in their midst.

SONNET BY H. FRANK.

From Justin Henry Shaw, Maine.

To the Editor of The Truth Seeker:

I am not sure that the enclosed sonnet on Thomas Paine has ever been printed in THE TRUTH SEEKER, because I was not a subscriber in 1911, and I do not remember seeing it mentioned by Mr. Remsburg. I am, therefore, sending it to you. It is worth a place on the front page, with a pretty border.

THOMAS PAINE.

Imperious intellect and dauntless foe
Of fraud in Church or State; immortal friend
Of Man and Champion of Truth; did'st spend
Thy life to spread o'er earth the splendid glow
Of Liberty's bright torch; thy hand did throw
The seed in Freedom's soil that yet would fend
Mankind, and cause a glorious tree to grow,
Whose fruitage ne'er would Despot durst to rend!

Thou first, with cry for Independence, roused
The sluggish councils to their work; thou first Prescribed the Constitution's form, and housed
A People! E'en though vilifiers cursed
Thy fame, to thee our fair Republic owes
Its birth, who stayed it in its natal throes.

Two governments once vied to honor thee,
When like a whirlwind flame, with righteous hate
Of tyrannies, thy love of Liberty
Swept thee to France (her cherished deity)

To help consume the fruit of baneful fate,
And on her blistered soil uphold the Free,
Who hoped to found like ours a People's State,
Redeemed from Monarch's sway on land and sea.

'Twas not thy destiny the world's acclaim
To hear; naught but the curse of crowns and smirch

Of infamy, the prison-cell, and shame
Of felon's fate (by grace of state and church)

Were thine, who help'dst benighted Man to free;

Who, freed, disdained thee with indignity.
—HENRY FRANK in The Story of America,
Sketched in Sonnets.

THE "RETIRED" MINISTER.

From E. G. Berridge, Oklahoma.

To the Editor of The Truth Seeker:

I will begin by saying there is no such person. When he becomes incapacitated for active exhortations, he usually seeks a political job through the influence of an alliance made while creating a factional disagreement in some community over some such trivial question as the closing of pool halls at dusk, or at an earlier hour, or perhaps putting the ban on newsstands remaining open on Sunday.

The movement on foot, bearing the above misnomer, has for its goal the pensioning of preachers, after a certain amount of time spent in the pulpit; it is a Protestant creation, equaling, almost, the forcible levying of tribute by the papal powers of medieval times, and was doubtless of "divine" inspiration, first suggested by some decrepit preacher-politician, who didn't believe what he preached, and was not artful enough to conceal the fact from the laity, who failed to support him in his indolence as a punishment for his crudeness in the gentle art of abstracting a competence from a gullible public.

At any rate, one of the denominations boasts that seven million dollars of its intended fifteen millions have already been subscribed; another that it has cornered two and a half millions in its first year of conquest. The Methodists have Oklahoma booked for a donation of a hundred thousand bills—the same kind as Bill Sunday—Dollar Bills. Evidently the "lambs" have digested the axiom of a doubtful divinity, that it is more blessed to give than to receive; but I haven't heard of any minister stating that he intended to refuse the glittering idol.

"O ye of little faith!" Doubt ye that your god will provide for you in your old age? Will he not recognize the chosen ones among all the hosts of unchosen ones? "Behold the lily of the field, which toils not, neither does it spin, yet Solomon in all his glory was not arrayed like one of these." Ye divines, do ye not preach that this "parable" when "explained" means that the "glad rags" and crown and all the rest are to be the "rewards" in an after-life? Why, then, do ye seek them here? Have ye sought vainly the "kingdom of God and his righteousness," that ye fear for the fulfillment of "his" promises?

An ordained minister—a distinction to distinguish him from the laity—meaning the common people—is the most active advocate of the new process for painless extraction that I have yet heard of. Shades of Rufus Wallingford, here are rivals worthy of your fame, who receive it not. This minister says in the newspaper puff accompanying his photograph (a crowd-getter, by the way), that the movement is a conception of the laity. The statement was necessary, I suppose, to offset any suspicion that it was originated by the humble, unassuming ministry.

There are so many other ways that these millions could be better used, (aside from the inconsistency of the proposition), that it is useless to name more than one. There are thousands of suffering mites of humanity in this nation, who would not become such if they had proper food to eat, and enough of it. Untold numbers of the surviving ones become mental degenerates as a result of sickness-weakened bodies, while thousands of men, who have lived their lives in hungerless homes, rest their minds from reading a book, which plainly tells them, "In the sweat of thy face shalt thou eat bread." But they skip this and that and tell the unsophisticated that they are following the teachings of a divinity. Away with divinity; help humanity!

Martyrdom of Man

By Winwood Reade

The author of this book was a nephew of Charles Reade, the novelist. He was a traveler and observer, and his discoveries were freely cited by Darwin among the facts adduced in support of the Darwinian theory of the Origin of Species, the Descent of Man, etc. The Martyrdom of Man, in which Mr. Reade rejects the doctrine of a personal Creator, is a synopsis of universal history showing the martyrdom of the race to Religion, War, and Tyranny. It is a standard work and in steady demand. Our edition (the twelfth) is the popular edition. The work is now so well known that it needs no advertising. The announcement that we have it is sufficient.

Portrait and Biographical Sketch.

Postpaid, $1.

THE OLD TESTAMENT

By Chilperic Edwards

This little volume disposes completely of the notion of divine revelation. It shows what modern criticism has done with the Old Testament canon and analyzes in detail the separate books of the collection.

Price, cloth, 45 cents.

Address THE TRUTH SEEKER,
47 Nassau St. New York

APOCRYPHAL NEW TESTAMENT.

Being all the Gospels, Epistles, and other pieces now extant, attributed in the first four centuries to Jesus Christ, his Apostles, and their companions, and not included in the New Testament by its compilers. Illustrated. Cloth, $1.50.

CHILDREN'S CORNER FOR BOYS AND GIRLS YOUNG AND OLD

"Between the dark and the daylight,
When the night is beginning to lower,
Comes a pause in the day's occupations
That is known as the Children's Hour."

FREETHOUGHT CALENDAR.

CONDUCTED BY FRANKLIN STEINER.
Edward A. Stevens, June 8, 1844.

Col. Edward A. Stevens is one of the most gallant of Freethought workers. While not a colonel in that he ever held a commission as such, yet having seen military service on two continents, possibly the title is due him more than it is to many who got it officially. He was born in Mirfield, Yorkshire, England, June 8, 1844. When a youth he ran away from home to join a detachment of Garibaldi's army called "Garibaldi's Englishmen," commanded by Colonel Peard. His cousin was second in command, having sold his commission in the British army that he might join the expedition. Young Stevens saw some severe hand-to-hand fighting himself, while his cousin was mortally wounded during the bombardment of Palermo by the Neapolitans, and died May 30, 1860. The officers of the company then determined to send the young man home to England, much to his chagrin.

Heretical ideas on the subject of religion took root in his mind even in youth. His Protestant relatives of different denominations tried to instill their doctrines and dogmas, but he could not retain them. His education was derived chiefly from travel, observation and experience. When he arrived in England the American Civil War was in full blast, and with strong anti-slavery feeling he determined to go over and take part in the conflict. He landed in America, and after visiting a brother in Canada went to Buffalo, N. Y., where he enlisted in the 187th New York Volunteers. That regiment distinguished itself, or, as Colonel Stevens himself says, "in its first fight was almost extinguished, for it ran right into a masked battery of six guns." He served in the first division, second brigade of the Fifth Army Corps. That division was selected by General Grant to "receive" the surrender of Lee's army at Appomattox, as it suffered the heaviest loss of any in the Army of the Potomac.

When the war was over Colonel Stevens returned to his trade, that of a printer. He expanded himself into a writer, an editor and a publisher, in all of which he was successful. Becoming interested in labor questions, in 1876 he joined the Knights of Labor, and on his refusal to take the oath prescribed was received on his honor. He also held a number of important offices in the Typographical Union. While always a Freethinker, he became actively interested in the movement in 1881, when in Chicago he organized a branch of the National Liberal League, into which he threw his whole strength. In 1886, when the League's name was changed to "The American Secular Union," Colonel Stevens was elected national secretary, a position to which he was re-elected in 1887 and 1888. Above all things he was a worker. He is by nature active, never idle in mind or body. He brought the Secular Union to its highest point of efficiency and made it a power that the church felt. One of his activities as secretary was the suit against the Roman Catholic archbishop of Chicago for receiving public funds for sectarian institutions, in which he was sustained by the Appellate Court, costing the Roman Catholic church $60,000 in the three years it operated. Then occurred same gerrymandering to avoid the letter of the law, and they have been receiving public funds since, though another citation has lately been filed against them. Stevens had a census made of all church property in the city of Chicago which was published in THE TRUTH SEEKER at that time. He raised in less than three weeks the $1,500 pledged for the Bruno monument in Rome, and secured the funds for a prize for the best book on morals—one that should outclass the Bible—as a text book for teachers. When he resigned in 1889 it was with the regret of all supporters of the Union. His salary as secretary was small, and while holding the position he was obliged to draw upon his own private resources. He accepted a new position with Enoch Morgan's Sons, the manufacturers of Sapolio, and was soon recognized as one of their best salesmen. Not only in that respect were his services valuable. This firm advertises extensively. Here the versatile talents of Colonel Stevens as a writer and speaker came into play. He made it a point to attend the banquets of Grocers' Associations, where he was always the principal speaker, ending his address with an original poem.

A recent number of the New England Grocer and Tradesman devotes about half a column to Colonel Stevens. It says: "There is no limit to the vitality, vigor and pep of Colonel Stevens. We recall many pleasant associations with him in Dallas, Texas; in Denver, Colorado; in Little Rock, Arkansas; in St. Louis, in Boston and elsewhere. He is a genial gentleman of the old school."

He remained with this firm for twenty-five years, after which long and active service he was retired. His present home is in Chicago.

Colonel Stevens is a good gentleman with a big brain and a big heart. While very positive in his convictions, like a true Freethinker he grants to others the same right to their convictions that he claims for himself. He is a member of the Knights of the Maccabees and the Grand Army of the Republic, in which latter organization he has held many posts of honor. He is now secretary of the National Association of Vicksburg Veterans, in which capacity he is engaged in working up a reunion of the Vicksburg veterans of both the Union and Confederate armies, to be held on the field of battle next October. Congress has appropriated $150,000 for the success of the enterprise.

Colonel Stevens has often been requested to write the memoirs of his eventful life. Unfortunately his papers were destroyed some years ago in a Chicago fire, and on many things he does not feel like trusting to his memory. He was married in 1889 to Mrs. Ella Stiles. Mrs. Stevens is not only a Freethinker, but a splendid woman and a delightful hostess.

Other events of which the past week is the anniversary are:

- June 3, Prof. E. L. Youmans born, 1821.
- D. I. Eaton, tried for selling Paine's works, acquitted, 1793. T. C. Leland died, 1885.
- June 4, Williams found guilty of publishing the "Age of Reason," 1794.
- June 5, D. M. Bennett sentenced to thirteen months' imprisonment and $300 fine for mailing "Cupid's Yokes," 1879.
- June 6, Patrick Henry died, 1799. Jeremy Bentham died, 1832.
- June 7, Hosea Ballou, founder of Universalism in this country, died, 1852. Prohibitory liquor law enacted in Maine, 1858.
- June 8, George Sand (Amanthine L. A. Dupin) died, 1876. Andrew Jackson died, 1845.
- June 9, Thomas Paine died, 1809. Charles Dickens died, 1870. Statue of Darwin unveiled in the London Museum of Natural History, 1885.

A Billion Dollars.

The large sum represented by the term "a billion dollars," now being so frequently used in the war financing of this and other countries, is illustrated by a statement recently made before the class in international trade and commercial geography in the educational department of the National City Bank of New York.

"In these discussions of international trade," said the lecturer, "in which we must talk in terms of millions and billions, it will be important that we get clearly in mind the relative value of these two great measures of quantity. The Treasury experts will count 4,000 silver dollars in an hour and keep it up all day long, but that is their limit. Working eight hours a day, then, an expert counter of coins, will count 32,000 silver dollars in a day, but how long will it take him, at that rate, to count a million dollars? Thirty-one days.

"But that is only the beginning of the measurement of great figures, for if this same man were to go on counting silver dollars at the same rate of speed for ten years he would find that he had only counted one hundred million of them and that to count a billion dollars would require 102 years of steady work at the rate of eight hours a day every working day of the 102 years. So when I begin to talk to you of billions of dollars in the measurement of our commerce or that of the world please remember that a billion is a thousand times as much as a million.

"Another illustration of the large number represented by the term 'billion' is found in the fact that one billion silver dollars laid down in a line, each coin touching its neighbor preceding and following it, would form a line sufficient to stretch practically around the world, the exact number of silver dollars required to form a continuous line equal to the earth's circumference at the equator being 1,052,000,000.

"It is only within a comparatively recent date that the United States became a billion dollar country. Speaker Reed coined this phrase: 'The United States has become a billion dollar country,' when somebody complained of the fact that a certain Congress of which he was then Speaker had apportioned over a billion dollars for Government expenses during its two years of existence, but no single year now passes in which appropriations do not exceed a billion dollars.

"It was only in 1892 that exports of domestic merchandise from the United States first crossed the billion dollar line. By 1911 they exceeded two billions, in the calendar year 1914 were three billions, in 1915 three and a half billions. The money in circulation in the United States first crossed the billion dollar line in 1881, but was two billions in 1900, three billions in 1908, four billions in 1915 and $5,415,000,000 on May 1, 1917."

Names of Romance.

Around the good world's wide expanse
Are places great and small,
Whose names fair tingle with romance—
And I would see them all:
There's Cairo, Fez, and Ispahan,
Bangkok and Singapore,
And Trebizonde and Cagayan,
And Rio and Lahore.

There's Sarawak and Callao,
Algiers and Kandahar,
Khartum, Rangoon, and Tokyo,
Bombay and Zanzibar;
About the name of each there clings
Enchantment's golden veil,
The wonder of strange folk and things,
The glamor of the trail!

For some are north and some are south
And some are east and west,
And some are curst with heat and drouth
And some with balm are blessed;
But Capetown, Rhodes, or Disco Bay,
Shanghai, Seville, or Rome,
Their names come singing down the way,
To tempt me forth from home,
Their magic's ringing down the way,
To lure me forth from home!

—Berton Braley.

Answered.

Supercilious Youth (to trolley conductor): "Is that Noah's Ark full yet?"
"Yes, all but the monkey. Jump in."

From Schoolboy "Exams."

Walter Scott was imprisoned in the Tower because he could not pay his debts; while there he wrote the Waverley Novels, but he was afterward burnt alive; he also brought tobacco from Virginia, so called after his beloved mistress Queen Elizabeth.

James I. claimed the throne of England through his grandmother because he had no father.

The attempts at colonization in Elizabeth's reign were that Raleigh brought smoking into England and had a bucket of cold water thrown on him, and Drake discovered potatoes round the world and planted them in Lancashire.

Henry the First's son, William, was drowned in the White Ship and never smiled again.

The Pope called Henry VIII. "Fido the Offensive."

Joan of Arc lived in the French Revolution, and one day she fell into the arms of the English and got burnt.

By eating slowly food is digested before it is swallowed and thus enriches the blood, which goes down one leg and up the other.

Things which are impossible are equal to one another.

The present Primate of England is Mr. Lloyd George.

Poetry is a thing you make prose out of.

The laws are made by Lloyd George or else by the policeman.

The daylight saving act shortened the day by an hour.

When a drunken man sees what a fool he has been and is going to turn over a new leaf he is called a reformer. John Wycliff was a reformer.

A proofreader on an English newspaper contributes some compositors' "howlers." They are garnered from first proofs and are mainly the result of the compositor's struggles with bad writing. "Suppression of the spread of pernicious publicans" is a fairly obvious misprint for "publications." "Swinburne courted the nurse in the garden in the early morning, and thus set a good example to the other poets," is bewildering until one remembers the likeness of "nurse" and "muse" in some handwritings. "French mermaids 4½d. a yard" should have been "merinos."

Practice Makes Perfect.

A young Burnley weaver was taking her little baby to church to be christened.

Its father had been in the trenches for three months, and it was impossible for him to get home for the ceremony.

The baby smiled up beautifully into the minister's face.

"Well, madam," said the minister, "I must congratulate you on your little one's behavior. I have christened two thousand babies, but I never christened one that behaved so well as yours."

The young mother smiled demurely, and said:

"His grandad and me hev' bin practisin' wi' him fer a week wi' a bucket of water!"

Not Interesting.

Little Irene marched into the room breathless.

"O mother, don't scold me for being late for supper, because I've had such a disappointment," she said. "A horse fell down and they said they were going to send for a horse doctor, so I waited and waited, and what do you think? It wasn't a horse doctor at all. It was only a man."

Tied Outside.

Little Jack's mother was very fond of flowers. One day he ran in with a great armful of white roses and violets. "Why, Jack," said she in alarm, "It's a wreath; where did you get it?" "I got it off the doorbell next door, mamma," answered little Jack. "I guess they put it there 'cause they didn't want it any more."

Not in Character.

"Fevther," said little Mickey, "wasn't it Patrick Henry that said, 'Let us have peace?'"

"Niver," said old Mickey. "Nobody by the name of Patrick iver said anything like thot."

THE LETTER BOX.

J. WOLTERS, Michigan.—In arguing with persons who want to introduce religion in the schools, fortify yourself with the pamphlet (10 cents) entitled "The Fourth Demand," to which is added a legal decision on the Bible in schools. It will have an effect on the open-minded.

S. C. MUSGRAVE, West Virginia.—You say you have been reading THE TRUTH SEEKER for years, and now it is our turn to read some of your stuff. When you put it that way, you appeal to the sound old saying that one good return deserves another. Hence your "Pebbles and Pansies" shall command our perusal. We have no doubt the reading will be its own reward, so that we shall remain your debtor.

W. P. KYLE, Texas.—A copy of THE TRUTH SEEKER has been sent to Brother Shrewsbury, former president of the Agnostic Association of America. We do not remember President Shrewsbury, nor any association of the name given, but doubtless it is all right. Prof. Charles Wesley Waddell is another party to whom we are glad to be introduced, not having met his name before, to the best of our recollection, but memory is treacherous these later years. Thank you for your interesting letter and the remittance.

T. J. BOWLES, M. D., Indiana.—Your letter, according to your hope, finds us "as happy as a Rationalist can be with the rivers of the earth running red with blood." Such happiness as may be felt in the circumstances is not enhanced by parting with an eldest son who this day dons the khaki as a volunteer in the corps of engineers enlisted for construction work abroad. We are not complaining. It was the only thing to do. We live under the protection of the American flag, which would lose its potency if the protection were not reciprocal.

H. S., Wisconsin.—There are versions of Lincoln's Gettysburg address that contain the theological allusion "under God." Lincoln had pious advisers who doubtless called his attention to his omission of the religious note from the original and prompted him to put God in. The first draft of the speech was printed in fac simile in the Century Magazine for February, 1894, to which all disputants may be referred. Its genuineness is attested by Lincoln's secretary, Nicolay. The existence of the two drafts, one with and the other without the word "God," leaves people to take their choice. Those who want God in theirs will pick the version printed in the Ladies' Home Journal.

M. E. L., Iowa.—It would be repetitious for THE TRUTH SEEKER to print an article contradicting the author or authors who have faked up a list of dying words of Infidels. The pious believe in those inventions just as they do in the last words of Jesus. They are matters of faith, and it is a form of heresy to doubt them, or to believe that any Infidel can die without waiting. There was a Christian father who said he believed in the creed of the church because it was impossible. The more apparent the impossibility, the more patent the falsehood, the more merit the credulous take to themselves for believing it. Such being the case, it is of course useless to oppose belief with fact. There is no theological merit in believing facts. The heavenly rewards are all offered for accepting what humanly speaking are lies.

THE CHRISTIAN MYTHOLOGY

A Work that Traces the Principal Features of the Christian Religion to Their Source in the Mythologies of Older Religions.

By BRIGHAM LEATHERBEE

Illustrated.

A feature of the work is the uncovering of the phallic principles in Christianity, to which the key is given in a series of illustrations.

"The Christian Mythology" is printed on light but substantial paper, convenient in size, handsomely bound in cloth, with gold sidestamp, and is provided with a sufficient index and a Bibliography that guides the reader to works drawn upon as authorities. The unpretentious little volume will bring light to thousands who know nothing about the origin of the dogmas they believe or the rites they practice.

Published by

The Truth Seeker Co.
62 Vesey Street - New York

Price, 75 cents

The Ingersoll Birthday Book

Selections by
GRACE LELAND MACDONALD

(Mrs. G. E. Macdonald)
Preface by EVA INGERSOLL-BROWN.
(Granddaughter of Ingersoll)
Decorations by PAUL F. BERDANIER.

Cover by HUGH HENNESSY.

Printed in Color, on Cameo Plate Coated
Sepia Paper, 252 pages, Octavo.
Descriptive Circular sent free on application.

PRICE, $1.65 POSTPAID
The Truth Seeker Company
62 Vesey Street, New York

This Is the Book We Have Been Waiting For

The Belief In God and Immortality

A STATISTICAL STUDY

By JAMES H. LEUBA
Professor of Psychology and Pedagogy in Bryn Mawr College.

The work is the result of an inquiry among men of science — biologists, sociologists, historians, psychologists — as to whether they believe or want to believe in a prayer-answering God and in continuance of life after death. The answer is altogether different from what might be expected in view of the frequent affirmations of the supernaturalists that belief in Christianity, or at least its fundamental dogmas, is held by the majority of the men of science.

It puts into the hands of Freethinkers exactly the information they want on that subject, with the facts and figures verifying it.

As a logical conclusion, founded upon the general aspect of the case, we have held that science leads its votaries to a rejection of such undemonstrable propositions as the existence of gods and the survival of the "soul" when the body is dead. Here we have the evidence, in statistical form, which confirms our view.

To the inquiry into the attitude of the scientists there are added statistics regarding the thought of college students regarding the same religious dogmas.

The author is himself a man of science, an authority in his special branch, which is Psychology, and he knows and sets forth the origin and history of the beliefs with which he deals.

No recent book has attracted more attention from the press, or presented such a serious problem to the supernaturalists.

Cloth, 8vo., $2, postpaid
Sold by

The Truth Seeker Company
62 Vesey Street, New York

MIRACLES OF SCIENCE. A Record of Scientific Progress in This Century. By Henry Smith Williams. Price $2. Postage 15 cents.

The Candle from Under the Bushel

(Mark iv, 21); or,

1,306 Questions to the Clergy

And for the Consideration of Others.

Instructive, Interesting, and Laughable.

By WILLIAM HART

Price, paper, 50 cents; cloth, $1.00.

Address THE TRUTH SEEKER CO.

MYTH AND LEGEND IN THE BIBLE.

By Keighley Snowden.

A valuable handbook for those who desire to keep handy a clear statement of the most assured results of modern thought as applied to the critical examination of the Bible.

Price, cloth, $1.50.

Address, THE TRUTH SEEKER CO.
62 Vesey St., New York.

The Influence of the Church
on

Marriage AND Divorce

By JOSEPH McCABE

Marriage law reform is a subject which is likely to assume greater prominence in the near future. There does not exist in English a complete study of the historical influence of the church on marriage. The lack is supplied by Mr. McCabe's new book, which deals fully with the Roman and medieval systems and the modern humanist development.

PRICE, CLOTH, $1.75

The Truth Seeker Co.
62 Vesey St. - New York, N. Y.

THE CASE OF BILLY SUNDAY

A complete exposure of the greatest charlatan of the age, exhibiting his coarse vulgarity in the pulpit, his medieval theology, his insane bigotry, his vulgar abusiveness, and his fundamental dishonesty. Contains the famous parallel columns showing his stealings from Ingersoll, and presents unanswerable proof of the deliberate falsehoods with which he has sought to turn aside exposure. Now is the time to circulate this most effective of all propaganda documents by the hundreds and thousands.

PRICE, FIVE CENTS

For sale by

THE TRUTH SEEKER
62 Vesey Street, New York City

SELF-CONTRADICTIONS OF THE BIBLE. By W. H. Burr. One hundred and forty-four propositions embodying the most palpable and striking self-contradictions of the Bible with a summary. Price 15 cents.

THE FOURTH DEMAND. Religious Teaching in Public Schools, with Reasons Why It Should Be Abolished. By Woolsey Teller. This is a fresh and up-to-date discussion of the subject. Price. 10 cents.

DESIGN ARGUMENT. Anatomically and Physiologically Considered. By an East Indian. Per copy, 10 cents; fifteen copies, $1.

ANTICHRIST. By Ernest Renan. Paper, 50 cents; cloth, $1.00.

The R. P. A. ANNUAL 1917

LIST OF CONTRIBUTIONS:

RELIGION AFTER THE WAR
Arnold Bennett

WILL ORTHODOX CHRISTIANITY SURVIVE THE WORLD WAR?

An attempt at Forecast by Representative Humanists: Sir Ray Lankester, Leonard Huxley, John A. Robson, Sir Bryan Donkin, Hon. John Collier, Professor J. B. Bury, Henry W. Nevins, Sir H. H. Johnston, H. de Vere Stacpoole, and Right Hon. J. M. Robertson, M.P.

THEOLOGY AND THE WAR..
William Archer

THE GREATEST ILLUSION..
Adam Gowans Whyte

PRE-ANIMISM...Edward Clodd

THE NEOLITH: A POEM.....
Eden Phillpotts

THE PAPACY DURING THE RENAISSANCE

Joseph McCabe

WATCHMAN, WHAT OF THE NIGHT? ...Charles T. Gorham

Sold at

THE TRUTH SEEKER OFFICE

Or sent postpaid for
40 cents per copy

TENTH EDITION. Crimes of Preachers

A RECORD OF THE CLERGY WHO HAVE COMMITTED CRIMES AND IMMORALITIES.

As was said of previous editions, the record is startlingly instructive and will open the eyes of the people, proving as it does that in thousands of cases the Bible and the Christian religion have totally failed to keep even their expounders from committing acts of grossest immorality and deeds of darkest crime.

Cover in colors. 247 pages.

PRICE, 35 CENTS

Address, THE TRUTH SEEKER CO.
62 Vesey St., New York.

Is The Bible Worth Reading? And Other Essays

By LEMUEL K. WASHBURN

Price, postpaid, $1.

Address THE TRUTH SEEKER
62 Vesey St., New York.

DEPARTMENT OF ECONOMICS.

Some Phases of Business.

The controversy between Mr. Martin and myself shows a tendency toward acidity which is not at all desirable and will not produce knowledge; and if it does not produce knowledge it is wasting valuable space in the paper.

Mr. Martin took exception to my remarks about the Eight Hour Law for railroaders, and in effect it amounted to a statement that the law would be found unconstitutional. In this he was mistaken, for the Supreme Court has ruled that the law is constitutional, and it has thereby removed some of my remarks from the realm of the absurd and the false. The future will show then that if the government can regulate wages it can also regulate prices, and both of these things will be removed from the class of arbitrary charges and will be determined by the law of supply and demand, and not as now, by strong arm methods on the part of those who are in position to set the price for commodity or for labor.

It has been my experience in the discussion of these questions that the contender for capitalism finally takes refuge in the position that one is entitled to a fair return on capital invested. No fair-minded person finds fault with this. But the fact remains that the average capitalist figures that a "fair return" means all that the traffic will bear. When he considers labor's end of the argument he takes the position of dangling a ration before the eyes of a starving man. "You take this or starve—we can get along without you," is the ideal argument of the average capitalist. When Mr. Martin says "if the railroads' earnings did increase $12,000,000 in a twelvemonth it would mean only about 1 per cent. on the investment," his statement is inexact because the railroads, every time they are smoked out, are proved to be losing their dividends on capitalization and not on capital invested. In other words, they howl for dividends on what does not exist.

I base my opposition to the capitalist system upon the fact that for the amount of wealth produced by the workers each year they receive in return a very small part in the form of wages. The idea that I get from this is that some get what they never earned and the majority earn much which they never get.

I have yet to meet a business man who will not take an unfair advantage of the workingman when he gets the chance, and as a rule he is the first one who howls when the worker loafs a little on the job. Mr. Martin and his incomes or his little investments cut no figure in the argument. The point I tried to bring out is that Mr. Martin has never yet, so far as I have read him, taken the part of the great throng of workers who are being skinned out of the product of their toil, but he is always ready to defend the "vested interests." He is always harping on abiding by the dictum of some great authority and putting such authorities on a pedestal to be worshiped, and for these reasons I class him as a stand patter and a conservative and in no sense a radical or Freethinker.

In his latest remarks he holds Robert Ingersoll up as a shield and quotes his remarks on railroads with a finality that is amusing. Ingersoll was in many ways one of the world's greatest men and on theological questions he receives my deepest respect and admiration, but he was not omniscient, and he was human, and therefore liable to err the same as Mr. Martin or myself.

I can remember the disturbance that set up among the Freethinkers when Ingersoll took his place with the McKinley and Mark Hanna crowd, and personally I disagreed with him there and never regretted it. I stood for Bryan until I saw that Bryan was not sincere in his profession of radicalism and only sought personal glory at the hands of an outraged people.

Again, Ingersoll was wrong, so I think, when he wrote Liberty for Man, Woman and Child.

Had he been situated as the majority of fathers are, with a family to raise to the satisfaction of the outside world and on a limited wage, he would have realized that other methods are sometimes necessary than those he advocated.

President Wilson is nearer right on that question, for he says there are some children, especially boys, whose conscience can only be reached through the cuticle.

We are having this brought home to us to-day in the war with Germany. To illustrate this I will relate an incident. A man under influence of drink started a family row which soon spread to the street. As the row progressed, with the drunken man victorious, he extended his "zone of frightfulness" and placed himself in the middle of the street and threatened disaster to any one who passed. He declared a man had a right to defend himself and would look upon any one who approached as a possible enemy.

That's the German idea. They set out to rule the world; their plans miscarry and then they declare that they are fighting for their existence and map out a zone over which nothing or nobody can pass, and are surprised and pained when others take exception to being murdered.

If Ingersoll had had some children to raise such as other parents have had he would finally agree that Wilson was right.

We have cases in the courts of law all over this country which show up the "innocent" railroads in their true light. There are cases pending in the courts of Ohio now wherein the operators of coal mines charge that the railroads refused to furnish cars except when their demands for their own coal at $1.35 a tone had been met.

Old Vanderbilt of course was innocent when he coined the phrase "the public be damned."

Mr. Martin argued the question of monopoly with Dr. Holt and contended that there is no such thing in this country. I have an idea that Mr. Martin is right technically, but as a matter of fact he is wrong and is arguing simply for the sake of argument.

The Standard Oil Company is a monopoly. Any one can enter the oil business, as Mr. Martin says, but if he does not conform to the Standard dictation he can't remain.

Four years ago gasoline was 20 cents a gallon in Cleveland. A man got the idea of leasing ground in different parts of the city and selling gasoline at 15 cents, buying from some independents in Pennsylvania. He started to raise capital for his company and before he was ready to open his first station gas went down to 13 cents a gallon from the Standard Oil Company, and this discouraged the young man. The Standard went right ahead. It leased all the available places, built service stations and then it began putting the price right up to where it is to-day.

Every city that has a street car line harbors a monopoly and in Ohio the street car crowd had the laws so worded that a new company could not get a chance. A very wise man, Tom Johnson, assisted by a favorable circumstance, found a way to break the back of an air-tight monopoly in Cleveland, but the monopoly exists yet with a few air holes in its armor.

There are many virtual monopolies in America, but technically Mr. Martin is right. There is no special dispensation giving any particular institution absolute monopoly; but the fact remains that certain big fellows dictate to the rest, who live by sufferance.

We call this a republic where the "people rule," and all have equal rights and all are free, but as a matter of fact the individual has no chance at all when it comes to a defense of his individual rights unless his purse is as long or longer than the other fellow's. The Christian claims that salvation is free, but no one claimed that justice is free in this country.

I cited Henry Ford as an example in the question of long or short hours, also related an experience I had with a hard-headed, "practical" business man, but Mr. Martin still classes my remarks on this head as absurdities. I have had considerable experience with these hard-headed, practical business men and I can testify to the hard-headedness if not for the rest.

The Agricultural Department of the United States Government is busy boring holes into the heads of hard-headed, practical farmers with a view to getting a few modern ideas planted, and experts in many lines are doing their level best to get other hard heads out of the ruts they have been following.

Here is a fine example: My first employer had a large steam laundry. He employed 125 girls and had 10 delivery wagons. Our working hours were from 7 a. m. to 8.30 p. m. and all night Friday each week.

We turned out $2,000 in laundry work each week. This man had a friend in the same business in another city. This friend had as large a business but he employed only 80 girls and the number of wagons the same as my employer. The working hours in this man's plant were 7 a. m. to 6 p. m. and half a day on Saturday. That hard-headed, practical employer of mine never saw the light which his friend kept burning.

To my personal knowledge eight young men graduated from the first plant and started in business for themselves, and every one of those hard-headed, practical men adopted the long hours of their former employer—for the same reason that many people are Christians—because they were born that way. GEO. H. LONG.

The Daughter Sings.—"Don't you think her voice is improved?"
"Perhaps, but not cured."—Life.

HELL.

Somewhere within the famous Keystone State

I nightly pass in walking to my home
The office of a man who deals in coal.
Within his window there may be observed
An advertisement that is quite unique,
An imitation of a flowing fire
So realistic in its red and black
That one feels warm to merely look at it,
But on inspection it is found to be
Mere painted glass through which electric light
Shines brightly forth between the lumps
Of coal.

"Well, now," I mused when last I saw the sight,
"This is exactly what is left of Hell,"

The old-time fire that in my younger days
I had been taught forever blazed and roared,

Yet grew no less whatever heat it made,
And swelled no more however it was fed
By wicked souls since Cain and Abel's day.

Some decades since I noticed that the hole
That had been circumstantially described
By such as Dante, Milton and their kind,
In words immortal as the alphabet
Was shrinking fast and surely to the minds
Of scientific searchers of the type
Of Huxley, Darwin, Spencer, and of those Who dared to think unhampered for themselves.

'Tis true that mercenary mountebanks
Like Billy Sunday, with his slush and slang,
Still find it pays to keep the church aflame
With pious fire and fury-laden gas;
Believing with the ancient Scottish dame
Who said the Kirk that did not have a deil
In her opinion was not worth a damn.
'Tis also true that thrifty clergymen
Fought long and bravely for Gehenna's life,

And here and there a few may still be found

Who preach of Sheol or of Hades prate.
But for the masses of our present age
The fires of Hell are but a poet's dream,
A flower of speech, a daub of ruddy paint,
Gone with old Harry and his three-pronged fork,
His horns of horror and his cloven feet,
With not enough of ashes left to glow
Unless considered as a fairy tale.

The place of torment once so widely feared
As Pandemonium, Tartarus, the Pit,
Inferno, Limbo, Tophet, Styx, or Hell,
By evolution of the human heart
And education of the human brain
Now bears the sign "These premises to let";

For in the scheme Efficiency demands
From all who hope to do their utmost here,
There is no room nor reason to permit
A realm created by the imps of Fear.
And should there be one soul who still believes

In lakes of fire and brimstone never quenched,

When they apply the penetrating torch
Of Reason's light to analyze the flames
They will discover but a painted cloth,
A tinted glass, a highly colored film,
The phantom fancy of a cunning knave
Who fain would try his fellows to enslave.
L. A. W.

CONSERVING VITAL RESOURCES.

The inclosed article is undoubtedly the most important announcement that the National Board of Underwriters has ever made. While the technical and administrative features of the campaign are already well organized, the cooperation of the general public is highly necessary for its complete success.

We sincerely hope that this campaign will appeal to THE TRUTH SEEKER as worthy of journalistic support. We shall greatly appreciate a marked copy of any reference that the editor may make to this matter, or to the subject of fire prevention in general.
W. E. MALLALIEU,
General Manager.

The War-Time Necessity of Fire Prevention.

Since the first publication of the statement that The National Board of Fire Underwriters had undertaken an extensive work of wartime conservation in the service of the federal government, there have been many inquiries from those desiring particulars. While some of the work is of a somewhat confidential nature, it is believed that a brief outline of certain phases may now with propriety be given.

Every day furnishes increased evidence that the world is racing with starvation. It is a crime against humanity to allow the usual percentage of fires in grain elevators and other places of storage to be continued. The National Board, therefore, has been working out extensive plans for providing fire protection, as distinguished from mere fire indemnity, for all elevators, flour mills, potato and onion warehouses, and other food repositories in the United States.

To this end, President Bissell has appointed local sub-committees in New York, Chicago, Philadelphia, Boston, San Francisco, Minneapolis-St. Paul, Atlanta, New Orleans and Dallas. These committees have already entered into active cooperation with the Governors, State councils of defense, committees of safety, fire marshals and the financial and commercial interests of their localities, particularly with committees of grain dealers' associations, representative owners, etc.

Their activities are of a far reaching nature, involving inspections, the correction of structural hazards and the promotion of careful methods, including cleanliness.

The vast annual loss of food staples through fire has long been recognized as very largely preventable, but there never before has been such an opportunity for bringing about a widespread campaign of conservation. The successful fruits of this campaign should preserve the living for unnumbered thousands whose food requirements would be destroyed were the fire loss to remain as usual.

But little less important is the conservation of the cotton crop—that great staple whose employment in the manufacture of explosives, as well as in fabrics, makes it an indispensable war-time necessity. The United States is the source of a large part of the world's supply, and it is vitally important that this supply should not be diminished through fire. The burden of this responsibility falls especially upon the committees in Dallas, New Orleans and Atlanta, although shared to some degree by those in other cities. In this work, as well, the closest cooperation is maintained with all local authorities and interested organizations.

The protection of coal properties, including breakers, tipples, etc.; of fertilizer works; of saw mills and of piers and wharves, are important divisions of the work undertaken. With the growing probability that every ounce of the nation's strength may be required, it would be intolerable to continue the drain of preventable fires in these vital resources. Each one of them, therefore, is being made the subject of the closest study and most active effort in a great fire prevention campaign, the like of which the world has never known.

This campaign is enlisting the services of approximately four thousand trained fire prevention engineers, inspectors, surveyors, and appraisers located in every part of the country, as well as of numerous supplementary insurance organizations, and an army of officials, leagues, committees and associations, all coordinated into a single movement, working earnestly for the nation's safety.

"Cursed by the Past: Blessed by the Future"

REMSBURG'S LATEST WORK

Thomas PaineThe Apostle of Liberty

BY JOHN E. REMSBURG

This is the Great Address delivered by Remsburg in Chicago last year, pronounced a masterpiece of thrilling oratory. To the Address is added

The Testimony of Five Hundred Witnesses.

This list of the names and words of eminent persons in all walks of life who have praised Paine is a revelation even to his admirers and students, and the eulogy of Remsburg is unsurpassed.

220 Pages; 12mo, Paper, 50 Cents

Published and sold by

THE TRUTH SEEKER CO.
62 Vesey St. - New York

DYNAMIC THEORY OF LIFE AND MIND. By James B. Alexander. An Attempt to show that all Organic Beings are Both Constructed and Operated by the Dynamic Agencies of their respective Environments. Over 400 illustrations, 87 chapters, 1,057 pages, and a 3-column index of 11 pages. Price, express prepaid, $2.75.

SEVENTH EDITION — REDUCED PRICE

BIBLE MYTHS

AND THEIR PARALLELS IN OTHER RELIGIONS

Being a Comparison of the Old and New Testament Myths and Miracles with those of Heathen Nations of Antiquity

CONSIDERING ALSO THEIR ORIGIN AND MEANING. WITH NUMEROUS ILLUSTRATIONS.

IT is a perfect Encyclopedia on the subjects treated, containing a vast amount of out-of-the-way knowledge not accessible to the majority of readers, and all the objections to the dogmas of Christianity one is likely to encounter, grouped under appropriate heads. No author has struck harder blows at the Christian religion. It is the most important Biblical criticism that has ever appeared, being the result of many years of study of the religions of antiquity. It is thoroughly reliable, every fact being verified by copious notes and authorities.

COL. ROBERT G. INGERSOLL said: "This work demonstrates the fact that there is nothing new or original in Christianity; that its maxims, miracles, and mistakes, its doctrines, sacraments, and ceremonies, were all borrowed; that its virgin mothers, miraculous babes, courier-stars, crucifixions, resurrections, and ascensions were familiar things hundreds of years before the founder of Christianity was born. It shows that all the machinery of the supernatural has been in active operation for countless generations; that all the nations of antiquity had about the same religious experience, and substantially agreed as to the correctness of about the same mistakes. Catholicism administered on the estate of Paganism, and appropriated most of the property to its own use. Christianity furnished new steam for an old engine. Fables, like most other things, wear out and have to be patched, gilded, or replaced.

"The author of 'Bible Myths' has succeeded in showing that our Bible is not the great central fire giving light to the world, but a collection of candles and tapers and sparks borrowed by the 'chosen people' from those whom Jehovah, according to the scriptures, had left in the darkness of nature."

REV. M. J. SAVAGE says: "To me, the volume is worth twenty times its cost."

THE BOSTON COMMONWEALTH says: "Here we have evidence upon evidence that there is no myth, legend, supernatural occurrence, doctrine, rite or ceremony recorded in the Bible which cannot be paralleled in some ancient record centuries older than the page on which the same thing is narrated in the Hebrew and Christian scriptures. We confess we are curious as to how the orthodoxes of the Christian world will greet this book. We more than suspect that they will not greet it at all, but will be content to pass it by in fearful silence."

Seventh Edition: Large 8vo, cloth, 614 pages, $2.

Address THE TRUTH SEEKER :: 62 Vesey Street, New York

In Best of Humor.

Repartee.—"Shucks," said Adam. "You're nothing but a spare rib."
"What if I am?" retorted Eve. "You came right from the sod."

Severely Injured.—She: "Have you ever been wounded in an engagement?"
He: "Oh, yes; when my fiancée broke off our last one I was fearfully cut up."

Fame.—Hokus—Is Harduppe pretty well known in your town?
Pokus—I should say he is. He's so well known he can't even borrow an umbrella.

He Merely Said He'd Like It.—Diner—I'd like a juicy, tender steak, medium done, with a lump of fine butter on top.
Waiter—That would be very nice, sir. And now what will you have?—Boston Transcript.

It Depends.—Examiner—Now, William, if a man can do one-fourth of a piece of work in two days, how long will he take to finish it?
William—Is it a contract job or is he workin' by the day?—Life.

Thoughtful.—"My dear, I've an idea," said old Mrs. Goodart to her caller. "You know we frequently read of the soldiers making sorties. Now, why not make up a lot of those sorties and send them to the poor fellows at the front?"

Lucky Jinks.—"What makes Jinks so proud of his ancestors? I never heard any of them did anything."
"That's exactly the point. So many persons' ancestors did do things which got them into trouble with the police."

Quite So.—"Your constituents don't seem to agree with some of your remarks."
"No," replied Senator Sorghum. "A whole lot of people never seem to pay the slightest attention to anything I say except when they disagree with it."—Washington Star.

A Real Providence.—Mr. Younghusband reached home late for dinner.
"I got pinched for speeding on the way home," he explained rather sheepishly. "Have to appear to-morrow morning and get $10 or fifteen days."
Mrs. Younghusband fervently clapped two blistered little hands. "What a providence!" she cried devoutly. "You must take the fifteen days, John! The cook has just left!"—Harper's Magazine.

Business Is Business.—"I suppose you built up your colossal fortune by attending strictly to your own business?"
"Yes," replied Mr. Dustin Stax. "But I made it my business to keep informed as to what the other people were doing."—Washington Star.

His Errand.—"I met Glithers just now. He had a hoe, a rake, and a large package of garden seed." "Going to plant something he got those things together for the thing, eh?" "Oh, no, of course not. I purpose of attending a directors' meeting at his bank."

Betrayed.

The other night
I went to the theater
With a low-brow friend.
And the orchestra played
"The Little Brown Jug."
And he thought
It was the national anthem
And stood up,
And I did, too,
Darn him.

—Arkansas Gazette.

Let's Be Honest!

"If we must fight Mexico [or Germany], let us pray as we bare the sword."
—Religious Periodical.

Let's be honest, anyway.
If we march away to war.
Down the column's glint and sway
We know what we're going for.
Cut the preaching, church and civil,
And the praying and the drivel;
Sing "My country, right or wrong!"
That's the only soldier song.

Blessings now are foolery;
Only beef and bullets count.
Who can run a killing bee
By the Sermon on the Mount?
Underneath the war flag's rustle
You we trust, O steel and muscle!
In this game of heathen Rome
Leave our cumbrous God at home.

Could a theologic quirk
Make us better shots, or worse?
Let us do our soldier work
With a candid soldier curse.
Lock your Jesus in the chapel;
Leave us free to gouge and grapple
In the grand beast game we play!
Let's be honest, anyway.

—Badger Clark.

Cause for Divorce.—"There will be fewer divorces," she said to a reporter, "when men treat women as their equals."
"Do you know the kind of wife my ideal is?" a married man once said to me.
"Of course I do," said I. "Your ideal wife is the kind that's tickled to death over a birthday present of a bag of flour."—Washington Star.

Can't Fail.

If you'd succeed,
This adage mind:
First find your work;
Then work your find.

—Life.

THE SOUL AND ITS BEARINGS

SHOWING

The Material Quality of the Soul and the Mechanical Nature of Its Functions and of the Business Relations It Sustains with the Environment on One Side and the Rest of the Corporal Organism on the Other.

By JAMES B. ALEXANDER

This is a Materialistic book. The author does not believe that the soul survives the body. He says: "Is it right to lie for the concealment of a disagreeable truth—to inclose the vital truth in a pleasant husk of fiction by tricking the people with the delusion of agreeable falsehoods? No! Tell the truth! Let not the truth be brought into disrepute by unworthy and debasing associations."

A very frank book; serious, scholarly, convincing.

Price $1.00Sold at THE TRUTH SEEKER OFFICE

Paine's Age of Reason

By THOMAS PAINE, M.A.

This edition of Thomas Paine's masterpiece is the one that is sure to become the standard for all future correct editions. It is reprinted from one of the first copies in English published by Barrois at Paris, January, 1794, and the proofs were probably read by Paine. It enables the world of the twentieth century to read Paine's AGE OF REASON as Paine wrote it in the eighteenth century. It is printed from large new type. 180 pages. 15c. T. S. Co.

THE CHRISTIAN HELL

From the First to the Twentieth Century
By

HYPATIA BRADLAUGH BONNER

There is no book in the English language which describes the theory and experience of the doctrine of the Christian Hell with such fulness of details as this work by Mrs. Bonner. No one who wishes to know what this doctrine means when carried to its natural conclusions, as in the teaching of the Roman Catholic church, should fail to secure a copy of this startling work. Mrs. Bonner's sources are entirely authentic, and the reader is held spellbound by her graphic descriptions, which grow in intensity as she reaches the climax of her subject. There are some twenty-eight illustrations in the book, taken from pictures actually circulated by the churches, which serve to bring to view all the horrifying phases of this most inhuman of conceptions. This work alone is sufficient to condemn Christianity as a thoroughly unnatural institution.

PRICE, PAPER, 30 CENTS
CLOTH - 45 CENTS

The Truth Seeker

62 Vesey Street - New York

EXEMPTING THE CHURCHES

A Presentation of Facts and Reasons
to Show Why

CHURCHES SHOULD BE TAXED

Argument of

JAMES F. MORTON, JR.,

Before the Committee on Taxation of the Constitutional Convention at Albany, New York. Expanded into a pamphlet of 84 pages, to which is annexed a tract by John E. Remsburg.

It Covers All the Ground

The many pretexts for the exemption of church property from taxation examined and exposed.

Price 25 Cents

Write for rates on quantities.
THE TRUTH SEEKER CO.

ETERNITY

World-War Thoughts on Life and Death, Religion, and the Theory of Evolution

By ERNST HAECKEL

(Professor at the University of Jena)

Author of "The History of Creation," "The Evolution of Man," "The Riddle of the Universe," etc.

Of highest importance are these latest thoughts of Professor Haeckel, which embody the ideas of a Marxist philosopher and Humanitarian. Freethinker on War, Religion, and the nature and origin of Man. The conclusions of the evolutionists on these questions are restated, emphasized and strengthened. Apart from severely scoring the hypocrisy of nations that profess to be followers of a Prince of Peace, and yet enter upon wars of conquest and make arms and munitions their trade, what the author has to say on the merits of the parties to the present war is given in an appendix. In the main he confines himself closely to the themes indicated—science, religion and humanity. He rejects utterly the Christian scheme of this world or any other.

Cloth, $1.25 net.

THE TRUTH SEEKER COMPANY

62 Vesey Street, New York

SELF-CONTRADICTIONS OF THE BIBLE. By W. H. Burr. One hundred and forty-four propositions embodying the most palpable and striking contradictions. Price 15 cents.

News of the Week.

The American commission to Russia, headed by Elihu Root, has safely arrived at a Russian port.

Louis Gathman, the gun inventor, is dead at 72. He was a German and an American and lived in Washington.

Free speech and a free press triumphed May 31 when censorship was beaten in the House by the decisive vote of 184 to 144.

Emperor William has sent encouraging telegrams to his officers and allies, whom he assures that "God will be with us further."

John Spargo, the author of many Socialist works, has quit the Socialist party, saying that it is "unneutral, un-American and pro-German."

With exports reaching a total of $6,000,000,000 for the twelve months ended April last, a new record has been written into the commercial history of the United States.

Records compiled at El Paso, Laredo, Eagle Pass and Brownsville, Texas, show that more than four thousand Americans have crossed the Rio Grande into Mexico since May 1.

Col. Edward M. L. Ehlers, grand secretary of the Grand Lodge of Masons in the state of New York, died May 28 in New York, in his seventy-eighth year. He was one of the best known Masons in the world.

Three white men and three negroes were shot May 29 in a recurrence of race rioting at East St. Louis, which culminated in an attempt by rioters to destroy a portion of the negro district by fire.

More than sixty thousand men and boys turned out in parades in Manhattan on Memorial Day, May 30, to pay honor to the memory of the men who fought more than half a century ago to preserve the Union.

Revised figures on dead and injured in the storms in Illinois, Indiana, Kansas, Kentucky, Missouri, Tennessee, Alabama and Arkansas show a total of 278 dead and 1,447 injured. The damage is estimated at about $5,000,000.

The First National Bank of New York has entered the banner subscription to the Liberty Loan. It has taken $75,000,000 of the bonds, part for its own account and part for its customers.

More than a score of arrests have been made and nine indictments already have been returned by Federal grand juries for attempts to hinder registration under the draft bill.

S. X. Constantinidi, first secretary of the Greek Legation at Washington, May 29 presented his papers of resignation to the State Department and announced his allegiance to the forces of Venizelos.

The German Admiralty has promised a safe passage through the barred zone to all neutral vessels in English ports on July 1, provided they carry distinctive signs and follow indicated routes.

Charged with seditiously libeling President Wilson, Dr. Gilbert Reid, an American, who is editor of The Peking Post, is to be tried in the United States Court at Shanghai.

Leonold de Rothschild died in London, May 29. Mr. de Rothschild was seventy-two years old and was the third son of Baron Lionel de Rothschild, founder of the English branch of the famous banking house.

Secretary Lane announced June 1 that arrangements were being made for the purchase of the Tanana Valley Railroad, a privately owned line in Alaska, running from Fairbanks to Chatanika, with a branch to Chena.

William J. Lampton, newspaper man and humorist, was found dead May 30 in his room at the French Young Men's Christian Association, of New York. It is believed that he was stricken with apoplexy. He was fifty-eight years old.

Seventy persons were killed and 200 injured in a series of terrible explosions and a fire which occurred in the warehouse district of Osaka, Japan, May 5. The damage to property is estimated at about $5,000,000.

Prof. George W. Kleihege, Socialist candidate for governor of Kansas in 1914, was arrested in Lawrence, Kan., May 31 on a warrant charging him with conspiracy in connection with agitation against the selective draft law.

The Russian extraordinary mission, headed by Professor Bukhmeteff, which is now on its way to Washington from Petrograd, numbers thirty-eight persons, the number of women included being without precedent in diplomatic history.

The heavy movement of gold from the United States to Japan was explained May 29 by Kazuo Shoda, minister of finance, as being due principally to the fact that the indebtedness of Great Britain and France to Japan is being paid partly through America.

Eleanor Wilson Parker, a Barnard College senior, and Owen Cattell and Charles L. Phillips, Columbia students, New York, were arrested May 31, charged with conspiracy against the United States in plotting to prevent registration for the selective draft.

Rear Admiral John Henry Upshur, U. S. N., retired, succumbed to an attack of heart disease at his home at Washington, May 30, aged 94 years. He was a native of Virginia and served in the Mexican and civil wars. He was the oldest living graduate of the United States Naval Academy, which he entered in 1841.

The Prince of Udine, of the Italian war mission, on the floor of the Senate at Washington May 31, delivered a message to the American people in the name of King Victor Emmanuel, welcoming the entrance of the United States into the war as the final moral justification of the cause for which the Allies are fighting.

A Villa force attacked Ojinaga, Mexico, opposite Presidio, Tex., early May 30, surprising the Mexican government soldiers in the garrison there and causing them to flee to the American side, leaving their arms in Mexico. All women and children at Ojinaga fled across the line into Texas when the attack started.

The President issued a proclamation June 1 aimed directly at those Americans who are preparing to run away from their country rather than register on June 5. He warned these that if they left the boundaries of the United States before Registration Day they exposed themselves on their return to prosecution, which might lead to a year's imprisonment, followed by registration.

Alfred Cocchi, the motorcycle machinist who disappeared from his shop, Manhattan, New York, after he had been grilled by the police in connection with the disappearance of Ruth Cruger, eighteen years old, on February 13 last, has been found in Bologna, Italy, where he has been living with his father and brother. The Cruger girl was last heard of in Cocchi's shop, where she called for her skates that had been sharpened.

THE WAR.

The recent lull in the fighting has had no effect whatever upon the British aerial offensive, which continues day and night with unrelenting intensity.

General Cadorna shifted his attack on the Austrian lines May 29 to the front north of Gorizia and won there another important success.

Captain George Guynemer, most famous of all French army aviators, has brought down five more German aeroplanes, two of them in one minute.

Ambulance Section No. 26 of the American Field Service started for the front May 28 under the command of Albert M. Hyde, of New York, a Harvard man.

Italian forces in central Southern Albania have occupied the villages of Cerevoda, Velisest, Osoja and Cafa, and have held them against the attacks of Austrian regulars.

Major William S. Mitchell, aviation attache of the American military mission to France, has been cited in the general orders of the French army for efficiency and bravery in face of the enemy.

A determined German attempt to retake the crest of the Champagne hills recently consolidated by the French was frustrated May 31 after fighting which Paris describes as of "extreme violence."

The American sailing ship Dirigo has been sunk by a German submarine. The crew has been landed at Plymouth with the exception of John Ray, third mate, who was drowned when the small boats were being launched.

Between April 15 and May 24 the number of German prisoners falling into French hands reached a total of 31,829, of whom 28,045 were unwounded. This period covers three phases of the general attack, now temporarily abated.

Extensive air raids over German aerodromes and submarine bases in Belgium were carried out June 1 by British naval planes. Many tons of bombs were dropped "with good results" over Ostend, Zeebrugge and Bruges.

The British hospital ship Dover Castle has been torpedoed and sunk. The British armed merchant cruiser Hilary also has been torpedoed and sunk, and a British torpedo boat destroyer has been sunk after a collision.

British casualty lists published in May show a total of 114,118 officers and men killed, wounded and missing. The total number killed was 1,552 officers and 25,838 men; wounded, 3,762 officers and 79,480 men; missing, 828 officers and 6,420 men.

In addition to his French decorations, Raoul Lufbery of the American flying squadron with the French army, has been honored by the British. Last week he received the British military medal with Violet and Flachaire, two French fliers.

Lectures and Meetings

The New York Secular Society. Mr. Irving Meirowitz and Mr. Nicholas Mitichuly of this society will speak at Thirty-seventh street and Broadway every Wednesday and Saturday night; and at 137th street and Broadway every Thursday night.

The Detroit Freethought Society. The meetings of this society have been discontinued for the summer, to be resumed in September. Secretary, E. N. Diebler, 522 32d Street, Detroit, Mich.

The Boston Freethought Society meets in Paine Memorial Hall, Appleton street, every Sunday at 3 P. M. J. P. Bland, B.D., is resident speaker, and THE TRUTH SEEKER is for sale at the door.

The Rationalist Society of Toledo, Ohio, meets in the Arcade Bldg., Room 133, St. Clair and Jackson sts., Wednesday evenings at 8.

The Chicago Freethought Society meets in Corinthian Hall, Masonic Temple, Sunday mornings, at 11 o'clock; H. Percy Ward, lecturer.

The Freethought Congregation of Cedar Rapids, Iowa, meets every second Sunday of the month at the C. S. P. S. Hall, corner Eleventh Avenue and Third Street; Jos. J. Hajek, Speaker.

The Columbus Rationalist Association meets the second and fourth Tuesday evening of each month, 7:30 P. M., at the Hotel Vendome, Third street, opposite State House. O. C. Weatherby, president; Olin J. Ross, 23 East State street, Columbus, O., secretary.

The Friendship Liberal League, (Inc.) of Philadelphia, meets every Sunday at 2:30 and 7:30, at 1417 Columbia avenue. Open platform. The Truth Seeker and liberal literature on sale. F. Garfield Bowers, secretary, 245 N. Ninth street.

The Milwaukee Rationalist Society meets every Friday evening in Convention Hall, Republican House. Joel Rubin, Pres., 9, 10 Cawker Bldg.

The Denver Rationalist Association meets the first and third Thursday of each month at 319 Kittredge Building; Olive Oliver, president.

The Meetings of the Independent Lectureship of San Francisco, Walter Holloway, Rationalist and Lecturer, are held every Sunday night at 8 o'clock, at Golden Gate Commandery, 2135 Sutter Street, San Francisco, Cal.

The Church of This World, Rationalist. John Emerson Roberts, lecturer. Meetings every Sunday morning at 11 o'clock in Willis Wood Theatre, Kansas City, Mo. Mr. Roberts' services may be secured for wedding and funeral occasions. Address, 4011 Kenwood ave., Kansas City, Mo.

The Toledo Rationalist Society meets every Wednesday evening at 8, Room 133, Arcade Building, St. Clair and Jackson streets. W. M. Braun, secretary. Speakers, Dr. Rullison, J. Carl, J. Braun and K. Pauli.

Tacoma Rationalist Society. meets every Sunday at 3 p. m. in Maccabees Hall, 1109 Broadway, Tacoma, Wash. S. T. Hammersmark, Secy., Colonial Hotel.

The Ferrer Association holds public meetings at the Ferrer Centre, 63 East 107th street, New York, every Saturday and Sunday evening.

The Detroit Society of Truth Seekers (Lithuanian) meets the second Sunday of every month at 2 P. M. in C. O. F. Hall, Chene, cor. Trombly st.; Karl Rutkus, organizer, 338 West End ave. Detroit, Mich.

The Clarksburg (W. Va.) Rationalist day in the Court House at 2 P. M. A lecture course is now being prepared. Address G. A. Miller, Secy.-Treas., 644 S. 7th street, Clarksburg. Treas., 644 S. 7th street, Clarksburg.

EVOLUTION OF THE IDEA OF GOD.

By Grant Allen. This work traces the genesis of the belief in a God from its earliest origin in the mind of primitive man up to its fullest development in advanced Christian theology.

Price, paper, 45 cents
Address, THE TRUTH SEEKER CO
62 Vesey St., New York.

BIBLE TEMPERANCE.—By E. C. Walker. Proving that liquor drinking is commended, defended, and enjoined by the Bible, and giving close references to the chapters and verses.
Price 10 cents.

THE SERVICE OF MAN

By JAMES COTTER MORISON

This is a book of peculiar interest, written by a man of striking personality. The object of the book is to show how the Service of God, or of Gods, leads by natural evolution to the Service of Man; from Theolatriy to Anthropolatriy. Mention of some of the chapter headings will show the attractive nature of the work. Chapter II deals with "The Decay of Belief"; Chapter IV with "The Alleged Consolations of the Christian Religion"; Chapter VI is named "Morality in the Ages of Faith"; and in the VIIIth chapter there is recorded "What Christianity Has Done." There are in all nine chapters of clear and accurate reasoning in favor of the glorification of man over a decadent laudation of gods. The book is framed in an admirable spirit, and exhibits on every page the generous nature and lively vivacity of its author. It is invaluable to the student of Rationalism, especially if he be called upon to "give a reason for the faith that is in him."

PRICE, THIRTY CENTS

For Sale by

The Truth Seeker
62 Vesey Street - New York City

INFIDEL DEATHBEDS

BY G. W. FOOTE.

An account of the passing away of the noted Freethinkers of the world, to which are prefixed brief accounts of their lives and of the work they did for mental liberty. "Infidel death-beds" have ever been a fertile theme of pulpit eloquence, and the clergy have drawn harrowing pictures of fear and terror and recantations and repudiation of sentiments held when living by the great Infidels of the world. This book shows that such sermons are "just preaching," and totally false as to statements. Every Liberal should have it for reference. The author founded the London Freethinker, and was one of the ablest writers in England.
Price 25 cents.

Address THE TRUTH SEEKER,
62 Vesey Street, New York.

WHAT IS RELIGION?

And Other Essays

By ROBERT G. INGERSOLL

The essay, "What Is Religion?" which gives a title to the collection, was Ingersoll's last public address. The others are:

Declaration of the Free (A Poem).
The Bible Not a Moral Guide.
A Vision of War.
Declaration of Independence.
Faith that Surely Wanes.
A Look Backward and a Prophecy.
The Oath Question.
God in the Constitution.

In pamphlet form, 25c.

Address

The Truth Seeker
62 Vesey Street - New York

MARTYRDOM OF MAN. By Winwood Reade. Cloth, with portrait and biographical sketch, $1.00.

A synopsis of universal history, showing what the race has undergone in its rise to its present plane. It shows how War and Religion have been oppressive factors in man's struggle for liberty; and the last chapter, of some 150 pages, describes his intellectual struggle from the animal period of the earth to the present. Winwood Reade's reputation as a writer of fine English for deep study and careful reasoning, needs no word of praise.

THE TRUTH SEEKER

A Freethought and Agnostic Newspaper.

Vol. 44.—No. 24.

PUBLISHED
WEEKLY

New York, June 16, 1917.

62 VESEY
STREET

$3.00 Per Year

IS UNBELIEF A "LOSS"?

Ideas of God and Immortality Are So Vague They Mean Little to Man.

BY PROF. JAMES H. LEUBA.

In corresponding with Professor Leuba, who occupies the chair of Psychology and Pedagogy in Bryn Mawr College, Pennsylvania, and is the author of an analytical and statistical work on "The Belief in God and Immortality," the editor of THE TRUTH SEEKER observed that a contribution from the Professor's pen would be acceptable to readers of this paper. In reply Professor Leuba suggested that a slice taken out of his book would give us available matter. The appended article is such a "slice." The author had shown that belief in God and immortality was disappearing from the minds of men of science, and in conclusion devoted a few pages to an inquiry whether that belief had any utility when held. Portions of his argument are here reproduced.

THE great discrepancy between the actual facts and the general opinion concerning the desire for and the prevalence of the beliefs in God and immortality, is readily explained. The unbelievers usually keep their opinions to themselves, because of the obloquy cast upon disbelievers, and because the ground for their unbelief is rarely clearly formulated in their own minds. The believers, convinced as they are that the welfare of the community depends upon these beliefs, drown by the loudness and frequency of their affirmations the muffled objections offered by the most assertive of the unbelievers. As long as a few hold God and immortality to be vital beliefs, while most think that nothing is to be gained by their loss, the present mistaken opinion concerning their prevalence and potency will persist.

If the hope of immortality has often been the poet's inspiration, he has also been moved by the hope of annihilation. Thus Swinburne:

"From too much love of living,
From hope and fear set free,
We thank with brief thanksgiving
Whatever gods may be
That no life lives forever;
That dead men rise up never;
That even the warmest river
Winds somewhere safe to sea.

"Then star nor sun shall waken,
Nor any change of light;
Nor sound of waters shaken,
Nor any sound or sight;
Nor wintry leaves nor vernal,
Nor days nor things diurnal;
Only the sleep eternal!
In an eternal night."

John Addington Symonds echoed in prose the same sentiments:

"Until that immortality of the individual is irrefragably demonstrated, the sweet, the immeasurably precious hope of ending with this life the ache and languor of existence remains open to burdened human personalities."

But why seek afield for an explanation of the dislike of immortality? A weariness of existence, temperamental, or the fruit of age or of other circumstances (but not necessarily due to disillusionment); a disposition to enjoy the mood that informs Bryant's noble poem, "Thanatopsis," and especially, perhaps, an inability to picture in intelligible and acceptable form a future life, suffice to make of a death that ends all, a satisfactory, even a desirable goal.

If no one can be indifferent to happiness, one may not be able to foresee conditions of real eternal happiness. The despisers of immortality should not be thought to occupy the paradoxical position of rejecting blessedness; they are rather not able to persuade themselves that any eternal life of which they can conceive, would be to them blessedness. This is an important and a neglected aspect of the problem of immortality. Outside of the simple folk who accept whole-heartedly a paradise similar to the Garden of Eden, with God walking about in the cool of the evening, believers in personal immortality find themselves hard put to it to conceive under definite forms a never-ending existence neither puerile nor surfeiting. As a matter of fact, I do not know of any one who has succeeded in investing the future life with features acceptable to the cultured Christian. The imagery of the New Testament is in this regard, as much as Dante's, purely symbolic or poetic. The fact is—and it is important that we should realize it—that we can think of the other life as eternal blissfulness only on condition of not insisting upon knowing anything specific about it. As soon as, no longer satisfied with a general assurance of unruffled peace and unalloyed enjoyment, we demand specifications, we find ourselves in the presence of ideas and pictures, either absurd or repulsive, or void of real attractiveness. The best gifted religious seers succeed in this descriptive task no better than the cleverest mediums. The utter failure of these to provide anything in the least acceptable in the way of a picture of the other world, when even moderate success would make their fortune, is a striking demonstration of the necessity for those who desire immortality of being content with a bare assurance of happiness and to be wary of curiosity; for never since the days of Pandora was there a curiosity more surely threatening disaster.

The very significant disposition to play fast and loose with immortality appears in the answers to this question of the inquiry of the Society for Psychical Research, "Would you like to know for certain about the future life, or would you prefer to leave it a matter of faith?" Only 21 per cent. out of a total of 3218 may be credited with a real desire for a scientific knowledge of the possibility of a future life, while 23 per cent. voted for faith, 12.9 per cent. for ignorance, and 3.3 per cent. declared indifference. Definite knowledge might not meet all our desires; it certainly would not leave us the freedom we enjoy when immortality is a matter of faith, or one of which we are ignorant.

In any case, it is a fact, as President Stanley Hall remarks, that "even those surest of Heaven stay here to the last possible moment, even though their lives in this world be miserable. Does not this show that belief in post-mortem life is a convention, a dream-wish? If we were told of a new continent of fabulous wealth and charm, and believed it all, we should go to it by individuals, families, tribes, and leave fatherlands untenanted, although we had to brave dark and tempestuous seas to get there. We should not ritually pray against a sudden transit, or be called fanatics if we voluntarily crossed the tide because the old world had become intolerably hard for us."

If the number of persons disinclined to an eternal future existence is considerable, those who are simply indifferent or nearly so are legion. Every one may find about him many belonging to this category. Most of these will add, "But my friends and neighbors could not get along without it." And these friends and neighbors, probably indifferent also, take a similar care not to unsettle others in the belief they are supposed to cherish. Thus, overgrown beliefs enjoy an existence largely fictitious.

Avowed materialists join hands with idealists in enthusiastic affirmations of the sufficiency of earthly life for the spiritual development and satisfaction of man:

"It will be seen that my philosophy is thoroughly materialistic. I believe that man has been evolved from lower forms of animal life, . . . that he will continue along this road which he has traveled through countless generations, and that this will ultimately lead the race over the mountain tops and into the promised land of human perfection. . . . I conceive it the highest duty of the individual to contribute his mite to the betterment of the whole. Science teaches that what the man thinks, says and does lives after him, and influences for good or ill future generations. To me this is a higher, nobler and greater incentive to righteousness than any hope of personal reward or fear of punishment in a future life. I believe that this is a glorious world, full of great opportunities to the individual, and of unlimited promise of development in the race. Life carries in itself the highest duties, the performance of which should not be regarded as tasks to be shirked if possible or to be done reluctantly, but to be carried on with a spirit of thankfulness that it has fallen to the lot of the individual to be a participant in the great and glorious work of contributing to the uplift of the race. To widen the domain of knowledge, be it ever so little, to abate disease, to lessen pain and suffering, to decrease the burden of poverty, to brighten and ennoble the lives of others . . . these are some of the things that science has done and is doing. To be even an humble and unknown worker in the great army of men who are doing these things is a privilege which should make glad the heart of any man." (Victor C. Vaughan).

Our ignorance with respect to ultimate problems is so profound that we may not regard the demand for the rationality of the Universe as implying unequivocally a demand for personal immortality. Of the two desires to which we have ascribed the preponderant rôle in the maintenance of the present belief, only that for the continuance of love and friendship can be gratified in no other way than by a survival involving continuation of the sense of identity. The violence of this desire is well known, yet I may quote this heart-rending cry of a young wife recently bereft of her husband. She was an intimate friend of Schleiermacher, and to him she turned in the hour of her distress:

"O Schleier, in the midst of my sorrow there are yet blessed moments when I vividly feel what a love ours was, and that surely this love is eternal, and it is impossible that God can destroy it; for God himself is love. I bear this life while nature will; for I have still work to do for the children, his and mine: but O God! with what longings, what foreshadowings of unutterable blessedness, do I gaze across into that world where he lives! What joy for me to die!

"Schleier, shall I not find him again? O my God! I implore you, Schleier, by all that is dear to God and sacred, give me, if you can, the certain assurance of finding and knowing him again. Tell me your utmost faith on this, dear Schleier; Oh! if it fails, I am undone. It is for this that I live, for this that I submissively and quietly endure: this is the one only outlook that sheds a light on my dark life,—to find him again, to live for him again. O God! he cannot be destroyed!"

To this appeal the great interpreter of religion to whom, more than to any one else, contemporary theology has looked for guidance, could not give the longed for answer.

There is, I believe, no other so frequent cause of an effective belief in immortality as the loss by death of a loved person. But the desire for the continuation of those we love is, in itself, in no way a guarantee of its realization. It is only when the existence of a purposive, benevolent Creator is assumed that it can be urged with some degree of assurance that the presence of this desire implies its gratification. Again here, however, that which to our limited vision seems necessary may not be so.

In order to appreciate correctly the influence of love and affection upon the belief in immortality, one should consider not only the common intensity of these feelings but also the distressing ease with which we forget and grow indifferent. Love and affection for the dead are, while they last, powerful incentives to belief in an endless existence; but the destiny of the tender feeling, as of all others, is to be weakened by time. When middle age is past and old age approaches, feelings have frequently lost too much of their energy to lift man above mundane existence. Does not human frailty permit us to go further, and to admit, for instance, that Schleiermacher's friend may have remarried? In that occurrence her former yearnings for another life might have been replaced by dread of the time when she would be face to face with two husbands. This is one of the many situations which account for the practice upon which I have commented of refusing to treat heaven realistically.

The official representatives of religious systems are filled with apprehension at the thought of the possible loss of the beliefs in a personal God and immortality. Yet, the only real danger is created, I think, by their misunderstanding of the origin of moral ideals and energy. It is because of this misunderstanding that they regard the loss of these beliefs as a calamity. Were their opinion to be generally accepted, a fatal feeling of degradation and of helplessness would benumb those who find themselves compelled to relinquish these beliefs. As a matter of fact, the threat of impending disaster, although far from universally felt, overshadows the sky of the faithful who are not altogether blind to the religious transformation now in progress, and it deprives many doubters of the hopeful energy with which they would otherwise meet the uncertainty of their situation.

It is, therefore, of the greatest importance that those who have become convinced of the absence of sufficient ground for these two beliefs and of their apparently unavoidable disappearance if humanity continues in its present course, realize that morality is essentially independent of them.

Our alleged essential dependence upon transcendental beliefs is belied by the most common experiences of daily life. Who does not feel the absurdity of the opinion that the lavish care for a sick child by a mother is given because of a belief in God and immortality? Are love of father and mother on the part of children, affection and serviceableness between brothers and sisters, straightforwardness and truthfulness between business men essentially dependent upon these beliefs? What sort of person would be the father who would announce divine punishment or reward in order to obtain the love and respect of his children? And if there are business men preserved from unrighteousness by the fear of future punishment, they are far more numerous who are deterred by the threat of human law. Most of them would take their chances with heaven a hundred times before they would once with society, or perchance with the imperative voice of humanity heard in the conscience.

On what do our political leaders rely when they wish to rouse the public conscience and bring about vital improvements? On the thought of God and immortality? How absurd the idea? The Hebrew prophets threatened social and political calamities at the hand of the Yahweh, because they actually believed in Yahweh's government of Israel. Our political prophets also threaten national calamities, but not at the hand of the Christian God, for we no longer really believe in his intervention. Yet, our conviction of the necessity and of the possibility of moral amendment is no less firm, and the joy of success no less keen.

The heroism of religious martyrs is often flaunted as marvelous instances of the unique sustaining strength derived from the belief in a personal God and the anticipation of heaven. And yet, for every martyr of this sort, there has been one or more heroes who has risked his life for a noble cause, without the comfort which transcendental beliefs may bring. The very present offers almost countless instances of martyrs to the cause of humanity who were strangers to the idea of God and immortality. How many men and women have in the past decade gladly offered and not infrequently lost their lives in the cause of freedom, or justice, or science? In the monstrous war we are now witnessing, is there a less heroic defense of home and nation, and less conscious self-renunciation for the sake of others among the non-believers than among the professed Christians?

Have modern Christian nations shown a more intense or a purer patriotism than ancient Greek or Rome where men did not pretend to derive inspiration for their deeds of devotion in the thought of their gods? Cicero, mediocre though he was in point of private virtue, expected of every man, at the call of country, the sacrifice of life and reputation.

Nothing could be more evident than that the approval of God and the assurance of eternal happiness are not original motives for the generosity with which man offers up his life. The fruitful deeds of heroism are at bottom inspired not by the thought of God and of a future life, but by innate tendencies or promptings that have reference to humanity. Self-sacrifice, generosity, is rooted in nothing less superficial and accidental than social instincts older than the human race, for they are already present in a rudimentary form in the higher animals.

What, then, in the most civilized Christian nations, is the value of these beliefs? It is now generally admitted that one cannot moralize by external compulsion. Preventing a man from committing murder by mere fear of the gallows or a child from lying by mere threat of punishment, serves a purpose, but that purpose is not their moral improvement. No more can anyone be made generous by being compelled or enticed to open his purse. In order to do more than prevent murder and theft, more than secure money for the poor, the murderer and the child must be made to realize the wickedness of their desires, and in the heart of the giver must be awakened true charity.

In so far as God and immortality stand for external reward and punishment, they have, it will be agreed, no truly moralizing value; they may merely prevent some evil and compel some good. But even in this respect, the social sanctions are, in the great majority of instances, much more effective than the divine. By social sanctions we should not, of course, think merely of the law, but also of the enormous restraining and encouraging influences exerted by friends, family, and public opinion. Every one realizes what a catastrophe would follow the removal of these social restraints even though God and immortality continued to exert the attenuated influence remaining to them.

But, it is urged, the ideas of God and immortality do not act merely as external checks and encouragements. When God is an object of reverence and love, the desire to make his will one's own gives to the belief a truly moralizing power. True as this remark is, its real import appears only when we know how we become acquainted with, and learn to value the perfections that are in God. There is no simpler nor better statement of the origin of the love of God than the well known Biblical passage, "If a man say, I love God, and hateth his brother, he is a liar; for he that loveth not his brother whom he hath seen, how can he love God whom he hath not seen?" In the education of the young, as well as in the reformation of the warped adult, the truth of this is ever seen anew. It is love of man that convinces child and hardened sinner alike of the love of God.

We are now, fortunately, almost done with the absurd tradition that formal religion is the essential means of moral education. We have discovered and are confirming daily that success in moral education depends essentially upon the measure in which one is able to replace artificial or distant reward and punishment by the natural consequences, or by the clear realization of the natural consequences of action; and upon the measure in which freedom can be granted in surroundings offering the richest possible opportunity for the discovery and appreciation of the significance of conduct. Belief in transcendental objects, bearers of perfection, is of no greater value in artistic education than in ethical culture; it is in the contemplation of beautiful objects present to the senses that we learn to know and love the beautiful, and in the presence of noble characters and fine conduct that we learn to know and love the good.

Those who exaggerate the usefulness of the beliefs in immortality and in God conceived as the perfect embodiment of all the values discovered on earth, fail to realize the inherent disadvantages of these beliefs. The evils they breed may be called by the general name of "otherworldliness." It would be difficult to evaluate the harm done to humanity in the past by the conviction that the real destination of man is the world to come. A sincere belief in the Christian God, to whom the believer is to be united in heaven, is an unavoidable cause of detachment from this life. The instances offered in contradiction, great mystics like St. Francis of Assisi or St. Theresa, who have displayed an intense and efficient activity, do not at all prove what one would like to demonstrate by them. They lacked it is true neither energy nor devotion, but the direction their zeal took, the aim they set before themselves, was clearly open to the objection I raise against the influence of transcendental beliefs; they spent themselves heroically not in order to prepare, like far-sighted statesmen, the coming of peace and universal happiness on earth, but to fit men and women for heaven—the difference is notable. I know religious life too favorably to insinuate that those who preach the kingdom of heaven are enemies of mankind, but I think that on the whole they would serve it better were they able to forget not only hell but also heaven. There is always some discrepancy between that which is best for the God of the Christian worship and life in heaven, and that which is best for the individual and society on earth: one cannot serve perfectly man and the traditional God.

But, we are asked, How shall the untenable beliefs be replaced? The first question to be raised is rather, What is the practical necessity of replacing them? Our understanding of life has now proceeded far enough for us to know that the solution of ultimate problems is not practically urgent; this is indeed a fortunate discovery. We should free ourselves from the conceited and false notion that the most important or even an important requirement of existence is a philosophy setting forth solutions of the problems of origin and destiny. The unquenchable cravings for omniscience and moral perfection are crowning glories of man, and nothing is better worth cherishing; but the conviction that we must know whence we come and whither we are going, and that we must possess the assurance of a complete realization of our ideals on earth or elsewhere in order to lead a contented and worthy existence, is childish and mischievous. If I add that giving up the expectation of perfection will not materially alter the craving for it, I shall only be stating a fact made obvious by experience. It is in the very nature of desire to promote belief, but it is not in the nature of belief to produce desire.

On every hand, in individual as well as in national life, numberless facts proclaim that human nature is better adapted to the circumstances of existence than to require, under threat of dissolution, final purposes and the solution of ultimate problems. The revelations that come to man disclose ever proximate goals, and each new step means a new revelation. A purpose, in order to stir man to his depths, need not be infinitely great; he will risk his all, or he will live in a tremor of happy expectation for a trifle; he will walk as well and perhaps better when, instead of aiming to scale Mount Blanc, he ascends a hill; two hundred miles is as far to his eyes as two hundred thousand. To have observed that human society generates moral ideals together with impulses and desires to realize them, is, whatever our theories about them, sufficient both for practical life and for the foundation of a science of ethics. To have gained that knowledge is to have secured ground unshakeable by any philosophy.

The Religious Revival.

Religious revivals have played an important part in the past in filling the churches and getting people who never think or reason to accept a belief in the Bible and Christianity, but they are no longer what they were two or three generations ago, and revivalists have simmered down to a few individuals gifted with gall and gab to carry on the work. The old-fashioned Methodist camp-meeting, where a frenzy of religious excitement was kept up for days, and large numbers were psychologically played upon until the emotions overpowered them, and they really thought they had got to join the church or go to hell, has gone forever and cannot be restored.

For many years there were a number of noted revivalists in the field of activity, and they went from city to city, and remained for days or weeks, according to ability to prolong interest and excitement. The number has now been depleted to one, and with every indication that this one will be the last in movements of this kind. Of course reference is made to that phenomenal combination of physical energy and mental maladies that seek outlet in violent expressions bordering on insanity—the Rev. William Sunday. He is now the star actor on the stage of superstition, and is playing the final rôle in that species of nonsense that once found vent—only in a milder form—in Moody, Mills, Jones, Torrey, Small, Smith and other mental freaks and perverts. His predecessors have died off or subsided, so on his shoulders now rests the burden of making fools for Christ's sake which they once sought to do in wide and extended travels in this and other countries. At present he is very conspicuous in the public eye because of newspaper support and influence, without which his work would lose nine-tenths of its notoriety and such results as it is responsible for. Withdraw from his support the aid which a prostituted press renders him in sending broadcast his slang and the intellectual stupidities in which he specializes, and in exaggerating numbers, results, and doings at his daily sessions, and he would be of no more importance than his predecessor Torrey, now in Los Angeles and hardly making a ripple on the stagnant waters of superstition; though at one time the press made of him a noted and much-talked-about character. As a regular preacher in a permanent locality, he counts for no more than the rest of his contemporaries in the soul saving business; and the once great "divine" has ceased to be a national notoriety because the newspapers do not continue to make him one.

And so it will eventually be with the loud gentleman now disturbing the New York atmosphere. As he is expected in Los Angeles in September, the boosters have set this the third day of May, as the opening of a gigantic evangelistic campaign; and the newspapers have already begun to work up an interest in his coming; one of them even more zealous than the others—if such a thing be possible—giving a full page of reading matter and illustrations.

Among the choice things he has said so many times, and one which gets as near lewdness and suggestive reflections as the law allows, was presented in loud type for Sunday reading, before or after church going. The Salome incident is here referred to, which another paper had selected and used as a sample of sensational stuff several days before, to the exclusion of everything else. It is certainly choice matter to place before the young of both sexes, for it points the way to what the almost forgotten Comstock termed vice, which will be encountered soon enough by them all in ordinary ways.

Los Angeles is expected to raise $60,000, and to have a tabernacle that will hold 20,000 people; and there is no more doubt of its being done than there is that many people will continue to eat out of hotel garbage cans after dark, for an indefinite time to come, as they have been doing. Superstition can raise $60,000, with ease; but that much money to start industries that would give the unemployed work, or to help out the always-short associated charities, could no more be obtained than heat from a cake of ice. To save souls regardless of bodies is the primal object of Sunday's revivals and all others; and no doubt many with half-filled stomachs will be found in the great tabernacle in search of spiritual food.

As reflection is applied to all this folly and foolishness represented by Sunday and other dealers in superstition, a sense of disgust is felt that cannot find expression in words; for when all the orthodox Protestant preachers and churches are seen back of this clown and his antics, it reduces them to an intellectual level fit only for fools and hypocrites to stand on. Never yet did his or any other revival leave a marked or noted improvement in any city after the spectacular event was over and normal conditions had returned. In all the revivals ever seen or known, results never followed that exalted or made better any community; and the souls they profess to save are so worthless in general character, so stupid and senseless intellectually, that a heaven hereafter in their company would be simply hell for those who think and reason, and live in higher realms of thought. No man of sense can be reached or influenced by such a fanatic as a religious revivalist; and such an extreme fanatic as this acrobatic amuser is too low down in the scale of intellect to deserve serious attention. Yet he stands today on the pinnacle of ability and notoriety in the estimation of orthodox Protestant Christians, and, let it be generally known, the so-called best and ablest preachers in Los Angeles, were put on the committee to get him here; and that shows that they regard him as a greater force in saving souls and advancing the work of Christianity than they themselves. It is an open endorsement of his slang and slurs, gutter methods, buffoonery, raw and reckless use of words, and every effort disgusting to decency and refinement that he employs. It also reveals their esteem and admiration for the man who declares Ingersoll is in hell, though his Memorial Day address was so good he used it as his own and felt proud of it until found out. That he could make two contradictory statements about reading Ingersoll's works, and thus get in the Ananias Club without moral injury, seems likewise apparent, for such little things do not count with his admirers.

And this is the man who is coming here with a money promise and unreserved endorsement, to save souls that otherwise would go to hell! A religion that requires and uses such workers is in hard straits, and the man who thinks he can be saved from going to hell by a mercenary mountebank is too foolish to be worth saving.

Los Angeles, Cal.

CHANNING SEVERANCE.

Handing It to Gypsy Smith.

I have been wicked—frightfully so; so wicked that my conscience is calling me to repent and to recant publicly all I have said against Billy Sunday and Gypsy Smith. TRUTH SEEKER readers will therefore permit me to apologize. But I must tell of what I recant:

I was in New York when Billy Sunday was about to come to save the inhabitants from their sins, but had to go South shortly before he began to storm that city. He had no chance to convert me, and I kept on pronouncing him a grafter, a charlatan, a mountebank, a mob psychologist, a common hypnotizer who used the religious sentiment of the people as the way to their pockets. I kept on reasoning that there are mental diseases as well as physical ones, and that all religious revivals were mental complaints of the same epidemic nature as the Crusades that drove the Christian world crazy. I thought these to be no less epidemics of the mind than were flagellatism, the anti-Semitic mania, the dancing mania, the Jewish messiah mania, demonophobia or witchcraft, the Dutch tulip craze, the economic panics, prize-fight insanities, political and speculative manias, and others too numerous to mention. I was surprised that such vile-tongued betrayers of the people as these hell and heaven evangelists could fool the world to the extent I had heard they did.

I forgot that, like all "paying" trades, the religious revivals must produce more practitioners. I forgot that provincial towns are most easily taken by such soul-traders. I had not heard any of these evangelists, and that was perhaps why I was so very bitter against them. But since Gypsy Smith, Jr., has conquered Pensacola, I recant. I ask the mercy of "Gypsy's" God, if he has any to spare.

Gypsy Smith, Jr., was at Pensacola. He stormed and took the town. The tabernacle was crowded day and night during a period of four weeks. For four weeks he filled the minds of men with his "bluff," as I used to say before his conquest.

There is nothing like system in all things, not excepting religious revivals. "Gypsy" was even more of a schemer than "Billy." To start with he got the ministers of all denominations, the Y. M. C. A. and the influential citizens of the town "to back him." With this support the victory was sure and easy. He would not let even the woman suffragists escape him, but gave a night for these and, decorating himself with their colors, carried their hearts where he wanted them to be.

I used to laugh at the crazy mob flocking to the tabernacle day after day. I used to take pleasure in pointing out to my fellows that "Gypsy" is not quite a disciple of Jesus Christ—that he carefully selected the best hotel in town, that he dined and associated only with the wealthiest members of the provincial society, and that he did not object to riding in automobiles, nor reject other luxuries. I used to gird at our press too, as being hypnotized and helping the rogue all it could to gain a complete control over the town. I decided not to go to hear him, but during the third week of his campaign two friends got me. I was going to the theatre that night, we drove past the tabernacle; suddenly one of my friends, stopping the auto, insisted that we go in or let him go alone. The next moment (God bless me!) I was face to face with "Gypsy."

The tabernacle was full. Some 3000 people were there eager to receive the something that would save them from their sins and their consequences. As I glanced over the crowd, I could not fail to notice that many of them were already under hypnotoid influence.

I vainly expected that "Gypsy" would give his sermon at the opening of the evening. He knew better. His musical director had the platform for about an hour, ordering us to sing in a way that served best to make the mind of the audience non-resisting, pliable and obedient. He ordered now this, now that particular part of the tabernacle to sing, permitting the people to make their own selections of the songs, so that they might feel at home and unsuspecting. Having thus prepared the soil for the hypnotizer, by winding up and working down the mind of the audience to the single idea of welcoming the evangelist's message, the musical director turned the meeting over to "Gypsy."

The great moment had come. Amid deep silence the evangelist introduced his sermon. Then the plate went around, and when our pockets were lightened, the lights behind "Gypsy" went out, and he began to thunder, performing various sorts of gymnastic feats on the platform while shouting and flinging his fists about till he was red in the face. The thought came to my mind that this man must be crazy to try to knock the devil out of the audience with his fists. I also thought that after all he might be a fanatic and believe what he preaches. But the constant ordering us to "Listen!" and like attempts to produce an effect on the mind, told too plainly that he was playing the same game as Billy Sunday, only more polished in his speech. He ordered us to banish everybody who would not accept his creed. He told us that our God was the only God, and that all the other Gods were nothing. He told us that only Christ would save us, that we were hopeless sinners who must accept Christ that night or surely to go to hell. He raved. He excited himself, now standing on his toes, now on one foot, now on the other, now running to this, now to that side of the platform, all the time shaking his fists at the audience, though he said he shook them at the devil.

He could tell us nothing new, nothing beyond the orthodox belief that there is a God, a devil, a heaven and a hell to possess us after death. Yet he was wise. He knew he had to hand something to those who are not lost to reason. For these he selected some well-chosen illustrations that convinced me he was no lunatic, not even a fanatic, but a clever rogue, a gamester, a mob psychologist of the most fraudulent type.

When he thought he had riveted the attention of his audience, he indicated more and more directly that everybody present must take Christ that night, must hit the trail, and shake "Gypsy" by the hand. Then he closed, but he took great care that none present should go out, nor even start. He ordered us to stand up and to sing. After each verse he called for new converts, for more "trail hitters," because, after all his efforts, only five persons had volunteered before the stand-up singing and the seat-to-seat persuasion by the secretaries began. These commissioners visited every person, embracing each and trying to persuade him to follow Christ along the sawdust trail. So far as I was concerned the first embrace was enough, and seeing that the next petitioner for Jesus was approaching with another, I departed, not waiting to the end of the farce.

I was disgusted with the baseness of the fraud. I felt sad for the weak minds that permitted themselves to become a prey to such roguery. I felt indignant that these crimes against reason and civilization were permitted to go on.

As the time went on "Gypsy" captured the town and more than a thousand actually "hit" the sawdust trail. He had come, he had conquered; but what a crime against education! If people knew their psychology, no Billy Sunday or Gypsy Smith would dare to attempt to fool them, and it is high time we introduced this science in our schools.

It was no use to talk reason to a town of 15,000 hypnotized people. I tried to arouse the dormant minds of my friends, but it was a hopeless attempt. They pointed out to me that all the town was in favor of "Gypsy," and they would rather conclude that I had gone crazy than that the whole town, including themselves, was insane. So, with the whole community against me, what can I do but cease to think and speak independently? I am recanting that I may be accepted as sane. I no longer say or think anything against these religious frauds. I no longer speak of the trail-hitters and the tabernacle hikers as the crazed mob. I call them the saved, the enlightened, the chosen children of God. I am now looking forward to "Gypsy's" return, and no doubt by that time the redeemed community will have convinced me that I must obey "Gypsy" as they do if I wish to be saved.

Yet I confess it is hard for me even now to believe that "Gypsy" does it all for Christ's sake. Could I only abdicate my reason, perhaps I could believe that the making of over $2,000 which he carried away from Pensacola as a personal reward for his efforts to save the town from the Devil, plus all expenses paid, had nothing to do whatsoever with his enthusiasm. If I could do away with the small share of common sense I yet retain, perhaps I could succeed in persuading myself to think that it is not needful for those who preach Christ to live as Christ lived, but that for dragging people to him against their will, they should be paid at least $25,000 per year.

But now I apologize. I recant. He is doing excellent and valuable work to wrest us from the Devil. I see and appreciate his success. The fact that he took away from the community of Pensacola over $2,000 is sure proof that he took the Devil from us. Did he not say that money is the root of all evil?

Pensacola, Fla.

JAMES GREENLEAF.

THE TRUTH SEEKER.

FOUNDED BY D. M. BENNETT, 1873
CONTINUED BY E. M. MACDONALD, 1883-1909
G. E. MACDONALD Editor
L. K. WASHBURN Editorial Contributor
Sixty-two Vesey Street, New York, N. Y.
Post Office Box 1610.

SATURDAY - - - JUNE 16, 1917

I can endure anything but stupidity and forgive anything but hypocrisy.

The world would not need a Christ were all that walk the street but men.

Charles Lamb preferred a church when it was empty. There is not much in a church when it is filled.

Ask the priest to show his hand. He is not playing an honest game. There are marked cards in the church's deck.

When you have learned all that you can be taught about the Holy Ghost what is it that you know anything about?

How much more suffering would be abolished if persons would give their money to buy coal and flour for the poor rather than give it to the priests to have "masses" said for the dead!

The worst charge that the Christian can bring against the devil is, that he told the truth. This is the worst charge that he can bring against the Freethinker. If a lie is better for man than the truth, then God is the friend of man; but if the truth is calculated to help the world more than falsehood then is the devil most to be admired.

All the gods and all the devils in the universe are before man's face and eyes. They are out-of-doors everywhere; the same forces are at work on earth as in the sun or in the planets or in the stars. Man has nothing to fear but natural forces, no god, no devil, but these. Let men be taught this fact, and they will cease to worship gods and to fear devils.

I shall never forget a wonderful man that I met in Minnesota in the early seventies. He was beyond the three score and ten limit, but healthy and hearty. I asked him one day how he did it. He said: "I never think of myself, there are so many others to think of." I remarked: "There is a religion or something better in that saying." He said: "My boy, if we could only get the religion out of men nothing would do them so much good."

There is too much foolish talk about the "divinity of Jesus." No one could tell what a divine person would look like, speak like or live like. The miracles of the four gospels furnish the only foundation for the faith that Jesus was divine. If these miracles were never performed, if the accounts of these works are lies, then it is good-bye to Christianity. The first duty of the Christian is to prove the miracles, to show how such wonders could be performed, if he expects to save his religion.

L. K. W.

Exempting Church Property.

Congress appears to be perfecting its revenue bills, laying taxes right and left, without taking into account the enormous amount of ecclesiastical property which evades taxation. An estimate of the value of such exempt property places it at $3,000,000,000 (three thousand millions). Thus in permitting it to go tax free the government is overlooking a possible annual revenue of fifty millions.

The Truth Seeker Company publishes a 25-cent pamphlet entitled "Exempting the Churches" giving the facts and the arguments and showing the injustice of not taxing church property. The pamphlet should be in the hands of the men who are making legislation. To enable readers to put it there economically we have for the occasion placed the price at two copies for twenty-five cents, and until further notice we will mail "Exempting the Churches" at that rate. Send the 25 cents here, with names of your senators and representatives, and we will do the rest.

The Secular Cases.

In response to our recent inquiry (June 2), "Who Will Defend Free Speech?" we have a letter from Harry Weinberger, Esq., counsellor at law, 261 Broadway, New York, saying that he has taken an appeal in the Meiowitz case (see last week's TRUTH SEEKER) without charge for services, and that the case will be argued soon. Mr. Weinberger has a record, we are informed, for defending Secular cases free; but these and other free speech trials come so fast that he cannot continue to forgo the fees. At least money for actual court costs and legal services must be provided. Doubtless this can be arranged for.

The standing of our speakers before the law needs to be definitively settled. They ought not to be liable to arrest and a night in jail on the whim of a police officer or the hysterical complaint of excited auditors. Free speech is no guaranteed right unless it may be exercised without this danger.

It was said lately that the defending of Secular cases in Chicago had greatly discouraged the Catholic policemen making the arrests and giving the perjured testimony, and that the annoyance has ceased; but there may yet be further developments. We have received the following letter:

"CHICAGO, June 2, 1917.

"To the EDITOR THE TRUTH SEEKER: Referring to your brief editorial on page 340 of THE TRUTH SEEKER (June 2), entitled 'Who Will Defend Free Speech?' I am led to say that one thing it needs is to be defended from certain people who pretend to be its friends, but use it as a cloak for actions which at this time closely border on treason to our country.

"What leads me to say this is the fact that on Sunday, May 27, in the auditorium and on the lake front in this city, thousands gathered together in a clamorous meeting where red flags were waved, anarchistic talks indulged in, and an impudent resolution adopted which practically demanded of the President of the United States that he immediately and publicly state what the United States is fighting for in its war with Germany; and because the officers of the law were there to preserve proper order and decorum the cry was raised that free speech was being denied.

"I write you this because several professed Rationalists and Freethinkers made themselves more or less prominent in said gathering, and by such actions did, in my opinion, more harm to the cause of real liberty and free speech in that one day than they can restore in a year.

"The merest tyro in political knowledge now knows only too well that all such meetings are in reality pro-German, whether intentionally so or not, and just so much are lending aid and comfort to that present arch-enemy of the United States as well as the enemy of all governments wherein the people rule.

"I recommend to such Rationalists as E. C. Wentworth and others who took active part in that meeting that they read Ingersoll's Memorial Day Address of May 30, 1881, if they honestly desire to know what the United States stands for in the family of nations, because, as a fellow-Rationalist, I wish emphatically to condemn the actions taken by others here Sunday afternoon, as outlined above.

"ROBERT H. LANYON."

The cause of the Secular speakers here is not allied with the political agitation against the policy of President Wilson. The record is free of such complaint, although confusion might exist in the mind of a magistrate too indifferent to inform himself. In the Meiowitz case Magistrate Murphy gave indications of such confusion when he said sarcastically to the defendant: "Of course it is impossible to tell gentlemen like you anything, because generally you know it all; you know all about conditions economic and otherwise." But it was religious conditions that Meiowitz was discussing when arrested, and his Honor should have been aware of the fact.

A person speaking for the Secular Society is not likely to call for the passage of a resolution inquiring why the country is at war with Germany. The reason is so well known that anyone putting such an inquiry falls under suspicion of trying to instruct the President rather than to get information for himself. The well-intentioned pacifists who continue to debate under present conditions are in the position of a lot of passengers upon a vessel in a storm or on the rocks who should claim possession of the decks for a meeting to discuss fair weather, or criticise the captain's orders, or exhort the men not to obey them, and thus hamper officers and crew in their work of saving the ship. They might suspend during the crisis without inviting the charge of having abandoned the principle of free speech.

The police and magistrates render the Secular cases difficult of defense by so framing the charge as to make it a question of fact. An officer not appreciating a speaker's remarks may accuse him of blocking the street or obstructing traffic, and if the speaker, conscious of having right on his side, makes the slightest objection, this is "disorderly conduct." One speaker submitted to arrest for the purpose of getting a free speech decision, but the court held him guilty of disorderly conduct in doing so and imposed a fine. We saw a slight youth of about one hundred and eighteen pounds convicted of trying to overpower an officer weighing two hundred and ten. In addition to the evident absurdity of the accusation, witnesses testified that the defendant had not approached within some yards of the officer. Thus the issue is dodged, or falsified, and it seems impossible to get a decision, not even a conviction, on the free speech question, although that is the essence of the whole matter.

The Evil Root Remains.

Occasionally a visitor from the country is seen on the streets of New York taking in with a startled avidity the many wonders of our cosmopolitan city, and, of course, carefully weighing mentally the different features of the great city's life as they unfold themselves before his astonished vision. Few things surprise him more than the freedom with which the citizens venture to express their personal views in the public streets, especially on the subject of religion, which in his town is never mentioned except in church, and then with great fear and reverence. As he listens to what he considers the "audacity" of the "cart-tail" or "soap-box" orators in daring to undermine the faith of religious people, he gradually develops in his mind the resolution that he will write a letter to one of the city's dailies, and make known his horror and indignation regarding the behavior of such Infidel blasphemers, whose one aim is evidently to supplant the pure gospel of Christ with the cruel spirit of anarchy. This is plainly the origin of most of the letters addressed to the local press of the city in criticism of the right of free speech which its citizens claim, and rightly claim, for every well-intentioned man within its confines.

No man has yet explained why it is right and proper to speak in favor of religion, but impious and immoral to speak against it. If religion is false, and as generally practiced is a menace to truth and justice, then the man who holds it up to scorn and even contempt is worthy of all commendation, and should be the last one to fall under the censure of any lover of the highest aims of human aspiration. It has been a fact from the day that Christianity was born until this present hour that the tenets of that religion have never been demonstrated in any worthy sense to be unquestionably true. Many persons have said that they were true, and have believed, in a way, that they expressed realities more or less probable; but to insist that because of this confidence on the part of a few inhabitants of the earth, the rest of mankind are in conscience bound to respect Christianity and to utter no word against it is to do grievous violence to one of man's chief rights. If Christianity had proved the truth of its creed, there would be no Infidels in the world today. A sure and lasting way to convert the unbeliever to the belief and practice of Christianity is to show plainly the truthfulness of that religion; but if this cannot be done (and there is less prospect of its accomplishment today than at any time in the past), then it is little short of an impertinence for any Christian to question the right of another man to denounce a religion that fails utterly to make credible its stupendous claims.

Allowing that now and then individuals speak somewhat rashly, as religionists consider, in their denunciation of pious frauds and clerical impostures, it has never yet been heard that an Infidel put to death a good man, whether believer or unbeliever; but the Christian church, which boasts of a divine origin, burnt to death many a noble man, not because he was wicked and profane; but only because he refused to believe the impossible as taught in its creeds and catechisms. For a divine institution, claiming to be guided by a wise and loving providence to put a single human being to death, ought to remove it forever from the pale of all calm and considerate thinking, as being wholly unworthy of any place in the existence of honest people. Moreover, the Christian does not hesitate to rail against other religions, and to treat with uncompromising contempt a people, the Jews, from whom he received a large part of his most valued inheritance; why, then, should he question the sincerity of those who oppose his faith as being untrue, and seek to close the mouth of honest opposition by an appeal to public journals, and ultimately to the civil arm? Nothing has more completely exhibited the falsity of Christianity than its practical dealings with human nature in its efforts to think rightly and act wisely for the advancement of mankind. A theological creed that develops no higher type of morality and mental endeavor than that arising from the acceptance of Christian dogmatism, demands no special words of commendation from any man; nor would anyone who valued his reputation for truthfulness, require that such commendation be given. A tree is known by its fruit. Grafting a tree with foreign branches betrays the harvester with false hopes, for the original trunk remains. Social service may help to change the complexion of original Christianity, but the old root with its baneful ramifications still remains.

Proposed Katharsis of Theurgy.

The ministers offer us Christianity as a solution of all the world problems. Dr. G. Stanley Hall, Ph.D., LL.D., professor of psychology and president of Clark University (Worcester, Mass.), says that Christianity so far from being a solution of anything, is itself a problem to be solved. The questions arise: Why do men believe in the Jewish-Christian deity, since he or it is non-existent? Why do they believe that the Bible is his word and the church his established means of grace? Why do they believe in Jesus as a messiah, since messiahs are myths? Dr. Hall explains that religion is a growth that has taken place since man found his "soul," that is, since his conscious life began. For man's conscious life—his life since he separated himself from the rest of the animal world—"is a very recent product." There were no deities until he made them in his own image. "Religion and all that it has and is, its God, Bible, churches, creeds" (says Dr. Hall), "are not from without, but from within. All its commands are the exhortations from out of the depths of the soul of the race to the individual to better himself and his estate. All its interdictions are man's own self-restriction which he has imposed upon his impulses. The deities he worships are his own creation, not he theirs."

All the writings that man regards as revelations from deity are messages that he has written or spoken to himself. The message, not the author, is the thing. Dr. Hall values the Jesus message, and thinks it would persist even though it were proved that Jesus never lived. He would hardly affirm, we presume, that the message attributed to Jesus was actually delivered by a historical character of that name. Drews and Robertson, in their writings on the Christ myth, have traced the teachings of Jesus to prior sources and later additions, leaving him only their nominal author. Our professor of psychology, having examined the arguments of those who, in modern times, deny the existence of Jesus, comes to the conclusion that there actually was a historic Jesus, but that he was dual—half real and half myth. This might support the contention of THE TRUTH SEEKER'S contributor, Professor Eccles, who holds there was an actual Jesus and a mythical one.

The reviewer for Current Literature, on which we depend for our knowledge of the contents of Dr. Hall's new book, gives the author's portrait this striking caption:

"He Says That if There Were no Jesus, We Should Have to Invent One.—Echoing the Voltairean statement regarding deity, Dr. G. Stanley Hall, in his latest work, declares that 'even if the historical existence of Jesus were disproven, we should have to postulate some such person at about this time, place and circumstance.'"

That is exactly what "we" have done. Religion has invented or "postulated" a Jesus. He was a necessity to the Christian cult, as other cults had found a messiah necessary to theirs; and necessity is the mother of invention.

The first "postulate" of religion, to use Dr. Hall's word, is a deity, evolved from man's inner consciousness or inferred from his observation of natural phenomena of whose causes he is ignorant. The next step is placating the deity, or getting on his right side, which is worship. This requires a place to worship, which is an altar or a church, where offerings are brought and ceremonies performed. Communication with the deity "upward" is established by prayer, and communication from the deity "downward" by revelations, gathered into books called Bibles. Originally such downward messages were delivered through the care-takers of altars, the priests, who were also the interpreters of events called divine. Authority to change a fixed form of religious worship and to set up a new one was vested in messiahs, whose credentials were divine paternity and virgin birth. Of course Christianity needed such a personage, and he was duly invented. The biographies of these messiahs are never written by their contemporaries, but are manufactured later and dated back. So when Dr. Hall says if there were no Jesus we should have to postulate one, he is strictly scientific and psychological. No religion can flourish without its prophet, real or invented; and an invented one answers every purpose.

Belief in Jesus at the beginning was encouraged by attributing to him miraculous powers, but Dr. Hall says that "the religion of Jesus is losing its hold upon the cultured world precisely because of the deeds imputed to him that made his early followers accept him." Belief in miracles he calls "infantilism," which is the condition of the human mind that followed animalism and preceded reasoning or reflection. Continuing, he says:

"This crass literal interpretation is today the chief handicap that prevents the acceptance of his teaching or the admiration of his life. Our modern mind cannot worship without subtle psychological, even if unconscious, reservations, not to say stultifications, a being whose claim rests upon multiplying loaves of bread, changing water to wine, walking on the water, raising the dead to life, healing instantly a group of lepers at a distance by a word, etc., for such things belong to the shadow-land of fiction, and not to that of historic fact."

In the discard of miracles, or what Dr. Hall learnedly terms the "katharsis of theurgy," must be included the divine paternity and virgin birth, in other words the deity of Jesus; for there is no proof of his supernatural character except his miracles, and no proof of the miracles except his supernatural character. The two stand together to prove Jesus the son of God, and fall together when the katharsis of theurgy takes place.

Christianity and its Bible have been discredited by three forms of reasoning—by textual criticism, after the fashion of Freethinkers; by scientific examination, and by what is called the higher criticism, literary, historical and analytical. Dr. Hall's method is psychological, but confirms the results of the others and produces the same disbelief.

The Book Business.

Reference to our accounts with patrons brings to light the fact that while there is no abnormal slump in subscriptions and renewals for THE TRUTH SEEKER, the sale of books has gone off in a discouraging way. We would remind patrons that the Truth Seeker Company does a general mail order book business, and supplies at publishers' prices any book that is on the market. Moreover, orders are promptly filled; there is no delay except when the book is to be imported. "You get your money's worth or your money back." Try it.

Setting an Example.

The appended letter may be printed without introductory comment:

"CEDAR RAPIDS, IOWA, May 28, 1917.

"TO THE EDITOR OF THE TRUTH SEEKER: In response to your call of 'Remittances Invited,' though I am not one of those who are in arrears on their subscriptions, yet at the same time I am willing and ready to respond when the alarm of fear of a possible suspension of THE TRUTH SEEKER is sounded if help is not forthcoming very soon. The reason given for such desperate straits is the negligence on the part of some of the subscribers to do their 'bit' of patronage and pay up their subscription. Is it possible that the Freethinkers of the United States cannot or will not support one good periodical? To say the least it does not sound very good nor does it speak well for us (Agnostics) to let the oldest and best Freethought paper in the United States go down for the want of patronage. I for one will not allow it to come to such a state of affairs. With that object in view enclosed herewith please find my check in your favor for twenty-five dollars as a 'free offering' in order to keep the good old TRUTH SEEKER in the Freethought trenches on the firing line. With my best wishes for your success, I am yours very truly,

A. H. WOLF."

Apart from its subscription and book business, THE TRUTH SEEKER has always depended to some extent on gifts, contributions and gratuities from its patrons. Throughout its forty-four years of existence, such contributions have been "life-savers." We need not recur again to the fact that the advertising patronage of this paper, on which other publications rely chiefly for their income, is next to nothing, nor to the fact that the cost of publication has advanced fifty per cent. Our interested readers understand the situation, and they are aware that numerous publications are in the way of suspension or continued at a loss.

We hardly know what to say to the delinquents, those who have allowed their subscriptions to get into arrears or to lapse. We assume that they know their business better than we do. We can only hope that if their delinquency is due merely to carelessness, indolence or neglect, they will take thought and remit at once. They are under fire from the business side of the concern, which is attacking with bills sent by mail.

This article, suggested by Mr. Wolf's letter and donation, is addressed to the affluent and prosperous who can with no inconvenience to themselves, but with good will toward this paper, and moved by generous impulses, help to overcome the deficit caused by these times of greatly increased cost of publication, by following the example Mr. Wolf has set. Think it over.

German Secularists have not allowed the war to obscure their demands for religious equality. A dispatch dated at Berlin, May 12, says that on the day that the Russian provisional government declared complete religious liberty throughout the country the secularist associations of Germany held a conference at Weimar and passed the following resolution, a copy of which was telegraphed to Chancellor von Bethmann-Hollweg: "We urge that all imperial, state and communal offices be opened to all denominations and persons without regard to religious opinion. We ask that no German be compelled to take an oath before a court of law, the terms of which may be contrary to his conscientious scruples. We demand that no German be compelled to send his children to religious instruction at school. We recommend that all Germans, whether orthodox believers or not, provide only that they educate their children properly in moral principles, patriotism, the duty of neighborliness and charity, shall be regarded as on complete equality and freed from state regulations and distinctions based on religious belief."

It having appeared that Albert H. Ryan of Sawtelle, Cal., "had used terms making fun of his wife's religion," Judge W. H. Thomas granted a divorce to Sophia Rosenfelt Ryan from the said Albert. The court "strongly condemned any person for trying to secure a breach in the family by using terms ridiculing their religion." Was this an application of the Pauline privilege—"A brother or a sister is not under bondage in such cases?"

THE MORAL MEANING OF LIFE

The Church Has Missed It, and Unemotional Science May Not Reveal It to Us.

This is the final installment of Mr. McCabe's translation of Alfred Loisy's contribution to "the meaning of life and death." This distinguished French Modernist, M. Loisy, has in these articles given strong support to his contention that the ideals of Freethinkers are as high as those claimed by religionists, and that for them they live as devotedly and die as bravely as the most convinced believers in immortality. The late James Parton declared that the best religion for an American was the religion of the United States. For the United States M. Loisy substitutes France, but they both mean the same thing, the religion of humanity.

BY ALFRED LOISY.

V.

We read in the preface to "The Voyage of the Centurion": "We are the soldiers of Christianity, and before us we have the soldiers of Odin." Christianity exists no longer; and, if it did, the devil himself would find it hard to say which side it takes in the present conflict. If we look to the pope, and confine our attention to the letter of his declarations, we seem to find Christianity divided into two camps, which rend each other. The opinion is plausible enough, since there are two camps, and they do rend each other; but are they Christian? If one is so imprudent as to ask to which side the "neutral" pontiff—we all know, of course, that no one really is neutral—leans it looks as if Christianity is on the side of Odin. That is a disagreeable thing to think, and a difficult thing to believe. If one regards as Christians all who have been baptized in the name of the Father, the Son, and the Holy Ghost, our enemies are as Christian as we. If we consider the sentiments and motives, it is on each side patriotism and national interests which entirely control the conduct. No theological subtlety can make out that there is a Christian sentiment or principle in war.

The present war is neither for Odin nor Christ. If indeed any person was for Christ, his Christ would not be the Christ of Christianity, of the Crusades; he would, in fact, have a curious resemblance to Odin. It would be better not to bring him into this matter, which does not concern him. It is, on the contrary, a significant peculiarity of this war that it does not correspond to any sectarian interest or rivalry, and is far above all that. A conception of true humanity struggles with a conception of brutal humanity. From which any unprejudiced mind might conclude that the cause of France is not the cause of Catholicism; that patriotism and the Catholic religion are not fused together in the French soul, and one is not inseparably connected with the other. After all, there are amongst our enemies a good many Catholics, and they are German, very German. We may be told that they are more German than Catholic. Well, our Catholics also are, for the moment, French above everything, and they do not differ in the least in this respect from the French who are not Catholics.

There remains, nevertheless, the grand Catholic past of France, of which we shall be told not to speak lightly, since it exists now. But it is a poor sort of logic and very confused philosophy that would rivet us to the beliefs and institutions of former times under the pretext that these beliefs and institutions are properly the soul of France. Beliefs and institutions are already to a great extent discredited in the mind of those who acclaim them, and the past which they imagine is a fictitious ideal in which they would like to enclose themselves. We have seen how the most determined apologists of the Catholic church are, in their various ways, unconscious Modernists—if indeed they are unconscious: they are at least not Modernists, but anti-modernists, by profession.

On the political side our ancient form of government is very far from us; but is the Catholicism of the seventeenth century still the religion of our believers? The national features of this ancient Catholicism have been effaced. Gallicanism fell with the monarchy; Bonaparte, unwittingly, gave it its final blow. The so-called Jansenist forms of piety have disappeared and given place to a more romantic, less severe, possibly a little less solid, religion. The burst of ultramontanism which now halts, disconcerted, before the throne on which Benedict XV modestly exhibits his neutrality was assuredly not a national current. It was, in many respects, an antinational current, because it broke at once with the monarchic tradition of the past and the liberal aspirations of the present. It traveled in a direction opposite to that of our national movement since the Revolution. The general spirit of this new Catholicism, which is closed against scientific progress even more rigorously than the Catholicism of the seventeenth and eighteenth centuries was in its time, which is less intellectual and more materialist in its devotion—a religion of miracles, of child-like beliefs and practices—is radically opposed to the tendencies of our age, not only in regard to the development of education, but also, though less obviously, in its moral ideal. To say the truth, Catholicism and the French tradition have diverged more and more widely from each other, and it is no longer possible to assimilate the one to the other, as if existing Catholicism were the religious form of the French spirit. It is the religion of a fairly large number of Frenchmen, but not the religion of France; to pretend, for political reasons, that it is, can do nothing but harm. The advocates of the church may praise as much as they will the advantages of their bastard Catholicism, but they cannot alter the fact that this was not the religion of ancient France, and is still less the religion of France today.

Our religious situation is somewhat delicate. The Centurion was not the first to discover that anticlericalism is not a thing to export. Even for domestic commerce it is of doubtful value, and is in any case of relative value. Anticlericalism might very well be a necessary evil, a bulwark of liberty against the attacks of clericalism. If a party is formed with a religious label and would enrol us under its banner whether we will or no, it is inevitable that a party will be organized to resist it, and the resistance will be all the more furious when the pretensions of the other party are excessive; and these intestine divisions will paralyze our action abroad. Yet it would not do, under the pretext of strengthening our action abroad, which is secondary to our national life on French soil, to put us under an even heavier yoke than that of the Catholicism of the past, especially when the majority have not the sincere belief which would tolerate such a yoke. It is not our interest to be represented abroad as apostles of irreligion. It is our interest to maintain, under certain conditions, the efforts of the French foreign missions, but that can be done without any apostasy from our ideal of progress and sound liberty. It will be done only when Catholicism ceases to be a menace to that ideal and a conspiracy against it.

Many go to the church in search of faith. Not every conversion is unalterable. There have been some in recent times which had painful sequels. Men were converted to an ideal which they believed to be realized in the Catholic church, and they afterwards discovered that there was a wide gulf between their ideal and existing Catholicism; or else it was the church which harshly informed the neophyte that she did not believe what he believed, and that it was his duty to think as she did, which is sometimes very difficult. Even the church begins to relax. It is always easy to love a great ideal; but it is not a little embarrassing when you recognize that this ideal is by no means that of the religious society into which you had entered in order the better to realize it.

One might suppose that if the idealists were converted in sufficient numbers the complexion of the Catholic church would change; that it would modernize itself in spite of all the anathemas launched at Modernism, and become thoroughly French and increasingly human. The hope is very frail. That was precisely the dream of Modernism, which, essentially, was not the teaching of any particular doctrine and did not wish to impose any dogma upon the church, and was therefore not a heresy. It aimed only at permeating Catholicism with humanity. The dream was promptly dispelled. One must not count much upon a transformation of Catholicism, which regards as an enemy any man who cherishes such a hope. The conversion of centurions is but a passing incident, easy to understand, of the transformation—not of Catholicism, which changes slowly and reluctantly—of our social order, which tends to dissociate itself more and more from Catholicism. Of this transformation the conversion of centurions is in its way an indication: rather equivocal, but just as real as the manifestations of the anti-clericals.

One need not be a prophet in order to foresee that the future belongs to the new faith, not the old, and that the dogmas of Nicæa, Trent and the Vatican will never recover their youth. One might even say that in the order of thought, which is a not inconsiderable part of human life, all the bridges are destroyed between modern civilization and the Catholic church. The illusions of the faith, the tricks of apologetics and the concessions of politicians can do nothing in this respect. In the order of sentiment and of action communications are not interrupted; they cannot be so rapidly interrupted because the majority of believers and the more sincere of the new recruits, the centurions, cling to the church only in virtue of sentiments which civilization cannot forgo, since it lives on those very sentiments. As far as one may feel at liberty to forecast, the accessories which are chiefly interesting to Catholic officials, the restraint it would put upon intelligences, the false militarism of its constitution, and its ritual mechanism, will not forever resist the rising tide of humanity which raises us. The best Catholic believers of our time are not Catholics if we judge them by the program of the religion which they profess. A time will assuredly come when they will be Catholic outside of that program and the traditional limitations. In theory they respect formulae which are not, and cannot be, the subject of their living thoughts. They are attached only to the spiritual communion, the inner life, and the spirit of human fraternity.

It would be rash to question that such a communion might be organized apart from the professedly Christian sects. The terrible crisis through which we are passing realized it for a time in the domain of the national conscience, that is to say, the conscience which is common to all of us; and, however imperfect this communion may be in some respects, it has at all events thrown into relief certain principles which will not easily be forgotten. It has created certain habits which will not, apparently, be obliterated in a day. It has affirmed a bond that no one is in a hurry to break. It has, in a word, strengthened the sentiment of French humanity—of a church to which we are, knowingly or unknowingly, more united at the bottom of our hearts than to any particular sect. We have all felt that the fatherland, especially when that fatherland is France, is something more than an external shelter behind which we may conveniently place our domestic life, our business, our interests, our political quarrels and religious rivalries, but it is the mother of all our families, the community of all our interests, the judge above all parties, the august and cherished ideal which none discuss, but for which we die. This is not merely the fatherland of bodies; it is also, and in strict truth, the fatherland of souls. It is so today more than it was yesterday: or, at least, we see it more clearly. Why not more tomorrow than today, since it grows out of our sorrows, with the souls of all our dead, and upholds our highest hopes?

Cynics, if there are any and they dare speak, will perhaps say that we shall find ourselves after the war much as we were before, neither better nor worse; that the survivors of the awful struggle—which will make posterity ask, in horror, through what crisis of folly our generation passed—will return tomorrow to their business or their pleasure, without further care of the country they have saved until the next peril arises; that parties will resume their fruitless antagonisms, with the same egoism, the same intrigues, the same passions; and that the comedy would not be complete if the clericals and anticlericals do not engage in a more furious war than ever with the sole result of making each other's lives disagreeable, since these mutual provocations, seasoned with insult, are conceived by them as a sort of bliss. Cynics will say this, and, what is worse, they will not be entirely wrong; indeed, they may seem to have all the evidence on their side. There are certain sad hours in which, like them, we feel that mankind is, especially in France, incurably frivolous.

Yet the cynics are wrong when they say that man is led only by a selfish regard for his own interest or by some blind passion. We are today suffering a hard experience, and we shall not fail to profit by it morally, because on the whole it is a moral experience. It will depend entirely upon us how far we will extend this moral advantage, and there are many who wish to extend it. Our national life will, perhaps, change little in its external features, but it will in its depths have improved to an extent in proportion to the gravity of our experience. The voice of our dead will long echo in the depths of our hearts, and they will compel us to realize something of that for which they fought. Cynics may, if they please, continue to discourage each other. No one will ask them the meaning of life. They know, and we also know, that all weaknesses, all miseries, all follies, and all crimes are possible to human nature; but we also know, and they too easily forget, that this poor humanity is capable of every effort, every impulse of nobility, truth, generosity, and perfect devotion. We believe in it. We see it in the throes of an heroic regeneration, and we seek to take our part in the work. We pity those who see in it only an occasion, chosen in bad taste, to make witticisms about the eternal carelessness of our race.

NO RELIGION OF SCIENCE.

There may also be certain pedants who will claim that science, or what they call science—that is to say, a purely technical acquaintance with natural and economic realities—holds or may some day hold, the solution of all human problems, and will explain it to us in a few very solid and precise theorems what we call the meaning of life and they prefer to call the normal conditions of existence. Renan, who was zealous for this religion of science, has said somewhere, in connection with the Roman emperors who persecuted Christianity, especially the wise Marcus Aurelius, that they would have succeeded better if they had established a good education-department. That is a very risky, and probably wrong, supposition. We have long had such an education-department as Renan recommended to Marcus Aurelius, and we do not see that it has done so much harm to Catholicism.

Ernest Psichari is not entirely wrong when he calls "pseudo-savants" the men who think they can settle the human problem without troubling about the moral life. Science and life are two different things. Natural life itself eludes science in the strict sense of the word. Far more does the moral life pass beyond the range of scientific experiences and definitions. This life may be a subject of observation; but observation cannot flatter itself that it can penetrate its secret springs and its indefinite possibilities. In particular, theory never engenders virtue. It is a stream that comes from no man knows where—from the depths of our being; but these depths evade all knowledge, and our philosophers can do nothing but speculate about them.

This stream appears in the depths of our being and lifts us up. Social life feeds it; to say that it creates it would be equivocal, since it is just as true that this ascending movement of morality itself creates our social life, in so far as it is distinguished from a merely gregarious life. The essential character of the movement is that it is not directed toward a fixed limit, but toward an ideal the contours of which grow larger and loftier in proportion as we approach it. The sentiment of this ideal, the aspiration that goes out toward it, the satisfaction we feel in serving it, are, properly speaking, the essence of religion; they are the element by which religions contribute to the progress of mankind in all that is noblest and truest, in the spirit of justice and brotherhood. To certain very scientific and dry folk who may be tempted to say that these are metaphors and visions, it is easy to reply that men have never spoken otherwise than in images and metaphors, and that the precise, abstract, numerical symbols of algebra and chemistry are unsuitable for the realities—I say expressly realities—which we are considering.

It is a serious error, an error already discredited by experience, to think that one can, theoretically and practically, build upon exact science a social and individual morality, and prescribe for the profound order of society and the education of its members in a well-digested formula. The ingredient which gives life to the imponderable and illimitable is the sentiment of the good, the sense of humanity; and it is this sentiment which we have to create, to develop, and to apply. The education of this sentiment cannot be a simple matter of intelligence; it is quite a different thing. This sentiment, which has been sustained in religions, has been manifested in them and been formed by them, will continue and flourish only in conditions, and with supports, analogous to those which have assisted it to germinate and survive in spite of all the illusions, errors, and failures which mark its history; that is to say, it will maintain and assert itself, and will act, by means, not of geometrical but mystic conceptions, emotional conceptions, august and sacred, of the family, society, fatherland, and humanity.

THE FAILURE OF THE CHURCH.

And these living and active conceptions no longer find their symbol and their sustenance in the magico-religious forms of ancient ceremonies. They will use an equivalent which they will themselves create, because they cannot do without it. It is by no means chimerical to foresee a perfecting of our national discipline, assuming that we have a national discipline, and that it needs, greatly needs, to be perfected. The formation and guidance of mankind will always have a certain mystic character, for no real progress would be made without this. The dreamers in these matters are the pedants who imagine that they can tame the human animal by a simple knowledge, a clear and reasoned knowledge, of its own interests. That is a program for the making of fools and brutes, if it were possible to carry it out in all its fulness.

If we cannot fail to see that religions have bequeathed to us the myth rather than the meaning of life and death, we will nevertheless not refuse a moral consideration of both. We, on the contrary, believe that we can more and more intimately grasp and penetrate the moral meaning and value. It is not our fault if the old dogmas no longer teach us anything. An entirely materialistic and brutal dogma of human life would satisfy us still less. We seek to illumine our faith and strengthen our advance toward an ideal of a better society and a nobler humanity. We intend to retain whatever was really alive and strong in the ancient faith, and we consider that we are not entitled to the pity of those who still accept the old creeds. To take revenge for contempt is easy enough, and they might be wise to realize this. We also have a faith, a faith not less respectable than theirs, neither less lofty nor less sincere. We do not admit that they are more entitled than we to consider themselves the depositories of the old French tradition. Without insisting upon the delicacy of the Catholic position on its Roman side, we may at least call ourselves, as they do, true servants of France. This service has work for all, and, tomorrow as today, association in the religion of devotion to our country must be our common duty.

God and My Neighbors.

An educator thinks that "the great danger in this country to be avoided is materialism." But he must be a granny, or trying to please grannies. The present tendency in school work is towards fitting the pupils for wresting from the world each a living for himself or herself, not necessarily in a learned profession. Our schools have been planned to make teachers, lawyers, priests. But we must have farmers, artisans, or our professional men will go hungry in spite of all their unions to force up fees. The time is coming, nay is here already, when we Americans must wake up to the value of the material, must learn industry, skill, economy. My neighbor fears to send his boys to college lest when they come back they will be, as he says, "good for nothing." A smattering of foreign languages, of literature, of history that is not true, does not help much toward making a contented, happy workman or a useful citizen.

The popular view of education is a strange one. The student goes through school, takes under compulsion certain things that no self-respecting adult could be made to take, graduates, is finished, perfected, done. He is educated. Now let him lay this all aside, and go out to learn some way whereby he can earn his bread and butter. No more study for him. He is educated, I say. Henceforth for him work, the newspaper, the movies.

"I take off my hat to Boston," said Billy Sunday. Yes, and he passed it around.—Wall Street Journal.

I pity the "sisters." They wear an ugly uniform, with a ghastly crucifix dangling in front. Their faces are pale, bloodless-looking, as though they they needed more nourishing food and more sunshine. When I deal with them their kind, gentle ways impress me in their favor in spite of any vestige of Protestant prejudice that may still linger within me. Yes, personally I like the sisters, and I grieve that they have given up what is to me the best of life for a delusion.

But, according to Mark Twain's philosophy, the sisters enjoy their misery enough to compensate them for what they have given up. That is, they thought so when they became sisters, though experience may have brought disillusion and regret. It is pleasant as a novelty to play a part, but to keep it up day after day, year after year, must be a horribly wearing monotony.

Speaking of Mosaism, how it abounds in literature!

Recall the tragic death of Virginia in Bernardin St. Pierre's romance. The ship is wrecked on the rocks near the shore. A sailor divests himself of his clothing preparatory to making an attempt to get through the breakers to the land. He tries to induce Virginia to discard her togery that he may have a chance to save her life also. But the young lady has no bathing suit handy and prefers to die rather than show her ankles.

Ridiculous, isn't it? Yet in my youth when I read the story I was moved to tears by the sad tragedy. Now I can laugh at it. Of course a real occurrence like that would be a tragedy, but instructive as showing the result of a foolish training.

But novelists are not much given to presenting the Virginia type of heroine nowadays. The fiction-reading public is not fond of that particular sort of idiot. The world do move.

We are told that Paul was allowed to preach his theology to the Gentiles, only he must remember the poor, that is, send what he could collect among his Gentile converts to Jerusalem for the benefit of the poor brethren who had eaten up what little substance they had ever possessed and were needing new supplies from fresh batches of suckers. So Paul traveled and preached, trading his spiritual goods for the ready for the use of the "pillars" at Jerusalem. This was the reverse of the modern method. In Paul's case the missionary brought in instead of scattering. But a significant fact is (if there is any truth in the record) that from the beginning Peter & Co. lived off the Christian graft.

It is reported that a strike is on at Mutton Run Campbellite church, that good Brother Smoothly and his family have walked out, leaving the brethren short one Sunday school teacher and several nickels. And this is, they say, how it came to pass:

Cyrus the Great, who has control of the political pie counter, and Brother Smoothly are pillars in the afore-mentioned church and also in the same political party. Now for several years good Brother Smoothly has been living on pie and getting fat. But he has a laudable desire to make progress, to be ever cutting richer and bigger pies. And Cyrus had two very rich ones at his disposal, but gave our good friend neither. To be sure, he already had one pie on hand, but it was not rich enough to suit his taste. However, Cyrus had others clamoring for pie, and, knowing that no matter how hard one tries he cannot please everybody, ventured to slight his brother. And, they say, the latter is "mad," and proposes to let Cyrus fill the pews, hear the sermons, and pay the preacher without any help from him.

Yet it is to be hoped the trouble may soon be compromised and this regrettable state of affairs brought to a close, for the good brother presumably needs the ministrations and spiritual uplift provided by the church. He has been known to say, "If I believed as do Infidels that this life is all there is, I'd begin to pile up the money, no matter how I might get it." So it is to be devoutly hoped that nothing may ever happen to cause him to lose his religion—his greatest ornament—and become perhaps a man of mercenary mind. Suppose he should lose his faith, become degenerate, cut up some caper, and have to go to the pen!

Is it true that "the spirit of altruism belongs entirely to man," that "nothing analogous to it can be found in the animal kingdom"?

Let us not forget that the animal kingdom includes man; hence, there is a contradiction between the two statements, "the spirit of altruism belongs entirely to man," and "nothing analogous to it can be found in the animal kingdom."

I see altruism shown by my domestic animals. The mother hen defending her chicks and trying to provide food for them shows the spirit of altruism. My loving, loyal, humanized dog is full of unselfish devotion to me. Pick up one of Betty's pigs. It will squeal of course, and she will leave her food and rush to its defense. I have a pet Jersey cow that on three occasions has run to defend me when she thought I was in danger.

Any one who has dealt with domestic animals knows that they are under certain conditions somewhat altruistic. And the same is true of wild animals.

Prudence Alice and her daughter are chums. The mother was but a big girl herself when Lucy was born. She is the only surviving child of the family, and has been her mother's companion since babyhood. And Prudence Alice has taught her child many a lesson, most of them valuable. So our Lucy is a womanly girl, in some respects old-fashioned.

The mother is very fond and proud of her daughter of course, and is ready to do all things possible for her advantage. And she delights to have Lucy look nice. Said she one day, "Lucy, suppose you use a little powder." "Mamma," said the maiden, "the other girls put it on so thick that when they smile it almost cracks, yet I don't see but I am just as popular as they."

In what purports to be a letter from Paul to the Christian church at Corinth (1 Cor. xv), we find the admission: "Certain individuals among you assert that there is no such thing as a resurrection from the dead." And Paul, as is the wont of all good politicians, swears that there is a resurrection, that Jesus rose from the dead, "that he was seen by Cephas, then by the twelve [Judas must have been along]; after that he was seen by over five hundred brothers all at once, the majority of whom survive to this day, although some have died; after that he was seen by James, then by all the apostles, and finally he was seen by myself." When Paul found it necessary to lie, he usually told a whopper, you see. But it is significant that he does not agree with the resurrection traditions as told in the gospels.

The Golden Rule must have long been known to mankind, it is so easily found by induction from man's experience. At school a first little girl is running in play pursued by a second little girl. As the first one passes a third, the latter seizes her and holds her fast until the second one catches her. The first little girl is vexed and in a sudden spasm of rage bites the third little girl, who thus made angry impulsively bites her in turn. Then there is woe, and the teacher must heal wounds and compose differences. "She bit me first." "Well, but she caught hold of me when she had no right to." Here is an opportunity to discover the Golden Rule, as stated by the Chinese sage, "Do not treat others as you would not like them to treat you."

The witty editor of the Melting Pot has looked in the Book and found a Jesus seemingly just to his taste. This Jesus seems to have been a mighty good fellow; and, inasmuch as he discovered the Brotherhood of Man under a common Father (be careful, please, to use a capital F), he was the original Socialist. And Mr. Debs, too, seems to approve of Mr. Tichenor's Jesus.

But why not go back farther, Mr. Tichenor, and seek in the prophets, in Isaiah particularly? Isaiah had a Utopia and it was to be on earth, in which respect it seems to be more nearly accessible, so to speak, than that of Jesus in the sky.

Mr. Tichenor, who seems to agree with Ernest Renan in thinking that Jehovah was a false god if ever there was one, should not forget that according to the scheme of Jesus it was that same Jehovah who is the "Father" of us all.

Once upon a time there came to visit me my friend Byron, a Christian Socialist, intent upon making me also acquainted with the Real Jesus. Then I took the Book and tried to show Byron what sort of a "kingdom" that of Jesus was to be and where located. But when Byron departed he was still happy, still unconvinced that his Jesus was not a Socialist with a plan for social and economic justice in this world. PHILLO.

Why Do I Hate the Church?

Often have I been asked, "Why do you so hate the Church?" I have good and numerous reasons. Just now I will instance two from many of my recollection. A young lady whose father was a friend of mine was graduated from High School with first honors, afterwards taking a competitive examination with the intention of becoming a teacher. Here in average she also won first place. The school board met to elect teachers, when to the surprise of all, and the indignation of many, all the applicants were elected, except this young lady. Reason: Her father was an outspoken Freethinker, and a subscriber to THE TRUTH SEEKER. He was a man of character, no man standing better in the community where he has lived nearly forty years. He used neither liquor or tobacco nor indulged in profanity. He was a merchant tailor, and while not doing as much business as he might have done had he hypocritically professed to be a Christian, he had a good and steady trade. He retained customers for years and even ministers patronized him. But the school board was brought to bay. The injustice of their action was so flagrant, it was so clear a case of petty persecution, back of which stood the church, that at their next meeting out of shame the young lady was elected. Afterwards her sister also became a teacher without opposition, and the two have taught in that city for nearly twenty years with credit to themselves and to the satisfaction of all. This is one of many cases brought to my attention where the church, failing to intimidate a Freethinker into silence, gave vent to its spite, venom and meanness upon his children. Does this give one good reason to hate the church?

When I was in school we had a professor of the sciences—one of the best in the United States. He had at different times been employed by the government and his reports were published as government documents. Of course he did not believe the rib story, or that the whale swallowed Jonah, nor did he believe in the immaculate conception.

While not a propagandist, and never obtruding his views upon anybody, he did attend and support the Unitarian church of the city. The ministers, following their habit, determined upon the sneak act. Quietly they circulated a petition to the school board asking his removal, but a minister's son in the school, who was friendly to the professor, exposed the plot. Other petitions were circulated, and fortunately the school board consisted of fair-minded, intelligent men. When they were exposed, it was amusing to see these sky-pilots like the ostrich hide their heads in the sand. All but one of them, when called to account, denied that they had anything to do in the matter—in which all but one of them lied. They had said that the influence of any teacher who did not believe in the Bible and Christianity was bad upon the students even though he made no special effort to propagate his views. Had they said that his influence was bad upon the Bible and Christianity, they would have told the truth. In the meantime that professor remained in that school several years, leaving only when he got ready; then he resigned to accept a more profitable position in a larger city. Now, has any one the right to hate the church?

These two cases prove that there is more truth, honesty and fairness without the church than within it.

FRANKLIN STEINER.

Religious Exemptions.

The provisions for exemption under the new war-law are the following; religious exemptions in italics:

"Sec. 4. That the Vice-President of the United States, the officers, legislative, executive, and judicial, of the United States and of the several states, Territories, and the District of Columbia, regularly or duly ordained ministers of religion, students who at the time of the approval of this Act are preparing for the ministry in recognized theological or divinity schools, and all persons in the military and naval service of the United States shall be exempt from the selective draft herein prescribed; and nothing in this Act contained shall be construed to require or compel any person to serve in any of the forces herein provided for who is found to be a member of any well-recognized religious sect or organization at present organized and existing and whose existing creed or principles forbid its members to participate in war in any form and whose religious convictions are against war or participation therein in accordance with the creed or principles of said religious organizations, but no person exempted shall be exempted from service in any capacity that the President shall declare to be non-combatant," etc.

It will be observed that in the law there is no recognition at all of conscience nor of the individual himself.

What is recognized is only religion and creed, and sect or organization. And it must be a well-recognized sect or organization at present organized and existing. If a person is a member of such, he may be exempt.

A man may be a sincere Christian whose whole soul revolts at the thought of war; but unless he be a member of a sect or organization whose creed or principles forbid its members to participate in war in any form, he is not included.

Also a person's own personal religious convictions are not recognized as ground for exemption; it must be his religious convictions against war that are in accordance with the creed or principles of the organization.

The government of the United States was originally founded on the rights of conscience and of the individual.

In this law all of that is completely ignored and is supplanted with creed and organization.—Religious Liberty.

There has been agitation in England looking to removal of the Heine commemorative tablet from London. This because Heine is classed as a German. But he was an Israelite and in religion would have been a Jew if he had not been a Freethinker. He was the author of the saying that "Judaism is not a religion; it is a misfortune." Nor was he Prussian in his sympathies. He wrote German poetry, but said: "I know not if I deserve that a laurel wreath should one day be laid on my coffin. Poetry, dearly as I loved it, has always been to me but a divine plaything. But lay on my coffin a sword, for I was a brave soldier in the war of liberation of humanity."

It is nobler and more unselfish for a man so to live and die as to secure immortality for an ideal than to gain it for himself.

NOTES AT LARGE.

A specimen of the stuff by means of which religious writers misinform their readers is quoted by a TRUTH SEEKER correspondent from a book called "Many Infallible Proofs" by Arthur T. Pier-son, D.D. Speaking in derogation of Voltaire as an opponent of Christianity, the reverend author says:

"A man whose motto was, 'Crush the wretch!' and yet who called on that same Christ in the dying hour; a man who, after leading the host of skeptics and scoffers, as the boldest of blasphemers for sixty years, died in agony and remorse so terrible that even the Mareschal de Richelieu fled from his bedside, declaring that he could not bear so terrible a sight, and M. Tronchin affirmed that 'the furies of Orestes could give but a faint idea of those of Voltaire'; a man who said to his attending physician, 'Doctor, I will give you half of what I am worth if you will give me only six months' life,' and who, when the doctor said, 'Sir, you cannot live six weeks,' shrieked, 'Then I shall go to hell, and you will go with me!' and soon after expired—such a man does not add much weight to his own objection."

The quotation begins with a falsehood and comes to an end without once telling the truth. Voltaire's motto, "Ecrasez l'infame," translated "Crush the wretch," or "Crush the infamous," had no reference to any Christ. By the "wretch" or the "infamous" Voltaire meant the Roman Catholic machine that murdered unbelievers and tortured and killed men who showed disrespect to its superstitions and its idols. This is a matter of history and common knowledge, and only the utterly ignorant can be made to believe anything else. The account of Voltaire's death is equally false. The truthful account is given in Parton's "Life of Voltaire" and is quoted in the pamphlet "Infidel Deathbeds" by G. W. Foote. The religious versions are inventions concocted for Sunday-school consumption. There is no authentic case of an Infidel recanting at death or dying in agony because of his unbelief. And even if there were, why should the clergy, by allusions thereto, invite the reply that their own savior died in the utmost agony and despair? In the prospect of death, "his sweat was as it were great drops of blood falling down on the ground" (Luke xxii, 44), while in the dying hour he exclaimed, "My God, my God! why hast thou forsaken me?" (Matthew xxvii, 46). Christians cannot afford to quote the dying words of Infidels; for if the apocryphal stories of the deathbed worries of Voltaire are fatal to the weight of his objections to Christianity, how annihilating to that faith must be the divinely-attested account of the mortal agony and despair of Christianity's founder?

Dr. William A. Shanklin, president of Wesleyan University, delivered the baccalaureate sermon before the graduating class of Columbia University, New York, on June 4. Among other things the speaker said that "this is a day of judgment. It is not Christianity that has failed, but the dreams of our materialistic civilization. These are tested and found wanting." It is most extraordinary that the persons who are deriving the greatest benefit from our modern civilization, and who are constantly claiming to have accomplished it, are themselves professors of Christianity. Such persons never lose an opportunity to assert that all that is best in the civilization of today is due to the Christian religion, while all its unworthy features must be traced to materialism and unbelief. This method of estimating things is quite in accordance with popular Christian morals, but it nevertheless records a lie, as does many another orthodox statement. The truth is found in the statement that the best that men are enjoying today in their social and economic life comes as a result of scientific advancement; and the worst phases of our present life are due to the superstition and ignorance which Christianity has fostered for more than a thousand years, including the present world-war in its commencement and in its heart-rending continuance. To confine the spirit of materialism to Germany alone, as if all the other Christian nations engaged in the strife were wholly free from such influence is completely to falsify the truth. The present war is one of Christian nations, and all the grasping and ambitious spirit which it is demonstrating is but a concrete expression of the intense love of the Christian church and Christian people generally for gold and worldly possessions. An institution that hasn't sufficient nobility about it to pay a legitimate tax upon its large holdings, ought to be the last one to attribute any objectionable phase of life to the failure of a materialistic purpose.

The speaker also dwelt upon the notion that "our civilization has ceased to be God-conscious." We should like to ask Dr. Shanklin to name any real result that has redounded to the lasting benefit of the world by the God-consciousness of the ages that are passed. We have always read that the truly great things that have acted as an inspiration to men to aim higher in their thoughts and endeavors came, almost invariably, from the body of intelligent unbelievers. An earlier age taught that it was by the study of nature that one learned to understand and appreciate nature's God; but now that the church is beginning to realize that by the study of the natural sciences men are losing confidence in its theological dogmas, men like the president of Wesleyan University tell us that "we have been feverishly engaged in exploiting the resources of the natural world and covetously competing with one another in so doing, forgetting our primal allegiance to the spiritual. We have been so busy with the external things of life that we have utterly forgotten what life itself is for, and to what end it shall be lived." There is one point to which the doctrines of all the Christian denominations converge, and it is distrust of this world and human nature, and every form of instruction that accords to them a special honor and dignity. The unnaturalness of Christianity is seen never more plainly than when it enters its protest against the beauty and harmony of the human body, and the glories of the sublime universe with which we find our life surrounded. To give up the study of this wonderful world for a heavenly country of which we have not sufficient data by which to determine even its location, would be a possibility wholly inconceivable but for the strange imaginings of the religious mind. If Christianity is being seriously endangered by the study of natural phenomena, the day is not far distant when it will everywhere cease to exist, for not even the persuasive powers of a Christian college president will be able to stay the progress of scientific discovery.

About a million dollars is going to be invested in a new Catholic cemetery not far from New York. The tract is described as comprising 225 acres "in one of the most beautiful sections of the Westchester hills." A paragraph in a newspaper dated June 3 says:

"Catholics in New York are soon to have 'the finest cemetery in the world'—to quote the exact words used by Cardinal Farley when, according to official announcement made yesterday, he commissioned Charles Wellford Leavitt, landscape architect and engineer to take charge of the esthetic and utilitarian developments of a great tract of land in the Westchester hills which the Cardinal has named the 'Cemetery of the Gate of Heaven.'"

Thus the tract will pass from the list of rafables (for cemeteries are untaxed in this state), and land that might be of use to the living is given over to the dead, who have no use for anything. Earth burial is continued as a custom largely by the influence of superstition, although in the case of the Catholic church the question is one of revenue, for the cardinal will get a dollar for every grave opened in the new cemetery, as he does in the old ones. The superstition back of earth burial is the idea of the bodily resurrection. The church argues that the cremation of the body will stand in the way of the rising at the last trump. As to the martyrs who died at the stake, the church admits that by miracle the ashes will be brought together in the resurrection, but this dispensation would not cover the cremated. That all bodies buried become dust in the course of time is overlooked in the philosophy of the church, which eventually will be forced to abandon inhumation by the refusal of the people to turn over any more land to the occupancy of the dead. The custom has already outlived its necessity, and there should be no more additions to the number of burying grounds now in existence and filled.

"Lost in New York" are words that might be used with substantial accuracy to describe the experience of the acrobatic evangelist in this city. We heard more of him in our newspapers when he was performing in other cities, and if he were not running a recruiting station here and expressing in his sermons an extravagant hatred of Germany, he might hardly be noticed. Some of the newspapers ignore him altogether. In the rest he takes his place in the day's news with the ball game and other "attractions." The most interesting report is that he will call on the Protestant ministers to close their churches Sunday mornings and give him their congregations, as he cannot consent to address audiences of three or four thousand in a tabernacle built to hold twenty thousand. Another symptom is the announcement that all expenses have been met by outside contributions and that shoving the pan will be discontinued. The method of raising the wind was not satisfactory in its results. At the start the evangelist promised amid applause that what was received above expenses would be given to the Young Men's Christian Association and the Red Cross Society. But there will be no surplus—only the deficit privately covered. Report is circulated that the evangelist is failing—losing his "pep." The interest in his performances is less now than at the beginning; the public is weary, and it would not be possible now to vend another Sunday Special and Revival Extra were we minded to issue one.

Sincerity of belief in "the promises" of religion is accurately diagnosed as insanity. A case of it comes from Oklahoma, reported in the newspapers under date of May 28 as follows:

"Israel Holt of Lequire, Okla., Holy Roller and self-styled prophet, is dead as the result of an attempt to perform a miracle by chopping off his leg and making it grow back on without medical attention.

"After three days of violent prayer and preaching, Holt worked himself into such a frenzy of religion that he handed his oldest son a common wood axe and ordered him to cut off his leg. The son was forced to strike three times before he chopped the limb away.

"The next day the Holy Roller family so far abandoned their religious beliefs as to call in a physician. Gangrene had set in from other wounds and he died within a few hours.

"There is a clan of Holy Rollers at Lequire. They have been conducting so-called religious meetings of late and have refused to allow physicians to treat them for any disease or wound, trusting in the ability of their 'prophet' to heal them. It was to demonstrate his power that he had his own leg chopped off."

If the power could restore the ear of the servant of the high priest shorn off by the sword of Peter, why not Mr. Holt's foot? There was an instance of misguided faith the other day in New York, when a car containing Mrs. Zederbaum of Dobbs Ferry struck a tree and carromed to a telephone pole, throwing the lady out on her head. Being a Christian Scientist, Mrs. Zederbaum objected to having a surgeon repair the damage to her scalp, or to set fractures in the bones or attend to the cuts and bruises of her children. It is a puzzle to know why one of these cults of delusion should be called Holy Rolling and the other Christian Science.

"In the providence of God," said President Wilson on Memorial Day, "America will once more have an opportunity to show to the world that she was born to serve mankind." When Mr. Wilson issued his proclamation of a state of war with Germany he said, "God helping me, I cannot do otherwise." (Martin Luther.) Now he claims that God is directing the affairs of the United States; which is but an echo of the kaiser's "God with us." We wish he were not so dependent on German sources. Germany has had God from the beginning; the founders of this secular republic retired him from politics, where his presence had been productive of the most deplorable consequences. Heraus mit ihm!

The organs of the Methodist church called Christian Advocates are published at a financial loss, report says, of about $50,000 a year. They lose money and subscribers in spite of the fact that they have subscription agents by the thousands in the Methodist ministers of the country. Religious papers are not what they were a generation ago, financially speaking. The Independent, one of the best known of them, saved its life by becoming a popular magazine. The Presbyterian Observer, which always stood by Cheetham's Life of Paine, failed some years since. The most successful of these orthodox Christian papers is said to be published by a Jew.

The "foreigners" in the midst of us are not the worst of pro-Germans. The Rev. Charles H. Lehnert, for nearly eighteen years pastor of a Methodist church in Minneapolis, Minn., was born in this country before the Civil War, but is a bitter enemy of the American government. Solicited to subscribe for a Liberty Bond, he wrote a vicious letter to the committee, in which he said, among equally bad things, that he hoped Wilson would be shot before the war was over. He was arrested and placed under $2,000 bonds charged with being the author of writings tending to incite to assassination. It seems strange that that sort of a reptile should be native to American soil.

Methodist ministers have protested to their bishops against the selection of the writings of Walter Rauschenbusch for a course of study by Methodist youth. Rauschenbusch is a Christian Socialist. Freethinking Socialists object to his dragging in Jesus in connection with Socialism, and the orthodox don't want Socialism associated with Jesus. Christian Socialism is like Christian Science in being neither one thing nor the other indicated by the words describing it.

Reading Maketh a Fuller Man than Organizing.

The disruption in the ranks of the Socialists caused by the resignation of John Spargo and others, and the spirit of unfriendly criticism which followed them on the part of their confreres, have caused both the members of the party and those outside to inquire more specifically than formerly as to the true representatives of the Socialist party. In other words, circumstances largely growing out of the war have aroused in people's minds a desire to know exactly what Socialism stands for. It is the normal trend of all human societies to split up into divisions after a short period of united life; and as a result the original ideas which apparently gave birth to the organization become greatly obscured, so that men no longer know the precise principles for which the society stands. Protestantism, which now numbers nearly 200 livisions in America, has failed hopelessly in its original purpose because of the spirit of disintegration which set in very soon after the publishing of its first creed. As a set of definite ideas it is absolutely valueless at this time, for it is impossible to learn from any source the exact meaning and purpose of the term. Every sect claims to represent the true and original Protestantism; and if there is any common feature at all in this phase of religionism, it would seem to be simply that Protestantism is not Romanism, which, of course, means practically nothing so far as edification is concerned.

These thoughts lead naturally to this inquiry: Is the requirement of the world today for a larger number of organizations among men, or for a more widespread dissemination of fundamental and therefore vital principles through the medium of a wise Rationalistic literature? Has not the world had already a surfeit of societies of one kind and another, which proved quite unavailable when the searching time arrived? There is oftentimes less to be hoped for, in the way of aid, from an organization, than from individual men scattered over a large area, but holding with an unrelated personal consciousness, and with the tenacity of conviction, principles wrought out from the vicissitudes of a real experience. Societies are, as a rule, poor educators. For if they change with the changing tide of thought, the result is inevitably division; but the individual, who realizes the true meaning of intelligence, will naturally grow in his opinions, changing them as wisdom requires, and without injury to the nobility of his manhood. We see no great value in churches nor in societies which—unconsciously it may be—perpetuate the church idea. Rationalistic organizations with Sunday schools are a manifest incongruity; and unusual societies teaching untried theories, or imported notions in no respect indigenous to the mental soil of our country, under the banner of pure Rationalism, are not calculated to advance the interests of that great cause for the maintenance of which not a few persons have given their all.

The need today is for a more perfect education of the individual heart and mind. A man may remain a lifetime in a society, and unless he enriches his mind with the wisdom gathered from a truly rational literature, he will be no more improved mentally and made capable to pass judgment upon the great issues of the day than if he had always remained in his cabin-home, among the mountains of his native village. Next to travel, there is nothing that so well enlarges the mind and broadens the mental vision as the thoughtful study of a good and useful book. It is for this purpose that the great works of Rationalism are published today. It is with this intention, not simply for gain, that such masterpieces of real literature as the works of Ingersoll, Büchner, Reade, Remsburg, Paine and many another are issued to the reading public at a low cost. The man who has not made himself familiar with the writings of some of these authors, has but a gloomy prospect of understanding present-day religious conditions. Attending the meetings of a society can never pass as a substitute for the perusal of the best works of Rationalism. What the world needs at this time is not an increase in the number of societies, but a decided increase in the number of those willing to read the literature of true Rationalism, and to scatter abroad the principles found therein. There is no call for more society men, but a clear and distinct call for more effective principles touching the conduct of life. That these are to be found in scientific Rationalism is the latest hope of the thoughtful among mankind.

THE TRUTH SEEKER

Published weekly by the Truth Seeker Company, President, George E. Macdonald; Secretary, James A. Conway, 62 Vesey street, New York.

Entered at the Postoffice, New York, N. Y., as second-class matter.

Address communications and make drafts, checks, postoffice and express money orders payable to THE TRUTH SEEKER, 62 Vesey street, New York.

Subscription Rates.

Single subscription in advance . . $3.00
Two new subscribers 5.00
One subscription two years in advance 5.00
One subscription and one new subscriber, in one remittance . . . 5.00
To all foreign countries except Mexico, 50 cents per annum extra.
Subscriptions received for any length of time under a year at the rate of 25 cents per month. Can be begun at any time. Single copies, 10 cents.

SPECIAL NOTICE.—We shall be obliged to our readers if they will send us the name and address of any Freethinker who is not a regular subscriber.

OBJECTS.

It is the object of THE TRUTH SEEKER to educate the people out of religious superstition. It denies the inspiration and infallibility of the Bible, and asserts the human origin of that book. It denies the existence of the theological heaven and hell, but as to the existence and immortality of the soul neither affirms nor denies. It waits for evidence.

THE TRUTH SEEKER upholds the theory of Evolution, believing that to be the solution of the question of the origin, growth, and development of the animal kingdom, including man. THE TRUTH SEEKER believes that the answer to the questions Whence? and Whither? can be given only by Science.

THE TRUTH SEEKER holds that morality and ethics—or man's relation to man—are entirely independent of creed or religion, and are founded on rules developed by experience.

In current politics THE TRUTH SEEKER takes no side or part. In general it holds to the principles of freedom enunciated by the Founders of the Republic.

THE TRUTH SEEKER believes in Free Speech, Free Press, and Free Mails; in full discussion of all sides of all subjects, and affords those having new and worthy thoughts, clearly stated, a generous and welcome hearing, each contributor being responsible for his own opinion. We neither indorse an idea by printing it, nor condemn it by exclusion.

THE TRUTH SEEKER is the recognized medium of communication between the Liberals of the country, and is edited each week for their information, instruction, entertainment, and support against religious error and mental slavery and in maintenance of their equal civil and religious rights as citizens of the United States.

The Editor invites communications on the subjects to which these pages are devoted.

POLITICAL PRINCIPLES.

(THE NINE DEMANDS OF LIBERALISM.)

1. We demand that churches and other ecclesiastical property shall be no longer exempt from taxation.
2. We demand that the employment of chaplains in Congress, in the Legislatures, in the navy and militia, and in prisons, asylums and all other institutions supported by public money shall be discontinued.
3. We demand that all public appropriations for educational and charitable institutions of a sectarian character shall cease.
4. We demand that all religious services now sustained by the government shall be abolished; and especially that the use of the Bible in the public schools, whether ostensibly as a text-book or avowedly as a book of religious worship, shall be prohibited.
5. We demand that the appointment by the President of the United States or by the governors of the various states, of all religious, festivals and fasts shall wholly cease.
6. We demand that the judicial oath in the courts and in all other departments of the government shall be abolished, and that simple affirmation under the pains and penalties of perjury shall be established in its stead.
7. We demand that all laws directly or indirectly enforcing the observance of Sunday as the Sabbath shall be repealed.
8. We demand that all laws looking to the enforcement of "Christian" morality shall be abrogated and that all laws shall be conformed to the requirements of natural morality, equal rights, and impartial liberty.

9. We demand that not only in the Constitution of the United States and of the several states, but also in the practical administration of the same, no privileges or advantages shall be conceded to Christianity or any other special religion; that our entire political system shall be founded and administered on a purely secular basis; and that whatever changes shall prove necessary to this end shall be consistently, unflinchingly, and promptly made.

Letters of Friends

Readers desirous of communicating with the writers of the letters in this department may address them in care of THE TRUTH SEEKER, 62 Vesey street, New York, N. Y., and the letters will be re-addressed and forwarded.

DR. FRANK CRANE AND THE CROSS.

From S. E. Hartmann, New Jersey.

To the Editor of The Truth Seeker:

At the dedication of a theological institution, our dignified President remarked, "Christianity is 'catchy.'" After two thousand years of Christianity, in the twentieth century, a century of science, we are told a religion has become "catchy." As a fact I think too "catchy."

The gutter evangelist, Billy Sunday, brought to this town the most dignified, beautiful, "Christian" and scholarly language, and this "catchy" disease "Christian-insanity" spread so quickly, that Dr. Frank Crane, who occasionally writes serious articles for the Evening Globe, wrote an editorial on May 26th with the title, "The Cross and the Sword," which would be a credit to Billy Sunday.

Since this "grab a nickel" evangelist and revival performer came to this town, it is a daily occurrence to see in print from all kinds of dignified religious ministers, priests, and preachers, the up-to-date language, in expressing their thoughts. It is a natural law that religion turns any man's mind in a topsy-turvy course. The different denominations are competing with one another to save souls, the language and manner is no question, the end justifies the means. They all cherish in their hearts, the reformation and the betterment of humanity.

In this editorial, Frank Crane wrote: "Notice how the Socialists fell in line when the kaiser barked, and all the intellectuals hastened to prostitute themselves at the bidding of junkerdom." Although of German parentage, I willingly admit that I have seen many dogs more useful than the kaiser, nevertheless a man loses his temper and self-respect, when he writes of an individual like Wilhelm II, "When the kaiser barked," especially when the kaiser is just as good a Christian in his conception as Dr. Frank Crane. Our Dr. Crane should be so much of a Christian as at least to love his enemies, and furthermore to give them their due credit, as I do not believe that Dr. Crane is ignorant that Wilhelm II is a man of intellect and a scholar of high standing.

In reference to the German intellectuals prostituting themselves at the bidding of junkerdom, our good-natured doctor ought to picture himself from the religious standpoint, as the German intellectuals in their nationality's standpoint. I beg leave to hope that Dr. Crane will not feel insulted because of the comparison I make forgetting who is who.

Coming to the title, "The Cross and the Sword," I take the impertinence to remind the doctor that nowhere in the new Testament does one of the four gospels intimate by a single solitary word that the supposed Jesus ever said, "Bring the cross." But the "sword; yes, 'sword'; this is the gift that Jesus brought to the world. (Matt. x, 34.)

"Think not that I come to send peace on earth; I came not to send peace, but a sword." Who shall we blame for force if Jesus distinctly proclaimed that his precious gift to humanity is the sword? The barking kaiser proclaimed, "Ich und Gott," the same as Jesus, "I and the father are one." Dr. Crane claims that the world is advanced by the cross, not the sword. If the doctor would realize it when he discards the sword Jesus brought on earth, and accredits the world's advancement to the cross, he is not a Christian. Now let us touch with our finger tips the progress the world has made with the cross.

The first progress of the cross is the brutal murder of Hypatia by the agents of Bishop Cyril. The second step was made by the great and holy Constantine, who saw the four words, "in hoc signo vinces," under the cross in the sky. This great saint of Christianity murdered:

Maximian, his wife's father.

Bassianus, his sister Anastasia's husband.

Licinianus, his nephew by Constantina.

Fausta, his wife.

Licinus, his sister Constantina's husband.

Sopater, his former friend.

Crispus, his own son.

The blood-thirsty murderer was the only one entitled to see the four words under the cross. I suppose that Constantine was recognized by the Lord as the forerunner and living example of Christian love, honor, and charity, who burnt and murdered with and for the cross. The crusades, the Spanish Inquisition, the witch burning, Luther, the burning of Savonarola, Joan d'Arc, Bruno, the Huguenots, each one of these was a step made as the cross advanced, leaving blood-marks in its footsteps.

Millions and millions were burnt for the cross in its advancement. But no intelligent man who has read history without ecclesiastical glasses, will separate the sword and cross.

Our dear friend Dr. Crane is suffering from a disease I discovered a few years ago, Christianinsanity. He needs a rest, and above all he needs the cold climate. Let him read and reread history, which belies his statement, because the world has advanced in spite of the cross and Christianinsanity!

When Constantine adopted the cross, and Christianity became the religion of the Roman empire, the Roman empire began to degenerate, Roman civilization, science, art, wisdom, pedagogy, oratory and all Roman culture vanished, as if the earth had swallowed it, or the devilish Paganism dragged it along. No trace was left of Roman greatness. The cross of Dr. Crane's, Jesus and Christianity came into power, and for over a thousand years everything was dark, and this age is called the dark ages. All branches of science were chained in dungeons, hidden from the rays of the sun. Truth was buried, and the cross, the sign of superstition and ignorance and murder, was the only thing Christianity allowed to be taught and spread, until Averroes, who is recognized today as the advance agent of the modern civilization, came. In the twentieth century, Dr. Frank Crane assumes the rôle of Hippocrates and dares to write that the world is advancing by the cross. He is not ashamed to impose upon the ignorant, claiming progress and advancement of the world for the cross, when still in the present day children are taught virgin birth, immaculate conception, resurrection, ascension, reincarnation, hell, heaven, and savior, ridiculous ideas, food for savages, and not for this modern age. The advancement of the cross made in Russia was so marvelous that eighty-six per cent. of the inhabitants were illiterate.

His article is out of date, today, when the light of freedom, and the precious jewel, reason, break their chains in darkest Russia, in the land where the beloved cross and Jesus, with an autocratic Czar, enslaved one hundred and seventy millions of human beings.

The incoherent utterances, parables, and contradictory sayings of the New Testament, supposedly said by Jesus, were good enough for the rabble of that age. Today, after two thousand years of delusion, civilized men ought to recognize Christianinsanity as a disease, coming from the lowest strata of civilization, environment, and habit of a race deluded with egoistic superstition, as the semi-barbaric race of the Jews were two thousand years ago.

The standard bearer of Christian progress, Billy Sunday, still claims the whole world exists for the Jews, and on the Jews hinges the happiness of the universe. A Jewish Christ will bring the millennium in Jerusalem, the holy Jewish Centre, but only when the Jews will turn from Judaism to Christianity. No wonder Jews have been persecuted, despised in every age. They deserved all, and more, for upholding peace on earth.

A FREETHOUGHT SECRET SOCIETY.

From T. S. Lukens, Ohio.

To the Editor of The Truth Seeker:

I note with much interest in THE TRUTH SEEKER a communication from a Worcester, Mass., gentleman, in which he advocates the founding of a Freethought secret society.

I can think of no real argument against such a society, while there are many in favor of it. Why should we not have such a society or lodge? It need not necessarily be a "secret" society in the strict meaning of that term, and yet it should be private—a place where one could go with the comforting thought that there he would meet congenial souls and be able to exercise his constitutional right of free speech without fear of police interference.

Ministers and commentators would have season tickets, thus enabling them at any time to drop in and show us the error of our ways. No doubt they would gladly avail themselves of the opportunity offered. Few, if any, ministers have ever turned down anything which cost them nothing.

Seriously, however, Mr. Editor, will you please give us an editorial on this subject? There are millions of Freethinkers in this broad land and we should unite in one body to hasten the inevitable, though as yet unseen, end of orthodoxy. Concerted action is what counts and the plan outlined by my Massachusetts comrade would afford opportunity to thousands to voice their sentiments and add their "bit" to the general fighting force. These thousands are now silent, because they have no medium of communication and cooperation.

[A similar letter bearing upon this subject has been received from H. W. Fesser, California.—Ed. T. S.]

THOUGHTS ON MARRIAGE.

From J. A. Wilson, California.

Editor of The Truth Seeker:

Your answer to L. M. H. in the Letter Box of May 12 prompts me to offer a few more observations on the subject under consideration. First of all, let me praise your fairness in permitting all correspondents to express their views freely, whether they agree with your own or not. You must have noticed that it is always the conservative, not the radical, who wishes to have the other fellow suppressed.

I never contended that unmarried couples could get along any more harmoniously living together than married couples could. I think your mother was right. My argument is, that when they can't live together harmoniously it is easier to separate if they are not legally tied together.

Every rational mind must admit that were all marriage laws abolished, every couple desirous of living together and confining their sex relations to each other exclusively, would have just as good an opportunity to do so as they have under marriage. No advocate of Freedom would deny them that right, even though they fought like cats and dogs, as many married couples do now. I will admit that there are many who do not appear to be much disturbed by these fights and some couples seem actually to enjoy them. The fact that there are people so stupid or so coarse that matrimonial quarrels do not trouble them, is no reason why intelligent, refined, sensitive persons should be compelled to live together when conditions are not harmonious.

Any fair-minded person would be satisfied, if given an opportunity, to live with his mate or not, no matter what the conditions. Clearly, then, it is only those who are not fair-minded who would compepeople who have sexual associations, to live together, permanently mated, no matter how galling the conditions might be.

Nearly all advocates of marriage admit the correctness of the argument that under freedom unhappy couples could easily separate; indeed they cite that fact as a reason why people should not be free; thus they admit that all marriage can do is to compel unhappy couples to remain unhappy.

Whether or not people are as unhappy living together in freedom as they are in marriage does not affect the argument for freedom; for if they are unhappy and persist in living together it is their own affair. As a matter of fact the most of them would separate, and this the compulsionists admit, as before stated. Judging by the large and constantly increasing number of applications for divorce, it is plain to see that there are not as many people as there used to be who are too stupid to have any desire for freedom.

I am not advocating the idea of couples living together, whether married or not. While admitting the right of all to do so, I doubt the wisdom of it. Indeed, I think the strongest argument against marriage is the fact that people cannot live together without losing their individuality, or one of them becoming a boss. If ever a fact was demonstrated it is this: Love is a tender, hothouse plant. It won't stand the frost of housekeeping nor the harsh winds of business. "Oh," some one will say, "I want a love strong enough to survive through all the storms of life." Yes, we all want it, but that isn't the slightest reason that we will get it. It is well to recognize facts, and follow the lines of least resistance. Marriage has been tried for thousands of years. It is an admitted failure. Every young man who begins to drink thinks his brain is a little stronger than anybody else's. Others have become drunkards, but he can control his appetite. We know the result. So with the boys and girls who would marry. They see that their fathers and mothers are mere business partners. Romance left long ago. They hear sarcastic remarks passed back and forth, which, if they had been made before marriage, would brought their courtship to an end then and there. And yet, as you remarked, they do not listen to arguments. They have overestimated their qualities. Why then do I argue? Because I believe by continually pounding; after a while a few will listen. Perhaps your correspondent (L. M. H.) will live to thank me. Now, if this plant doesn't prove to be the strong plant that you thought it was, you have lost it entirely. Instead of exposing it to the cruel blasts, why not recognize its limitations, protect it, and enjoy its beauty? Would you throw away a lily because it could not endure a temperature of ten degrees below zero? No, you would say: "That's a beautiful flower; let's keep it where it will live, that we may enjoy its beauty a long time."

It is not in the nature of things for people to think alike on all subjects, and when lovers live apart is isn't necessary to their happiness that they do think alike. But they must think alike when they live together or there is discord. There is practically no end to the questions which come up in housekeeping and business, and those who are foolish enough to think that they can always agree, will find themselves sadly disappointed. But somebody says each one should "give in" a little. Of course, that is just what they must do to avoid a fight, but every time they "give in," a little of the love "gives out." No person with any strength of character is willing to be continually sacrificing that character, and no kind, considerate, sensitive person will wish to have another sacrifice his or her individuality for his or her sake. A compromise is still worse. In that case neither is pleased. Sacrifice and compromise may prevent an open rupture, but every time they are made they leave, as someone said, a "dark brown taste in the mouth," and push romance a little farther out of the window. All this would be unnecessary if lovers lived by themselves.

Another reason why living together is undesirable is because it makes life too narrow. Throughout all nature, variety is the charm of existence. The most conservative will admit that in all things, except love affairs, variety is a virtue. "If all people were Quakers," said Paine, "what a drab world this would be." It isn't reasonable to suppose that there is just one exception to the rule that "variety is the spice of life," and when people get rid of their ideas which have no basis whatever outside of superstition or priestcraft, they will realize that there is no exception to that rule.

What would you think of a law that compelled a man, because when he was 21 years of age he liked fried oysters better than any other food, to eat nothing but fried oysters all the rest of his life? I think, by the time he was forty, he would have as great a loathing for them as the Israelites had for quail. If, in order to get a bite of some other kind of food, he were obliged to sneak around and steal from garbage cans, it wouldn't be wondered at if he sometimes got hold of something which made him sick. Then the law makers would point out the "sinister influence" of those who advocated a variety of food. Of course, it wouldn't occur to them that their laws had made it impossible for him to make a proper selection of food.

What is "running loose" among men, anyway? If it means indiscriminate sex association I know of no one who advocates it. Any person who is rational enough and liberal enough to advocate freedom, would naturally be sane enough to favor moderation and discrimination. If "running loose" means that men and women are to use their own judgment in sex matters, instead of allowing priests and preachers to burden them with their restrictions which are founded upon the lie that sex is vile, then by all means, run loose. To be loosened from tyrannical laws, founded on ignorance and maintained by brutality, would be the greatest blessing imaginable.

If a woman cannot find any other course than to be a marriage slave or an ordinary prostitute without becoming "unusual," then I would say be all means be unusual. There is no need of becoming the sex slave of anybody, either for a short time or for a long time. The "unusual" woman will be clean, independent, discriminating, moderate, kind, affectionate, and the only basis for intercourse will be mutual desire and mutual benefit.

THE POLICE ARGUMENT.

From H. Schaffer, California.

To the Editor of The Truth Seeker:

Kindly suggest some remedy how to escape from the holy reverend gentlemen that have infested our beautiful city of Fresno. Not a week passes but some minister comes to save. Before we get rid of one holy evangelist another one crops up, having our two daily papers backing them and the racket is so great that I am afraid since the last one arrived, by the name of Rev. G. C. "Dynamite Adams" as he styles himself, that one fine morning Jesus might drop in on us and save our city, and all of us will be washed in the blood of Jesus.

By the way, I will relate an incident that happened this week. Hearing of the racket made about the last humbug such as "Dynamite Adams" riding around town in an automobile, announcing that he, himself "Dynamite Adams," will speak at the Court House Park about the holy, divine book, the Bible, I decided to take in the show. After listening to his expounding the holy book, and sending everybody that does not believe in Jesus and his word to a literal hell, the writer asked permission to refute and correct his misstatements made. He refused. I challenged him to debate the question as to the authenticity and reliability of the Bible, and he asked, "Whom do you represent?" I replied that I represent truth, and as somebody must tell the truth about the Bible, I feel that I am qualified to do it. Again he refused. Not giving him a chance to dodge the issue, he finally consented to debate the next evening. Some of my Rationalist friends were a little skeptical about his accepting and predicted that he would find some excuse or loophole by which to escape. On the following evening I was "Johnny on the spot," ready to charge with my batteries of facts against the fort of superstition.

But wait, the saint holy and divine was there ready with—whom do you imagine? Lo and behold! Jesus in the form of a policeman, saying that as I have no permit, I cannot speak—a real Christian method. Can you beat it? So it is all along the line, you cannot make them come out in the open, they know why?

I write this just to let you know that in this far away burg we are trying to do our mite in destroying the cobwebs of the superstitious, hypnotized masses. We are planning to organize a club so by concerted action we may be able to accomplish some good.

MIND AND MATTER.

From D. S. Prentice, Indiana.

To the Editor of The Truth Seeker:

I am an old man and believe myself to be a philosopher and sound reasoner. I am going to make an assertion and then prove it to be true, or shall expect some of the intellectuals who feel sure that nature, or God—as it may be—is not a planning and designing force, to show the fallacy of my argument. I assert that mind and matter are equally eternal. Mind designs and plans all of nature's works. Mind cannot produce matter or matter mind.

Here is the proof. Man is the highest product of nature and hence the best representative of nature. To choose any lower product than the highest would be not only foolish but unfair. But man is a designer; all he does is by design. He plans for years to come, yea even plans designs to be matured beyond the farthest limit of his life.

If then man, nature's highest product, is a designer, did nature not design him for that end? If not, then nature becomes the impossible creator, who out of that design, plan or thought, produces a creature who by thought alone employs his busy life and forces nature's laws to aid the consummation of his plans. Vain is our effort to lift the veil that enshrouds infinity, and yet another million years may come and go and man invent and think and plan and grow and then perhaps, we cannot see or know. But then the infinite himself the truth may show.

Mind and matter are two separate and distinctly different forms, coexistent and necessary to each other, but there exists in neither the power to create or augment the other. But although as yet we lack the power to comprehend the infinite, it may come. We shall grow.

SENSITIVE TO "SPIRITS."

From D. F. Sweetland, Illinois.

To the Editor of The Truth Seeker:

Slater and Maggie Waite are now tapping the "spirit" world in Chicago. Slater calls it "hearing from the other side of life," and for rapid fire "spirit communion" is declared to be the best in the business. Maggie holds forth in the Masonic Temple every Sunday night. They both have Anna Eva Fay beaten, as they have no known assistants and are not blindfolded.

Maggie gives what purports to be a description of dead relatives, giving their names. She says that their "spirits" are desirous of communicating with a person in the audience, which Maggie points out and asks if the description and names are correct, and they invariably answer yes. In getting the names Maggie says she sees stars and the letters which comprise the names are mixed up with the stars.

Slater does the same stunts but doesn't see any stars. He is quicker and will answer four or five times as many questions as Maggie. His method of operation is for persons to write questions, seal them in an envelope with something on the outside for identification, and deposit them on a table on the stage. Slater picks up an envelope and answers the question before opening the envelope, describes your departed, gives names, etc. Sometimes he misses fire when he will leave the platform and go to the victim and succeed in puzzling him. In passing along the aisle he told a woman that she would "give birth to a baby boy inside of three weeks." The "spirits" seemed to be quite fresh. The Melting Pot, a St. Louis paper, publishes an account of a Los Angeles chocolate blonde of African descent who is said to have given birth to a boy baby by the third person of the Trinity. A friend informs me that a south-side lady claims to have had a boy baby by the fourth person in the Trinity—the devil; and the neighbors agree that the baby looks the part. Isn't it strange that these conceptions are always boys. These divinities don't seem to be any good on girls.

Slater got one question that he said was improper; his control might be offended so he would pass it up. There was about two feet of envelopes and he reached about thirty questions. He claims he was born sensitive to "spirits"; a "spirit" passing anywhere near him would cause him to vibrate when he would open up conversation with them. He is quite a puzzle to what Prof. Wilksboro calls a "cheap organism."

A NEW SOCIETY IN BUFFALO.

From Geo. Lowe, New York.

To the Editor of The Truth Seeker:

The Society for Promoting Rational Ethics, an organization recently formed in Buffalo, celebrated May 30 by giving a banquet in honor of the memory of Thomas Paine. Seventy-five admirers of the author of the "Age of Reason" attended the feast, and showed by their enthusiasm that the patriot-hero is in no danger of being forgotten.

Addresses were made by Dr. Gustav A. Pohl, Rev. Richard W. Boynton, of the First Unitarian Church, and the present writer. Each had much to say in praise of the man who did so much for the cause of American independence, and for the intellectual freedom of humanity.

Twelve applications for membership in the society were received at the close of the speechmaking, so the committee which had made the arrangements for the occasion felt that the hard work done had been amply repaid.

This society was formed last March, with a membership of twenty-three. Meetings have since been held every first and third Thursday in the month, with the result that we now have seventy members. We should like to have all readers of THE TRUTH SEEKER who live in Buffalo join us in the work of dispelling the gloomy clouds of superstition which still darken the mental horizon.

Our officers are: President, Gus. H. Lang; Vice-President, Dr. Gustav A. Pohl; Treasurer, Mrs. J. Sherman Britt, and Secretary, George Lowe. Anyone wishing for information regarding the society may address me at 84 Garner avenue, Buffalo, N. Y.

RELIGION CONDEMNED.

From A. Johnson, Washington.

To the Editor of The Truth Seeker:

Though I may not be classed as "prominent," I have decided opinions on the questions asked by Dr. J. Danforth Taylor [TRUTH SEEKER, May 19.] As brevity is the soul of newspaper space, I'll reply in as few words as possible.

"Do you believe in any kind of a God?" No. This is bunk used to bunko fools. "Future existence?" No. Oblivion. The soul is an asset of the clergy for revenue only. "Why do you condemn Christianity?" Because it is the world's greatest criminal. No man can commit a greater crime than the priesthood, who crucify the minds of little children. It makes them incapable of reason in after life—fools for Christ's sake.

CAN JESUS SAVE? By W. E. Clark.

Third reprint. The author got hold of a good idea and worked it out ably. Price 5 cents.

CHILDREN'S CORNER FOR BOYS AND GIRLS YOUNG AND OLD

"Between the dark and the daylight,
When the night is beginning to lower,
Comes a pause in the day's occupations
That is known as the Children's Hour."

FREETHOUGHT CALENDAR.

CONDUCTED BY FRANKLIN STEINER.

Harriet Martineau, June 12, 1802. June 27, 1876.

Harriet Martineau, the greatest of all woman Freethought writers, was born in Norwich, England, June 12, 1802. The family was of Huguenot extraction and held Unitarian views religiously. Her brother, James Martineau, was the great English leader of this liberal Christian denomination during the nineteenth century. Her father, who was a manufacturer, died in 1826, leaving his family a small inheritance which was lost through the failure of the house where it was invested. All of the family were obliged to work. Harriet was sickly as a child, and at the age of twenty was completely deaf. This informally prevented her from teaching, so she took up authorship, beginning to write, in 1821, for the Monthly Repository, a Unitarian magazine. Her first book was a religious one, published in 1823, and entitled "Devotional Exercises and Addresses, Prayers and Hymns." Her literary work at first was not remunerative, and she added to her income by needle work. In 1830 she won three prize essays of the Unitarian Association, and the year following published "Illustrations of Political Economy," a book that had a big sale and fixed her status in the literary world. In 1832 Miss Martineau moved to London, where she became acquainted with Hallam, Milman, Malthus, Monckton, Milne, Sydney Smith, Bulwer, Carlyle and others famous in the world of letters. In 1834 she visited the United States, where she was horrified at seeing African slavery condoned by the public in general and by the church in particular. She did not hesitate to express openly her sympathy with the abolitionists. For this she was publicly insulted in the staid religious city of Boston. Returning to England, she wrote two books on her travels and an article for the Westminster Review on "The Martyr Age in America," which treated on the persecutions the abolitionists were suffering. After publishing a novel, "Deerbrook," in 1839, Miss Martineau completely broke down in health and was an invalid until 1844, when she was restored to health by a course of mesmeric treatment. She tells of this in her "Letters on Mesmerism." Her tour with some friends in 1846 through Palestine, Egypt and Syria furnished the material for "Eastern Life, Present and Past." In this work she shows how, in the progress of knowledge, our ideas of God, religion and our conception of the world change, and while she does not expressly say so, she intimates that philosophical Atheism will be the goal reached by man. She wrote, in 1849, for the well-known London publisher Charles Knight, the "History of the Thirty Years' Peace"

(1816-1846). This was a popular history from the standpoint of a radical. Her next work was an English version of Comte's "Positive Philosophy" (1853). From 1852 to 1866 she was a regular contributor to the Daily News and the Westminster Review. The work by which Miss Martineau is best known appeared in 1851, entitled "Letters on the Laws of Man's Nature and Development," a correspondence between herself and H. G. Atkinson. Here, while not, like Herbert Spencer, denying a first cause, she declares it to be unthinkable and unknowable. She died June 27, 1876. All must admit that Harriet Martineau was a wonderful woman, and possessed not only a marvelous intellect but great moral courage, when that quality was possessed by but few. Samuel P. Putnam well says ("Four Hundred Years of Freethought," p. 487): "She was the equal of any man of her time in variety of accomplishments, vast learning, felicity of expression, and range of thought. . . . She was a noble defender of our Union in the great Civil War. She kept the heart of England warm for liberty and justice. She was the friend of the down-trodden, and she dared to express the most unpopular convictions."

Other events of which the past week is the anniversary are:

- June 10. Atlantic telegraph fleet land, 1858. Landing of Dutch in New York, 1607.
- June 11. Copernicus died, 1543. Catholics interfere with street preaching in New York City, riot, 1854. Committee appointed to draw up the Declaration of Independence, 1776.
- June 12. Jesuit expelled from Germany, 1872. World's Anti-Slavery Convention in London, 1840. Wm. Cullen Bryant died, 1878.
- June 13. Bennett monument dedicated, 1884. Treaty with China, 1858.
- June 14. Leopardi died, 1837. National flag of U. S. adopted, 1777. Washington appointed commander-in-chief of Continental Army, 1775.
- June 15. Margaret Jones executed by Puritans for witchcraft, Boston, 1648.
- June 16. Boccaccio born, 1313.

Birds that Never Get Tired.

The birds that make their summer home far up in the north around the Arctic Ocean fly far to the southward when the summer is over and scarcely stop until they have reached lands that are only a few hundred miles from the South Pole. In making this wonderful journey over sea and land they travel in a short time nearly half around the world, or about 11,000 miles. These are the terns or sea-swallows and they are the greatest long-distance travelers among all the birds. So much do they like the long bright days that they have been called the "sunshine birds."

Another of the tireless bird travelers is the storm petrel, which sailors call "Mother Carey's Chicken." These birds fly so close to the water that at times they seem to be walking up and down the waves. An interesting story is told about a storm petrel that followed a steamer all the way across the Atlantic. One of the passengers had caught the bird, tied a bit of red ribbon around its neck, and released it. Seldom was it out of sight of the passengers, who could readily distinguish it among others of its kind. When only a few miles from New York, the little petrel disappeared, perhaps to follow another steamer back again to the other side.

Taken at Her Word.

A maiden lady of uncertain age became very indignant when the census-taker asked her age.

"Did you see the girls next door," she asked—"the Hill twins?"

"Certainly!" replied the census man.

"And did they tell you their age?"

"Yes."

"Well," she snapped, "I'm just as old as they are!"

"Oh, very well!" said the census man; and he wrote down—"Sarah Stokes—as old as the hills!"

A Modest Young Scholar.

This morning I had a pleasant time while waiting in the blacksmith shop for my horse to be shod. Often thus in town I hear men conversing on topics that to me are a grateful change from farm talk.

We were engaged in a discussion of some phases of the great war, when a newcomer took a hand, and soon we men saw that we would better keep still and listen. He is a child, a boy of twelve years, but he can give one a history of the war up to date, with the movements of the chief forces and the geography of the country. But the most delightful thing about the little fellow is his perfect honesty. He does not talk for effect; he uses no arts. He merely states his facts in a modest and gentlemanly way. He is a boy whose father is in business in the city. They live in the country, and Tommy attends a country school. He is a reader and a thinker. He says frankly, "I am against Germany. I am for France and Belgium," yet he is ready to give due credit to the Central Powers, and is too candid to try to defend England against charges of land-hunger, insufferable snobbery and cold-blooded selfishness.

Later in the day I had a discussion with a man of perhaps thirty-five years of age, and he gave me all sorts of sophistries and evasions showing a total lack of what Dr. Ostwald would, I think, call "inner honesty." And I have been comparing the two controversialists, the child and the man, and admiring the former while despising the latter.

How good it would be for society could we have a large proportion of our adult citizens as honest and fair-minded as is little Tommy! What an abundance of good material for officeholders, lawyers, judges, jurymen! And could we not have them were but our children rightly taught and trained?

Speaking in praise of Tommy to a German-American neighbor of his, I received as an answer: "Yes; but he is against Germany." Is it because I agree with Tommy that I like his talk? PHIL.

The Sultan's Treasure.

Of idle riches probably no greater amount is to be found in any city than that lying in safe deposit in Constantinople. In the Green Vaults of the Porte lies hidden away what is perhaps the greatest treasure the world has seen collected for ages and hoarded away from sun and sight, says the San Francisco Argonaut. The greed of twenty-eight generations of sultans, with their heritages, has made this treasure what it is. Nobody knows just how much value is there, for the treasures are zealously guarded night and day, and the only hint as to their value is the rumors which leak out now and then to the resident population. The store appears to consist mainly of jewels, set and unset, and ornaments of church or state.

Worth Seeing.

Mr. Swankley had been a great traveler and couldn't keep quiet about it. Everything reminded him of something else that took place in Timbuctoo or the Cannibal Isles. His friend Martin was admiring a beautiful sunset one evening. "Ah," said Swankley, "you should just see the sunsets in the East!" "I should like to," said Martin. "The sun always sets in the West in this ordinary old country."

It Was Probably True.

In the language class among other words for sentence making was the word "terror." Little Emma, the youngest member of the class, handed in the following:

"I went to church yesterday and there was a new terror in the choir."—Harper's Magazine.

A Famous Saying.

A schoolboy composition on Patrick Henry contained the following gem: "Patrick was not a very bright boy. He had blue eyes and light hair. He got married and then said, 'Give me liberty or give me death.'"

She Knew Her Scott.

"Are you fond of literature?" he asked. (We find the record of this conversation in The Publisher's Weekly.)

"Passionately," she replied.

"Then you must admire Sir Walter Scott," he exclaimed with sudden animation. "Is not his 'Lady of the Lake' exquisite in its flowing grace and poetic imagery?"

"It is perfectly lovely," she assented, clasping her hands in ecstasy. "I suppose I have read it a dozen times."

"And Scott's 'Marmion,'" he continued, "and 'Peveril of the Peak?'"

"I just dote upon them," she replied.

"And Scott's Emulsion?" he continued hastily, a faint suspicion dawning upon him.

"I think," she interrupted rashly, "that's it's the best thing he ever wrote."

A Bulky Sum.

When someone observed that the two billion dollars the government is raising by the sale of Liberty Bonds was a "heap of money," the calculating passenger on the railway train produced his pencil and on the margin of his evening paper figured out the problem as follows: If two billion in silver dollars were packed in boxes a foot square, outside dimensions, the number of boxes required would be 485,908. Each box would hold $4,116. The boxes would make a pile 972 feet long, 50 feet wide and 10 feet high. For their manufacture there would be needed 2,916,000 feet of lumber and 120,000 pounds of nails.

Disabling the Line.

A German captain of engineers, says I. K. Dawson in the Scientific American, told how he once sent a green corporal and three men back with instructions to put a railroad station completely out of commission so that it could by no possible means be of use to the enemy. The corporal rejoined the command in a surprisingly short time considering the nature of his task. The captain asked if he had carried out his instructions. "Ja, wohl, Herr Hauptmann," said the corporal, "the Russians will never be able to use that station again. You see," pointing to a large sack on his back, "I have carried away all the tickets."

Enforced Happiness.

The boy of eight or nine years sitting by his mother at the movies had grown restless and finally received this rebuke and admonition from his mother:

"Set still! You think that I am going to pay ten cents to get you in here and then have you squirm and wriggle around like an eel and fuss all of the time? Now you've got to set still and enjoy yourself if I have to break ev'ry bone in your body to make you do it. You hear me?"

In Doubt.

Patsy—Hallo, Mike! They tell me that yer sither that was afther marryin' Donovan last year is a happy mother this mornin'?

Mike—That's so.

Patsy—Is it a boy or gurr! that it is?

Mike—Ah, sure, I don't know! Isn't it meself that's jist goin' up to the house to see whether it's an uncle or an aunt I am?

A Hint.

In the midst of all your hurry,
And your worry and your flurry,
In the pressure of your shovin'
Take a little time for lovin'
Just a-lovin' of your fellows on the way
You will find if you begin it
And keep at it for a minute
There's a lot of profit in it
That will cheer the darkest day
And endue your weary spirit with the joyousness of May.

—Bangs.

Road to Happiness.

"To be thankful for the morning sunlight, for your neighbor's smile, for the pure sweet air; to be glad of the day's work and the power to do it, to be content with what you have, to live each day better than the last—surely this is the road to happiness."

THE LETTER BOX.

F. O. HAYES, Kansas.—Popular Astronomy is published at Carleton College, Northfield, Minn.; ten numbers per year; annual subscription $3.50. Your thanks for this information are accepted.

WILLARD BALLAM, Utah.—We bow to you as an instructor in the use of die oder das. German grammar is a swamp we have not attempted to penetrate. A merit of the English tongue is that it has no grammar except that which has been thrust upon it. We found in the German title of Haeckel's "Riddle of the Universe" the article die standing before "Welträthsel," and took a chance on its being correct. That "das Welträthsel" should be purely monistic and "die Welträthsel" purely dualistic, as you allege, excites our astonishment. Maybe after all, the riddle of the universe is German grammar.

MARGARET SANGER, Room 2004, 104 Fifth Avenue, New York.—We approve the extension of freedom of speech and press to include the right to disseminate birth-control information. Such information should be as legitimate as its opposite, how to promote family increase. But being a birth-control promoter or advocate is another story. So we could put no enthusiasm into the distribution of your entertaining and instructive pamphlets, with their attractive illustrations, not feeling sure that the world would be better off with fewer births than with more. We should like to see our sons raise ten children each.

J. B. GALBRAITH, Texas.—From our "standpoint" the beast of Revelation cannot be identified unless we know who was the writer of the book of Revelation and whom he had in mind when he numbered the brute. If as the Catholics say he is Luther, and if as the Protestants contend he is the pope, and if as has lately been set forth he is the German emperor, he must be a trinity, or a bird, as Boyle Roche would remark—being in three places at once. If you spell the title of the pope, Vicarius Filii Dei, and give to the letters V, I, C, L, and D as they occur the value they have in the Roman numerals, the sum will be 666, which is the number of the beast. This is a Seventh-day Adventist demonstration.

CHARLES SMITH, West Virginia.—Dr. Alonzo T. Jones, being a Seventh-day Adventist, is sound on the question of church and state; but as he believes everything he finds in the Bible he is likely to be misled when he depends upon that book. For example, he quotes Isaiah xxxviii, 8, to prove that science is wrong when it credits Anaximander (610 B. C.) with the invention of the sun-dial. He thinks the passage about the sun going down in the dial of Ahaz proves that the device was known in Jerusalem 150 years before Anaximander lived. On the other hand, Prof. T. K. Cheyne, who writes on the word "dial" in the Encyclopedia Biblica, affirms that sun-dial is not indicated by the language of the text, the word so translated meaning step. The idea is that the sun, or the shadow it cast, went down certain steps, possibly those of the king's palace, as the sun swung around; and the miracle was in making the shadow go back up the steps. "We must at any rate," says Professor Cheyne, "abandon the view that a dial with concentric circles and a central gnomon was meant."

THE CHRISTIAN MYTHOLOGY

A Work that Traces the Principal Features of the Christian Religion to Their Source in the Mythologies of Older Religions.

By BRIGHAM LEATHERBEE
Illustrated.

A feature of the work is the uncovering of the phallic principles in Christianity, to which the key is given in a series of illustrations.

"The Christian Mythology" is printed on light but substantial paper, convenient in size, handsomely bound in cloth, with gold sidestamp, and is provided with a sufficient index and a Bibliography that guides the reader to works drawn upon as authorities. The unpretentious little volume will bring light to thousands who know nothing about the origin of the dogmas they believe or the rites they practice.

Published by

The Truth Seeker Co.
62 Vesey Street New York
Price, 75 cents

The Ingersoll Birthday Book

Selections by
GRACE LELAND MACDONALD

(Mrs. G. E. Macdonald)
Preface by EVA INGERSOLL-BROWN.
(Granddaughter of Ingersoll)
Decorations by PAUL F. BERDANIER.
Cover by HUGH HENNESSY.
Printed in Color on Cameo Plate Coated
Sepia Paper, 252 pages, Octavo.
Descriptive Circular sent free on application.

PRICE, $1.65 POSTPAID
The Truth Seeker Company
62 Vesey Street, New York

This Is the Book We Have Been Waiting For

The Belief In God and Immortality

A STATISTICAL STUDY

By JAMES H. LEUBA
Professor of Psychology and Pedagogy in Bryn Mawr College.

The work is the result of an inquiry among men of science — biologists, sociologists, historians, psychologists — as to whether they believe or want to believe in a prayer-answering God and in continuance of life after death. The answer is altogether different from what might be expected in view of the frequent affirmations of the supernaturalists that belief in Christianity, or at least its fundamental dogmas, is held by the majority of the men of science.

It puts into the hands of Freethinkers exactly the information they want on that subject, with the facts and figures verifying it.

As a logical conclusion, founded upon the general aspect of the case, we have held that science leads its votaries to a rejection of such undemonstrable propositions as the existence of gods and the survival of the "soul" when the body is dead. Here we have the evidence, in statistical form, which confirms our view.

To the inquiry into the attitude of the scientists there are added statistics regarding the thought of college students regarding the same religious dogmas.

The author is himself a man of science, an authority in his special branch, which is Psychology, and he knows and sets forth the origin and history of the beliefs with which he deals.

No recent book has attracted more attention from the press, or presented such a serious problem to the supernaturalists.

Cloth, 8vo., $2, postpaid
Sold by
The Truth Seeker Company
62 Vesey Street, New York

MIRACLES OF SCIENCE. A Record of Scientific Progress in This Century. By Henry Smith Williams. Price $2. Postage 15 cents.

FOURTH EDITION
THE BIBLE

By John E. Remsburg

Eleven Chapters on the Authenticity of the Bible—Thirteen on the Credibility of the Bible—Ten on the Morality of the Bible, with an Appendix of Unanswerable Arguments Against the Divine Origin and in Favor of the Human Origin of the Bible : : : :

Twenty-six Pages of Index, enabling the reader to refer in an instant to any authority quoted or Argument used by the Author.

The book makes some five hundred pages, and is printed handsomely on heavy paper, with wide margins.
Price, $1.25 net.

The Candle from Under the Bushel

(Mark iv, 21); or,

1,306 Questions to the Clergy

And for the Consideration of Others.

Instructive, Interesting, and Laughable.

By WILLIAM HART

Price, paper, 50 cents; cloth, $1.00.

Address THE TRUTH SEEKER CO.

MYTH AND LEGEND IN THE BIBLE.

By Keighley Snowden.

A valuable handbook for those who desire to keep handy a clear statement of the most assured results of modern thought as applied to the critical examination of the Bible.

Price, cloth, $1.50.

Address, THE TRUTH SEEKER CO.,
62 Vesey St., New York.

SELF-CONTRADICTIONS OF THE BIBLE. By W. H. Burr. One hundred and forty-four propositions embodying the most palpable and striking self-contradictions of the Bible with a summary. Price 15 cents.

THE FOURTH DEMAND. Religious Teaching in Public Schools, with Reasons Why It Should Be Abolished. By Woolsey Teller. This is a fresh and up-to-date discussion of the subject. Price 10 cents.

DESIGN ARGUMENT. Anatomically and Physiologically Considered. By an East Indian. Per copy, 10 cents; fifteen copies, $1.

ANTICHRIST. By Ernest Renan. Paper. 50 cents; cloth, $1.00.

ASMODEUS; or, THE DEVIL UPON TWO STICKS. By A. R. Le Sage. Translated from the French. With 14 illustrations. Paper, 50 cents.

The R. P. A. ANNUAL 1917

LIST OF CONTRIBUTIONS:

RELIGION AFTER THE WAR
Arnold Bennett

WILL ORTHODOX CHRISTIANITY SURVIVE THE WORLD WAR?

An attempt at Forecast by Representative Humanists: Sir Ray Lankester, Leonard Huxley, John A. Robson, Sir Bryan Donkin, Hon. John Collier, Professor J. B. Bury, Henry W. Nevinston, Sir H. H. Johnston, H. de Vere Stacpoole, and Right Hon. J. M. Robertson, M.P.

THEOLOGY AND THE WAR...
William Archer

THE GREATEST ILLUSION...
Adam Gowans Whyte

PRE-ANIMISM...Edward Clodd

THE NEOLITH: A POEM.....
Eden Phillpotts

THE PAPACY DURING THE RENAISSANCE
Joseph McCabe

WATCHMAN, WHAT OF THE NIGHT? ...Charles T. Gorham

Sold at
THE TRUTH SEEKER OFFICE
Or sent postpaid for 40 cents per copy

TENTH EDITION.
Crimes of Preachers

A RECORD OF THE CLERGY WHO HAVE COMMITTED CRIMES AND IMMORALITIES.

As was said of previous editions, the record is startlingly instructive and will open the eyes of the people, proving as it does that in thousands of cases the Bible and the Christian religion have totally failed to keep even their exponents from committing acts of grossest immorality and deeds of darkest crime.

Cover in colors. 247 pages.

PRICE, 35 CENTS

Address, THE TRUTH SEEKER CO.,
62 Vesey St., New York.

Is The Bible Worth Reading?
And Other Essays

By LEMUEL K. WASHBURN

Price, postpaid, $1.

Address THE TRUTH SEEKER,
62 Vesey St. New York.

DEPARTMENT OF ECONOMICS.

Real Socialism and What It Is Not.

I beg a few lines of space in reply to Mr. Walter Freeman's communication of May 19th. At the beginning, I am glad to note that Mr. Freeman appreciates the truth of my statement that Socialism has been throttled and diseased, and he adds almost submerged by something, be it crankisms or "various brands of so-called reforms labeled Socialism." Now, before we go any further, what is Socialism? What is the grain, and what is the chaff? We may differ as to its definition, so to save time and space in the ultimate, I will define "real Socialism" as I conceive it. Real Socialism is the study or science or practice of that which is social, that which is equally favorable to all mankind, and to society or man collectively, and in a community of institutions, as I have already stated, of the people, by the people and for the people, with equal opportunity to all and special privilege to none. All laws and institutions being exclusively acting for the greatest good to the greatest number.

Probably all Socialists will at least passively acquiesce in these general statements, yet I daresay many of them would positively approve in way of propaganda and policy, in behalf of attaining the one goal we all seek, many acts which I would regard as to the last degree unsocial. The strike, for example, is as unsocial an act as a highway hold-up, and not only to employers but to other poor and laboring men. As Mr. Freeman admits, Socialism is not a unit. There are so many brands masquerading under the general name of Socialism that almost any crime could be committed under its banners and not be without applause. No act could be too unsocial to be outside the pale of Socialism as the world now seems to understand it. Men who talk Socialism in our public thoroughfares as a rule preach against all law and order, against all government, good or bad, and as a matter of fact they preach anarchy in the name of Socialism. They are almost entirely destructive instead of constructive.

There are men of this type who teach if there is not food, clothing, and shelter enough, or good enough, to destroy what there is. The lowest animals would know better than that, and yet there are those in Germany today who are robbing and destroying small shopkeeper's stocks of provisions in that famished country, for crimes of which they are not guilty, and while many Socialist leaders are supporting the really responsible despot. Many Socialist leaders are now doing their utmost to prevail upon their fellow Socialists of Russia to make an ignoble peace to the destruction of their own democracy, and in behalf of the despotic Autocrat at Berlin. I note also that those calling themselves "Social Democrats" are even more loyal to the Kaiser than the radical Socialists. In this case I would prefer the radicals, but in Russia the radicals have done everything in their power to destroy the new democracy and make peace with the Kaiser.

Here we get back to the original premise. It is not the particular brand of Socialism, but the cranks that seem to dominate them. I am not familiar with the "Weekly People," of which I have sent for sample copy, but I am with three others which I prefer not to mention since I have commented as I have. I have also had friends who were Socialists who have informed me verbally, and provided literature. My mind is always open and I have no prejudices, except to that which is unsocial in its true sense.

I think we are to be congratulated that we can appropriate $7,000,000,000 as a starter for the prosecution of the war against the military despot of Prussia because we are menaced with conquest by that despot, and as a nation we must in words of Patrick Henry "sink or swim, survive or perish." We value too highly our once dearly bought democracy to give it up without putting up the best fight of which we are capable. With the Hohenzollerns once in the saddle, after a conquest of the world, we would have a much more difficult time to get it back than to preserve it now.

I am sorry Mr. Freeman cannot differentiate between an offensive warfare of a despot and Autocrat, out for conquest, and a defensive one in behalf of the preservation of a great democracy, the fall of which would blast all. I regret also that any true Socialist and democrat should want anything else than universal military service. First of all, did it not excuse those expressing a religious scruple against war, it would make the coward support the brave, and furnish the required numbers to insure victory. I might add that ample appropriation means ample munitions, which in turn means lessened risk to our soldiers. Our English cousins found their losses cut down about one-half when their general munition supply became ample. The theory of "The Prince of Peace," of the million men up in a night to defend the country after the enemy landed or actually attacked us, put into execution, would have involved a massacre of our bravest men, while the disloyal and the cowards remained at home. Who has not noted that among Socialists in general, as they stand today, those who are loudest in demands for true social democracy are loudest in their kicks on doing their share in defending it? This is a class of Socialism which I condemn. Universal service says no to the man who says "let George do it." Let every man do his own manly part. I should hate to see the country trust to Socialists for volunteers, if their literature is an index of what to expect.

The implication of the selective draft law that those who are free from an anti-war sentiment of the Christian religion, must fight our country's battles, and on the other hand the provision that a simple statement of having a religious scruple against war, may be a sufficient excuse to shirk all obligation to help sustain our country at the front and make democracy safe, is as great a compliment to the patriotism of the Freethinker as it is a stigma to cowardice and slack-erage of the Christian American, even though such was probably not the design of its designer. The remarkable selective draft law singularly exempts theological, but not medical, students from military service. The theological students are surely of no real value to the Government except as soldiers, whereas if this war lasts a couple of years or more, as predicted, Junior year students of today would be ready for army medical service if permitted to finish their college courses. When will we cease to be imposed upon by the organized church? This is supposed to be a state separated from the church.

The only fault I have to find with the universal service act, is that part of its selective draft which permits a man to shirk duty for religious reasons. A religious man's duty and obligation to his country should be as high and strong as any other. War is no picnic. It is not a sentiment of frivolity or devilry, or other desire for war that impels any man to make a defensive fight for his country, but that far nobler sense of obligation to do one's just share to sustain the country which is the heritage of us all. It is gratifying that the University students of the country, "the hot beds of Infidelity," according to the ecclesiastics, were the first to answer their country's call for volunteers.

I did not say I wondered why Andrew Carnegie is not interested in the uplift and liberation of mankind, in fact I showed in detail he is and is doing a share to the utmost of his means. He is giving away not only all his income, but many millions more out of his principal, which is rapidly diminishing year by year. In addition to all his library, scientific, and educational foundations, he has, as Mrs. R. G. Ingersoll once told me, "a pension list which is miles long" (figuratively speaking). Yes, Mr. Carnegie can be classed as a capitalist. He did finally sell out his business to the United States Steel Corporation after many refusals, with the Corporation's bids mounting higher and higher until they gave him a fabulous price which retired Mr. Carnegie a millionaire several hundred times over. Probably the long period of comparative worthlessness of the common stock in the Corporation cost many a man his all, but Mr. Carnegie was not to blame for that, and since then it has been coming back to the people in the wisest possible dispensations, and far more conscientiously than we get back the funds we pay as taxes.

The trouble with many Socialists is a lack of the noblest mental faculty, that of discrimination. Mr. Rockefeller and Mr. Carnegie are apparently both alike to you. For comparison read Tarbell's History of the Standard Oil Company and the United States government investigation of it. Consider that Rockefeller's fortune is increasing about as fast as Carnegie's is diminishing. Compare the men in all particulars as men, then revise your views.

The whole civilized world is now watching Socialism as never before. It is now being put to the supreme test. Prior to the European war they were far the strongest political body of the German nation. They were famed the world over for their widely-preached doctrine of Internationalism. All Europe fell for it in face of all of Germany's continued preparation for war on a gigantic scale. All continued to live in a fool's paradise, in the belief that when Germany made a declaration of war, the Socialists would stall it, both as members in the Reichstag, and as troops in the field. But not so. Notwithstanding that German-held securities were liquidated on all foreign stock exchanges in enormous volume, and General F. von Bernhardi's book on the "Next War," which gave the German program, England was caught napping and France and Russia partially unprepared. We hoped against hope to keep out of it. The whole country cursed Wilson as a cowardly note writer, "Too proud to fight." We all know the rest.

When the Kaiser was all ready and declared war on Aug. 1, 1914, the Socialists suspended Internationalism, voted all necessary credits in the Reichstag and manned the guns in the army. The powerful Socialist organization made no concerted protest, and what few brave souls dared to assert themselves later on were imprisoned without any serious objections from the rank and file until hunger began to gnaw at their vitals. Then they grumbled, but left it to their leader Scheidemann.

Now we have an interesting picture of a group of men organized under the leadership of a man, who, at the crisis of their affairs, is firmly associated with the reactionaries, and devoting his whole time, not to democratic and social ideals, but to an endeavor to obtain through his prestige as a Socialistic leader the surrender to his Prussian despot, on a separate peace basis, of the democracy just won in Russia by revolution. America has stepped into the breach in a noble effort to save the day for democracy. One would expect the Socialists to be first as volunteers to give all possible aid in the great undertaking. I am glad to note that Phelps-Stokes, Charles E. Russell, W. E. Walling, and W. J. Ghent are on the right side, but what shall we think of those who grumble at being compelled to do the share from which they would otherwise shirk? They are the class of men who have brought Socialism beneath the avalanche which has already submerged it here in America. He who would not fight for the survival of democracy is unworthy to dictate its course. He who is all mouth and with no hands, is poor material for the organization that is to make for mankind a perfect social edifice. We need brawn and brains more than loquacity.

What are we to think of an Internationalism, promulgated in an empire as against all war, influencing Socialists the world over to oppose war, when the promulgators of it suspend it and foster a war of conquest of foreign democracies, by autocratic despots, and when that same Internationalism is used by the Socialists of the menaced democracies as an excuse to shirk military duty in the defense of those democracies?

Mr. Freeman asks the already threadbare question: Does it not seem disgraceful that charity is necessary amidst plenty? I answer yes, but whatever the abundance, whatever the social conditions, many men would have nothing were it not for charity, and not owing to any faulty social conditions, but because they have not the lowest animal instinct to live. During the last decade of my father's life he devoted his full time to gratuitous service as President of a city benevolent society. During that period he brought to light many cases of complete destitution in families, who but a few days before the last cent was spent had on their tables every luxury the market afforded. Men who could not do any kind of skilled labor would remain idle as long as they had any funds at all, and even then refuse to do anything menial. Others drink up all they can earn and more too, and are at all times unfit owing to alcoholic debility. Such men often have large families. What are you going to do with them other than by the charity of those who have been more provident? Certainly taxes are already high enough without adding the general sustenance of such people to public charge. For many years I was chief of a clinic in General Medicine in the Out-patient department of Bellevue Hospital, New York City. I and my assistants treated 6,000 new patients a year, all charity cases. In 1891 I practiced from the New York Lying In Hospital on the lower East side of New York, all charity cases. So Mr. Freeman must pardon me if I make some pretensions to knowing something of the causes of indigence in this country. There are plenty of heart-rending cases of distress through accidental events and through no fault of the distressed, who when tided over a crisis will get on their feet again, yet the large majority and the chronic indigents would saddle the burden of sustaining them on Easy Street for life eternal, so long as suckers can be found to be played as easy marks.

Now, all nations, whether Monarchical or Republican, continually have problems to solve, mistakes, determined by experience, to correct, and wrongs to right. All can't be helped in one melting pot by any universal system, Socialist or otherwise. The only way to reach approximate perfection is by a process of evolution, by virtue of which a survival of the fit and the elimination of the unfit is gradually attained. The men who are really shouldering the burden of accomplishing this great end are those true reformers who are willing to give their time and labor to propose, argue, and persevere in effort until real reforms are obtained one by one. The wholesale policy of general condemnation of whole governments and social systems, indiscriminate of the good from the bad, because every reprobate is not prosperous under them, is all wrong and accomplishes no good. Only the unit man so dreams.

The fact should never be lost sight of that many of our social and legislative ills are not due to fundamental errors of a democracy or of our own United States Constitution, which can be cured at one sweep with one patent cure-all, but are due to absence of common honesty on the part of the representatives of the people occupying positions of public trust. Too much attention is paid by legislators now to organizations representing religious dogmas and political and social theories which are unfair, absurd, and impractical, while not being particular enough to elect men to such places who are fundamentally honest, unpurchasable, wise, and socially disposed toward their fellow men. There are plenty of such men, but we give preference to professional and aggressive politicians. For success, brains and education are absolutely essential. It is a prime error to regard stupidity and ignorance as more representative of the masses. It spells failure in advance.

The common error of antagonizing everyone who appears as a capitalist or an employer, never got the Socialist or labor parties anywhere, and never will. If laws were but introduced and generally supported limiting individual incomes and transmission by inheritance, and corporations were properly controlled, dangers of ultra-aggregations of capital would pass away, and our national wealth would be a blessing to all right-minded people.

HOMER WAKEFIELD, M.D.

"Cursed by the Past: Blessed by the Future"

REMSBURG'S LATEST WORK

Thomas Paine

The Apostle of Liberty

BY JOHN E. REMSBURG

This is the Great Address delivered by Remsburg in Chicago last year, pronounced a masterpiece of thrilling oratory. To the Address is added

The Testimony of Five Hundred Witnesses.

This list of the names and words of eminent persons in all walks of life who have praised Paine is a revelation even to his admirers and students, and the eulogy of Remsburg is unsurpassed.

220 Pages; 12mo, Paper, 50 Cents

Published and sold by

THE TRUTH SEEKER CO.
62 Vesey St. - New York

DYNAMIC THEORY OF LIFE AND MIND. By James B. Alexander. An Attempt to show that all Organic Beings are Both Constructed and Operated by the Dynamic Agencies of their respective Environments. Over 400 illustrations, 87 chapters, 1,057 pages, and a 3-column index of 11 pages. Price, express prepaid, $2.75.

SEVENTH EDITION — REDUCED PRICE

BIBLE MYTHS

AND THEIR PARALLELS IN OTHER RELIGIONS

Being a Comparison of the Old and New Testament Myths and Miracles with those of Heathen Nations of Antiquity

CONSIDERING ALSO THEIR ORIGIN AND MEANING. WITH NUMEROUS ILLUSTRATIONS.

IT is a perfect Encyclopedia on the subjects treated, containing a vast amount of out-of-the-way knowledge not accessible to the majority of readers, and all the objections to the dogmas of Christianity one is likely to encounter, grouped under appropriate heads. No author has struck harder blows at the Christian religion. It is the most important Biblical criticism that has ever appeared, being the result of many years of study of the religions of antiquity. It is thoroughly reliable, every fact being verified by copious notes and authorities.

COL. ROBERT G. INGERSOLL said: "This work demonstrates the fact that there is nothing new or original in Christianity; that its maxims, miracles, and mistakes, its doctrines, sacraments, and ceremonies, were all borrowed; that its virgin mothers, miraculous babes, courier-stars, crucifixions, resurrections, and ascensions were familiar things hundreds of years before the founder of Christianity was born. It shows that all the machinery of the supernatural has been in active operation for countless generations; that all the nations of antiquity had about the same religious experience, and substantially agreed as to the correctness of about the same mistakes. Catholicism administered on the estate of Paganism, and appropriated most of the property to its own use. Christianity furnished new steam for an old engine. Fables, like most other things, wear out and have to be patched, gilded, or replaced.

"The author of 'Bible Myths' has succeeded in showing that our Bible is not the great central fire giving light to the world, but a collection of candles and tapers and sparks borrowed by the 'chosen people' from those whom Jehovah, according to the scriptures, had left in the darkness of nature."

REV. M. J. SAVAGE says: "To me, the volume is worth twenty times its cost."

THE BOSTON COMMONWEALTH says: "Here we have evidence upon evidence that there is no myth, legend, supernatural occurrence, doctrine, rite or ceremony recorded in the Bible which cannot be paralleled in some ancient record centuries older than the page on which the same thing is narrated in the Hebrew and Christian scriptures. We confess we are curious as to how the orthodoxes of the Christian world will greet this book. We more than suspect that they will not greet it at all, but will be content to pass it by in fearful silence."

Seventh Edition: Large 8vo, cloth, 614 pages, $2.

Address THE TRUTH SEEKER :: 62 Vesey Street, New York

In Best of Humor.

And Remove Everything.—"The doctor says he'll remove my appendix for fifteen hundred dollars."
"Oh, George, I'd much rather have a touring-car."—Life.

Marvelous!—"This is an eight-day clock, Madam," explained the antique dealer to a purchaser from the country. "It will go eight days without winding."
"Gracious!" explained the customer, "and how long will it go if you wind it?"

Making Sure of It.—District Visitor—Well, one must do something for the suffering poor.

Friend—Quite so, but are you really quite sure that they do suffer?

District Visitor—Oh, yes. I visit them and talk to them for hours at a time.

A Boomerang.—"That's a good one on Jokeleigh."

"What's happened?"

"He had an insurance policy on the contents of his cellar and he thought it funny to put in a claim when he had burned all his coal."

"What did the company say to that?"
"Had him arrested for arson."—Boston Transcript.

He Knew.—"Any rags? Any old iron?" chanted the dealer, as he knocked at the suburban villa. The man of the house himself opened the door.

"No, go away," he snapt, irritably. "There's nothing for you. My wife is away."

The itinerant merchant hesitated a moment, and then inquired: "Any old bottles?"—Tit-Bits.

No Escape.—A negro who had an injured head entered a doctor's office.

"Hello, Sam! Got cut again, I see."

"Yas, sah! I done got carved up with a razor, Doc!"

"Why don't you keep out of bad company?" said the physician, after he had drest the wound.

"Deed I'd like to, Doc, but I ain't got 'nuff money to get a divorce."—New York American.

Suspicious.—"What's the matter, old man? You look worried."

"Well, to be honest with you, I am. You know, I took out some life insurance last Thursday."

"Yes," replied the sympathetic friend,

"but what has that to do with the wobegone expression on your face?"

"Well, the very next day after I had it written my wife bought a new cook-book. Possibly it's all right, but it certainly looks suspicious."—Kansas City Star.

An Obedient Echo.—An English tourist, passing through a picturesque glen in Scotland, was told by his guide that at the spot where they now stood a splendid echo could be obtained.

"Just shout 'Two bottles of whiskey,' and see!" said the guide.

The visitor shouted, and, after waiting for several minutes, turned to the Scot.

"I do not hear any echo!" he said.
"Maybe no," chuckled the Scot, "but here's the lassie comin' wi' the whiskey!"

In Memoriam.—Availing herself of her ecclesiastical privileges, the clergyman's wife of a story told by the Chicago Herald asked questions which, coming from anybody else, would have been thought impertinent.

"I presume you carry a memento of some kind in that locket your wear?" she said.

"Yes, ma'am," said the parishioner. "It is a lock of my husband's hair."

"But your husband is still alive," the lady exclaimed.

"Yes, ma'am, but his hair is gone."

Saw No Difference.—"People who seek books from the fiction section make some funny breaks," says a librarian of the Library of Congress. "I have made note of a number of these, but none of them amused me more than the request of a sour-looking spinster."

"She sternly demanded of me a copy of 'The Recollections of a Liar.' I told her I didn't know it, but that I could give her 'The Recollections of a Married Man.'"

"That will do," said she acidly. "It's practically the same thing."

Her Line of Talk.—Three o'clock was the very earliest the man could get up to the store, says the New York Globe, so his wife asked him to meet her then.

"I don't know in what department I shall be at that time," she said, "but just before three o'clock I will telephone to the clerk at the information bureau near the main entrance, and if you will just step over and ask him he will tell you where I am."

At two minutes past three the man sought information as to the whereabouts of his wife.

"I have a message," said the clerk, "from a woman who said her husband would inquire for her about three o'clock. Maybe it is for you. She said to tell you she had gone to Blank's store, over on Sixth avenue, to finish shopping, because the clerks in this store are impudent, the place is ill-ventilated, and she could not find anything she wanted here, anyhow, and never has been able to find anything here, and this is positively the last time she will ever try to find anything here. Of course, that might not have been your wife—"

"Oh, yes," said the man; "that was her all right."

THE SOUL AND ITS BEARINGS

SHOWING

The Material Quality of the Soul and the Mechanical Nature of Its Functions and of the Business Relations It Sustains with the Environment on One Side and the Rest of the Corporal Organism on the Other.

BY JAMES B. ALEXANDER

This is a Materialistic book. The author does not believe that the soul survives the body. He says: "Is it right to lie for the concealment of a disagreeable truth—to inclose the vital truth in a pleasant husk of fiction by tricking the people with the delusion of agreeable falsehoods? No! Tell the truth! Let not the truth be brought into disrepute by unworthy and debasing associations."

A very frank book; serious, scholarly, convincing.

Price $1.00

Sold at THE TRUTH SEEKER OFFICE

Palne's Age of Reason

By THOMAS PAINE, M.A.

This edition of Thomas Paine's masterpiece is the one that is sure to become the standard for all future correct editions. It is reprinted from one of the first copies in English published by Barrois at Paris, January, 1794, and the proofs were probably read by Paine. It enables the world of the twentieth century to read Paine's AGE OF REASON as Paine wrote it in the eighteenth century. It is printed from large new type. 180 pages. 15c. T. S. Co.

THE CHRISTIAN HELL

From the First to the Twentieth Century

By

HYPATIA BRADLAUGH BONNER

There is no book in the English language which describes the theory and experience of the doctrine of the Christian Hell with such fulness of details as this work by Mrs. Bonner. No one who wishes to know what this doctrine means when carried to its natural conclusions, as in the teaching of the Roman Catholic church, should fail to secure a copy of this startling work. Mrs. Bonner's sources are entirely authentic, and the reader is held spellbound by her graphic descriptions, which grow in intensity as she reaches the climax of her subject. There are some twenty-eight illustrations in the book, taken from pictures actually circulated by the churches, which serve to bring to view all the horrifying phases of this most inhuman of conceptions. This work alone is sufficient to condemn Christianity as a thoroughly unnatural institution.

PRICE, PAPER, 30 CENTS

CLOTH - 45 CENTS

The Truth Seeker

62 Vesey Street - New York

EXEMPTING THE CHURCHES

A Presentation of Facts and Reasons to Show Why

CHURCHES SHOULD BE TAXED

Argument of

JAMES F. MORTON, JR.,

Before the Committee on Taxation of the Constitutional Convention at Albany, New York. Expanded into a pamphlet of 84 pages, to which is annexed a tract by John E. Remsburg.

It Covers All the Ground

The many pretexts for the exemption of church property from taxation examined and exposed.

Price 25 Cents

Write for rates on quantities.
THE TRUTH SEEKER CO.

ETERNITY

World-War Thoughts on Life and Death, Religion, and the Theory of Evolution

By ERNST HAECKEL

(Professor at the University of Jena)

Author of "The History of Creation," "The Evolution of Man," "The Riddle of the Universe," etc.

Of highest importance are these latest thoughts of Professor Haeckel, which embody the ideas of a Monist philosopher and Humanitarian. Freethinker on War, Religion, and the nature and origin of Man. The conclusions of the evolutionists on these questions are restated, emphasized and strengthened. Apart from severely scoring the hypocrisy of nations that profess to be followers of a Prince of Peace, and yet enter upon wars of conquest and make arms and munitions their trade, what the author has to say on the merits of the parties to the present war is given in an appendix. In the main he confines himself closely to the themes indicated—science, religion and humanity. He rejects utterly the Christian scheme of this world or any other.

Cloth, $1.25 net.

THE TRUTH SEEKER COMPANY

62 Vesey Street, New York

SELF-CONTRADICTIONS OF THE BIBLE. By W. H. Burr. One hundred and forty-four propositions embodying the most palpable and striking contradictions. Price 15 cents.

News of the Week.

Foreign Minister Arthur J. Balfour reached a British port June 9, back from his special mission to the United States.

San Salvador, Santa Tecla and neighboring towns and villages were destroyed by an earthquake which occurred on June 8th.

Lord Northcliffe, at the request of the War Cabinet, has accepted the position of head of the British war mission in the United States.

E. P. Patenaud, secretary of state of the Dominion of Canada, has tendered his resignation owing to disagreement with the government on the conscription issue.

William Redmond, Irish Nationalist leader, brother of John Redmond, died in an ambulance June 9, while on the way to a hospital back from the fighting line where he was wounded.

Brazil has replied to the German note protesting against the requisitioning of German ships with a declaration that the Republic had acted within the strict limits of the law, even as interpreted by Germany.

A German is locked up at Camden, N. J., on a charge of treason, and Secret Service men are searching the vicinity of Ellisburg for two other men as the result of the discovery of a plot to delay federal war messages.

The Kronstadt republic has surrendered unconditionally to the provisional Russian government. The peace agreement was signed by Anatole Lamanoff, president of the Kronstadt Council of Soldiers' and Workmen's Delegates.

A memorial surmounted by a statue of Gen. Robert E. Lee was unveiled on Gettysburg battlefield June 8 in the presence of Confederate veterans, who had come from their annual reunion at Washington, and also of many Union veterans.

D. W. Fields, of Brockton, Mass., paid $53,200 for a five-months-old bull calf at the Holstein-Friesian Association convention auction sale held at Worcester, June 7. This is believed to be the highest price ever paid for a calf at an auction sale.

The lost baby, Lloyd Keet, was found dead June 9. The child had been drowned in a well on an abandoned farm near Springfield, Mo., when the band of kidnappers who took him from his home while the parents were at a dance, began to fear capture.

William H. Qucen, member of a prominent New Jersey family, his wife, Emma, and his daughter, Eleanor, 21 years old, were murdered June 8, at their home in Mount Pleasant, near Flemington, N. J., and a farmhand who was employed on the place is missing.

Charles Edward Russell, Socialist leader and perennial candidate of the Socialist organization for the governorship of New York State, has been expelled from the party because of his refusal to resign as a member of the United States War Commission to Russia.

Germans who set fire to the steamer at Pernambuco, Brazil, June 6, were transferred to the Brazilian Cap Vilano, which was transferred yesterday from the German to the Brazilian flag. The steamer is the second largest of the interned German merchantmen in this port.

Mrs. Margaret Sanger and her co-workers in the cause of birth control won a notable victory June 6 in the Supreme Court when Justice Bijur granted an injunction restraining License Commissioner Bell from preventing the production of the moving picture "Birth Control."

Tornadoes on June 6 spread death and destruction through rural districts of Missouri and Kansas. Reports showed fifteen were killed in Missouri and nine in Kansas. The number of injured has reached approximately 150, and estimates of property damage place it anywhere from $1,000,000 to $2,000,000.

Twenty-eight men entombed in the Spectacular Mine at Butte, Mont., since the fire June 8, were brought to the surface alive on June 10. One died on reaching the top of the shaft. The finding of the men stimulated efforts of the rescue teams and there is strong hope that the others may be found alive.

The March Flag bill was signed by Gov. Whitman of New York, June 8. The measure amends the law relating to the use of the American flag on articles of merchandise by permitting jewelers to manufacture and sell flag pins and by allowing stationers to emboss the nation emblem on note paper and envelopes for private use.

The 1,600 men in the State Prison at Joliet, Ill., rebelled against all authority, June 5, fought the guards, a battalion of soldiers and the city fireman and set fire to five buildings within the walls, destroying three of them. One prisoner was killed, eight severely injured and others hurt. A soldier was stabbed in the back, two guards were injured and the prison chaplain was burned in fighting fire.

THE WAR.

The Argentine sailing ship Oriama was struck by a submarine in the Mediterranean on June 6. The crew was saved by a French ship.

Italian troops from Albania have seized the City of Janina, in Greek Epirus, where the Cabinet has assembled to formulate a protest.

More than half a battalion of British volunteers, recruited in this country in four days' time, left June 11, for a period of intensive training in Canadian camps.

The American steamer Silvershell has had a battle with a submarine in the Mediterranean. After an exchange of sixty shots, the submarine disappeared.

A German destroyer has been sunk and another damaged in a running fight between six German destroyers and Commodore Tyrwhitt's squadron of the British navy.

Further counter attacks have been made by the Austrians on the Italian lines in the Gorizia area and on the Carso, but no impression was made on the Italian positions.

Sixteen German airplanes came over the North Sea June 5 and dropped many bombs on the small towns and villages in Essex and Kent. Two were brought down by British guns.

A large American transport (the U. S. collier Jupiter), containing wheat for American troops which are to go later, has crossed the Atlantic under the protection of an American warship.

The submarine casualties for the last week have hit another low mark. The total of British ships of all kind sunk is 23, of which 15 are of more than 1,600 tons, three of smaller tonnage and five are fishing boats.

Major General Pershing and his staff arrived in England June 8, after an uneventful trip. All the members of his party were in good health and spirits. Their ship was escorted into port by American destroyers.

Offer of a force of 25,000 Filipino troops for wherever they may be needed was made to President Wilson June 6 by Manuel Quezon, formerly Philippine delegate in Congress and now president of the Philippine Senate.

The British steamship Southland, from Liverpool for Philadelphia, in ballast, was torpedoed without warning on June 4. She had six Americans on board, of whom one, Edward Rigney, of New York city, is missing.

Strong British forces fought their way forward June 6 between Gavrelle and the River Scarpe, capturing a mile of the German trench system on the western slopes of Greenland Hill, together with 162 prisoners.

The crew of the German cruiser Cormoran, 322 in number, which was sunk outside the harbor of Guam to prevent its seizure by the United States when war was declared, have arrived as prisoners of war at a California port. Fifty marines are in charge of the Germans.

General Henri Berthelot, chief of the French Military Mission to Roumania, has been raised to the dignity of grand officer of the Legion of Honor. The honor is in recognition of his services in reorganizing the Roumanian army.

A large American steamship was torpedoed and sunk in the English Channel near the French coast probably on June 1, and the crew while escaping in small boats were shelled by the submarine, many being killed or drowned.

Eight out of eighteen German airplanes that took part in the air raid of June 6 on Essex and Kent were driven down by British airmen. Four of these were to a certainty completely destroyed, while two others are believed to have been put out of commission.

Preceded by terrific mine explosions, the greatest in war's history, the British army began June 7 an offensive of tremendous power on the front in Belgium. The attack succeeded completely. The entire Wytschaete ridge, overlooking Ypres, was stormed. Thus far 5,000 prisoners have been counted and there are thousands more, and numbers of cannon, machine guns and other booty have been taken.

RIGHTS OF MAN. Paper, 25 cents. Paine's famous answer to Burke's attack upon the French Revolution. A political treatise of great general value, as advocating liberty and democracy. Contains the fundamental principles of true republicanism and government.

Lectures and Meetings

The New York Secular Society. Mr. Irving Meirowitz and Mr. Nicholas Mitichuly of this society will speak at Thirty-seventh street and Broadway every Wednesday and Saturday night; and at 137th street and Broadway every Thursday night.

The Boston Freethought Society meets in Paine Memorial Hall, Appleton street, every Sunday at 3 P. M. J. P. Bland, B.D., is resident speaker, and THE TRUTH SEEKER is for sale at the door.

The Rationalist Society of Toledo, Ohio, meets in the Arcade Bldg., Room 133, St. Clair and Jackson sts., Wednesday evenings at 8.

The Chicago Freethought Society meets in Corinthian Hall, Masonic Temple, Sunday mornings, at 11 o'clock; H. Percy Ward, lecturer.

The Freethought Congregation of Cedar Rapids, Iowa, meets every second Sunday of the month at the C. S. P. S. Hall, corner Eleventh Avenue and Third Street; Jos. J. Hajek, Speaker.

The Columbus Rationalist Association meets the second and fourth Tuesday evening of each month, 7.30 P. M., at the Hotel Vendome, Third street, opposite State House. O. C. Weatherby, president; Olin J. Ross, 23 East State street, Columbus, O., secretary.

The Friendship Liberal League, (Inc.) of Philadelphia, meets every Sunday at 2.30 and 7.30, at 1417 Columbia avenue. Open platform. The Truth Seeker and liberal literature on sale. F. Garfield Bowers, secretary, 245 N. Ninth street.

The Milwaukee Rationalist Society meets every Friday evening in Convention Hall, Republican House. Joel Rubin, Pres., 9, 10 Cawker Bldg.

The Denver Rationalist Association meets the first and third Thursday of each month at 319 Kittredge Building: Olive Oliver, president.

The Meetings of the Independent Lectureship of San Francisco, Walter Holloway, Rationalist and Lecturer, are held every Sunday night at 8 o'clock, at Golden Gate Commandery, 2135 Sutter Street, San Francisco, Cal.

The Toledo Rationalist Society meets every Wednesday evening at 8, Room 133, Arcade Building, St. Clair and Jackson streets. W. M. Braun, secretary. Speakers, Dr. Rullison, J. Carl, J. Braun and K. Pauli.

Tacoma Rationalist Society. meets every Sunday at 3 p. m. in Maccabees Hall, 1109 Broadway, Tacoma, Wash. S. T. Hammersmark, Secy., Colonial Hotel.

The Ferrer Association holds public meetings at the Ferrer Centre, 63 East 107th street, New York, every Saturday and Sunday evening.

The Detroit Society of Truth Seekers (Lithuanian) meets the second Sunday of every month at 2 P. M. in C. O. F. Hall, Chene, cor. Trombly st.; Karl Rutkus, organizer, 338 West End ave., Detroit, Mich.

The Clarksburg (W. Va.) Rationalist day in the Court House at 2 P. M. A lecture course is now being prepared. Address G. A. Miller, Secy.-Treas., 644 S. 7th street, Clarksburg.

The secular organization of Kansas City, Mo., heretofore known as The Church of This World, has changed its name to The Rationalist Society of Kansas City, Mo., and has taken out papers of incorporation under that title. The meetings of the new society will be held in Apollo Hall, Kansas City, beginning with next October. Dr. John E. Roberts will continue as lecturer.

Sinai and Olympus

Parallels in Heathen Myth and Hebrew Scripture.

By a Texas Pagan.
PICTURES BY RYAN WALKER.

This is a lecture by a Texas Pagan, which has been illustrated by another. The text is what the title describes, a comparison of the heathen myths with the Hebrew tales told in scripture. The illustrations are exquisite bits of satire and wit, made by a genius with the pencil, and each is a gem. Text and pictures together, the book is certainly one of the wittiest ever produced, while the information it contains is solid and reliable. It will be a source of pleasure to every Liberal, and is at the same time a splendid Freethought lecture. We guarantee its quality from start to finish. 115 large octavo pages, 76 illustrations. Illuminated cover, fine paper. Price, 50 cents.

THE SERVICE OF MAN

By JAMES COTTER MORISON

This is a book of peculiar interest, written by a man of striking personality. The object of the book is to show how the Service of God, or of Gods, leads by natural evolution to the Service of Man; from Theology to Anthropology. Mention of some of the chapter headings will show the attractive nature of the work. Chapter II deals with "The Decay of Belief"; Chapter IV with "The Alleged Consolations of the Christian Religion"; Chapter VI is named "Morality in the Ages of Faith"; and in the VIIth chapter there is recorded "What Christianity Has Done." There are in all nine chapters of clear and accurate reasoning in favor of the glorification of man over a decadent laudation of gods. The book is framed in an admirable spirit, and exhibits on every page the generous nature and lively vivacity of its author. It is invaluable to the student of Rationalism, especially if he be called upon to "give a reason for the faith that is in him."

PRICE, THIRTY CENTS

For Sale by

The Truth Seeker
62 Vesey Street - New York City

INFIDEL DEATHBEDS

BY G. W. FOOTE.

An account of the passing away of the noted Freethinkers of the world, to which are prefixed brief accounts of their lives and of the work they did for mental liberty. "Infidel death-beds" have ever been a fertile theme of pulpit eloquence, and the clergy have drawn harrowing pictures of fear and terror and recantations and repudiation of sentiments held when living by the great Infidels of the world. This book shows that such sermons are "just preaching," and totally false as to statements. Every Liberal should have it for reference. The author founded the London Freethinker, and was one of the ablest writers in England. Price 25 cents.

Address THE TRUTH SEEKER,
62 Vesey Street, New York.

WHAT IS RELIGION?

And Other Essays

By ROBERT G. INGERSOLL

The essay, "What Is Religion?" which gives a title to the collection, was Ingersoll's last public address. The others are:
Declaration of the Free (A Poem).
The Bible Not a Moral Guide.
A Vision of War.
Declaration of Independence.
Faith that Surely Wanes.
A Look Backward and a Prophecy.
The Oath Question.
God in the Constitution.

In pamphlet form, 25c.

Address

The Truth Seeker
62 Vesey Street - New York

MARTYRDOM OF MAN. By Winwood Reade. Cloth, with portrait and biographical sketch, $1.00.

A synopsis of universal history, showing what the race has undergone in its rise to its present plane. It shows how War and Religion have been oppressive factors in man's struggle for liberty; and the last chapter, of some 150 pages, describes his intellectual struggle from the animal period of the earth to the present. Winwood Reade's reputation as a writer of fine English for deep study and careful reasoning, needs no word of praise.

THE TRUTHSEEKER

A Freethought and Agnostic Newspaper.

Vol. 44.—No. 25.

PUBLISHED
WEEKLY

New York, June 23, 1917.

62 VESEY
STREET

$3.00 Per Year

THE MIRACLES OF JESUS

Verdict of the Rational Mind on the Mythical Wonder-worker of Judea.

BY L. K. WASHBURN.

WE ARE to consider Jesus as the gospels present him to us. We have neither his photograph nor his autograph, nor do we know whether we have a single word that he ever spoke or whether he ever pretended to the power to work wonders. Not one of the writers of the gospels could say: "I heard Jesus preach the 'sermon on the mount,'" or, "I saw Jesus raise Lazarus from the dead." All that has been written about Jesus is what was commonly reported that he said and did, and even this not until many years after he is believed to have lived on earth.

No one will pretend that the gossip of a simple, ignorant, superstitious people is a reliable source of information, or that a man's words and deeds a century or more after he passed from earth would be preserved in their exact form in the mouths of men. We must not forget that miracle-stories are not peculiar to the gospels, that pagan literature is filled with such stories, that many performances even more wonderful than those attributed to Jesus are found narrated in the works of the ancients, and, also, that it was a general belief that gods inhabited the earth and that certain persons became divine after their death.

It is not improbable that the faith in the reign of a coming Messiah placed the heathen robe of divinity upon the shoulders of Jesus. It is evident that this faith is at the bottom of the gospel narrative and suggested many of its incidents. The author of the story of Jesus wrote to prove that his hero was a fulfillment of the Bible prophecies, but throughout the story may be traced the influence of Grecian mythology upon the author's mind. We have in the gospels a Hebrew messiah performing the wonders of a heathen god. The character given to Jesus in the New Testament is not so much that of a Jewish king as that of a Greek deity.

The writer of the gospel narrative evidently did not know what was expected of a messiah. He seemed to decide in his own mind that Jesus was divine, and that, if he was divine, he could work wonders, and so he wrote his life accordingly.

We are told that the miracles which Jesus performed prove his divinity. But miracles prove nothing until the miracles are proved. They who assert that Jesus was divine because he did the miracles related in the gospels are called upon to show that he ever did these things. The bare gospel statement (and that is all there is) that a person worked wonders is not sufficient to convince the rational mind. All the testimony there is on this subject is the unsupported word of an unknown writer.

Let us look at some of these miracles. It is not easy to deceive the common sense of the twentieth century, and it is to the judgment of the common sense of mankind that the wonder-stories of the Bible must answer.

The first miracle that Jesus performed, according to the gospel of John, was that of changing water into wine. This is related as an act to manifest the glory of Jesus and to win the faith of his disciples. We are to assume that this story is the report of an actual occurrence and not of any trick. This miracle makes Nature deny herself; makes growth a halting, limping thing; condenses the seasons into a moment of time; takes honor from industry and gives us the results of fermentation without the materials necessary to produce it. Let us look this miracle square in the face and comprehend the full force of its meaning. The act of changing water to wine necessitates the stupendous task of changing the elements of nature themselves, or of adding foreign elements to the water. There are acids, oils and sugar in wine, besides other ingredients. These all had to be added through miraculous agency, or else the oxygen and hydrogen of the water had to be changed to other elements to produce them. In the light of modern science, in the face and eyes of the knowledge of this century, can we believe that this miracle was ever performed? We must pronounce it an utterly impossible achievement, a stupendous invention, a foolish falsehood.

The first miracle recorded in the gospel of Matthew is the curing of the leper. This was done by simply saying to the diseased man: "Be thou clean." Many such deeds are related of Jesus in the story of his life. Let us examine this miracle in the light of medical science. If Jesus performed this wonderful cure, let us understand the magnitude of his act. A leper is a person affected with leprosy. Leprosy among the Hebrews was an incurable disease, and the person afflicted with this loathsome malady was not only shunned by his fellow-beings, but was looked upon as unclean ceremonially. This disease was of such a nature as to render the skin and flesh insensible and, in time, to deform or destroy the part affected. The curing of leprosy by a word would indeed be a miracle. Let us ask ourselves candidly: Is it possible that such a miracle was ever performed? Must we not reject this account in Matthew as unworthy of rational belief? As well could Jesus have added the wealth of a Rockefeller to the first beggar that asked him for a crust, by saying, "Be thou rich," or could have made the first individual whom he passed taller than the temple by saying, "Be thou a thousand feet high," or could have changed the muttering of the idiot into the discourse of the philosopher by saying, "Be thou wise," as he could give health to a man sick, with an incurable disease by saying, "Be thou clean."

Could Jesus restore sight to the blind, speech to the dumb, hearing to the deaf, he could also drive envy, hate and malice from the mind of man. If he could banish disease from one man, why not from all men? If he could drive evil from one heart, why not from every heart? If he could raise Lazarus from the dead, why could he not rob every grave of its sad story and erase the words death and mourning from the language of man? The compassion which heeded the prayers of Mary and Martha should not have turned away from the grief and tears of the world.

If Jesus did what is related in the gospels, was it to relieve the misery, the suffering, the pain of mankind, or was it simply to exhibit the possession of his wonderful power? If this person could make the broken body whole and repair the havoc of accident and disease, every sick, crippled and unfortunate being born on the earth is a witness of his inhumanity, his unkindness and his lack of mercy. To possess the power to prevent human suffering and not to exercise it, is cruel. Jesus must be charged either with lack of power to save mankind from the ills of life or with lack of feeling in not manifesting his power. His apologists may clothe him with either character they please. It would require no more to say to the afflicted everywhere, "Be ye clean" than to say it to a single individual. I see no excuse for a disease on earth, if Jesus could cure a leper. He was either the most heartless wretch that ever lived, or his biographer has put a power in his hands greater than he could exercise.

In the gospel according to Matthew is told a story that the most willing faith cannot swallow without an effort. We are informed that a great tempest arose at sea and that the waves were so high that they covered the ship. His disciples were afraid, and begged Jesus to save them, as they feared that they might perish in the fury of the storm. Jesus thereupon rebuked the winds and the sea, and a great calm followed. Such a story, it is safe to say, would not convert a sailor. This miracle endows the winds and the waves with the sense of hearing and makes them obedient to a spoken command. Think of the air and the water with ears and with the power to obey a voice which bids them "Be still." By believing such a foolish story as this a person confesses his lack of intelligence. What must be thought of a church that requires its members to accept as true, this miracle of stilling the tempest?

When a man deeds himself to the church he surrenders his judgment, his reason, his knowledge and even his arithmetic, geography and grammar to its keeping. It does not require a deep soil of brains for miracles to grow in.

The most astounding of the many wonderful performances of Jesus was bringing Lazarus back to life, after he had been buried four days. This is a miracle indeed. We have no scale with which to measure the greatness of this act. All the deeds of time pale into insignificance before its splendor.

It eclipses Nature and makes the glories of earth and sky but the cheap impositions of a fakir. This act of Jesus towers above the heights of human effort as the mountain towers above the sea; it outstrips human endeavor as the sun outshines the fire-fly. It surpasses the utmost of man's attempt as the blooming rose surpasses a paper flower. Could such a wonderful act be performed, and history ignore it, science treat it with contempt, and philosophy pass it by as unworthy of serious consideration? The intelligent world has treated this story of raising Lazarus from the grave as though it were too absurd to deserve notice. Ignorance, superstition and credulity have looked upon it as proof of the divinity of Jesus and have swallowed it whole.

I had rather believe that the author of this story was guilty of falsehood than to believe that Nature ever wrote a lie on the face of death.

If Jesus raised Lazarus from the dead, he could reverse the machinery of the universe, turn back the wheels of time, change hay back to grass, the fruit back to blossom and the stars back to "chaos and old night." A person possessed with power such as this could defy the fury of the elements, live indifferent to summer's heat and winter's cold, hold pestilence at arm's length, and face danger without a fear. If Jesus performed this miraculous act, why did he die upon the cross? The cross is the mark of his defeat, the tombstone of his divinity. It makes the miracle-stories fables. It proves false every word written about him. It makes his performances tricks, and his words but the mouthings of a lunatic. Had he done what we find related of him in the gospel narratives, the cross should have perished beneath him, the nails that were driven through his hands should have broken ere they pierced his flesh, and his torturers should have been confounded in their fiendish work. Never was a story written with a more ridiculous ending. Jesus should have been pictured a conqueror to the last. He should have been a god when led to the scaffold. The vinegar and gall which were given him to allay his thirst should have become wine on his lips and given satisfaction to his craving. He should have taken up his cross as if it were his sceptre and conquered his enemies with it. When his revilers wrote over his head: "This is Jesus the king of the Jews," the crown of his office should have blossomed upon his brow to prove his royal claim. When they called to him, "If thou be the Son of God, come down from the cross," the cruel instrument of his suffering should have broken in pieces beneath its divine burden and Jesus should have stood in their midst without a scar or a mark from his crucifixion. When the priests, the scribes and elders mocked him and said, "He saved others, himself he cannot save," he ought to have burst the semblance of human weakness which bound him to the cross and walked forth freed from the bonds that held him.

When they said, "Let him come down from the cross and we will believe him to be the king of Israel," he should have won faith from every man and woman who witnessed his agony by putting an end to it and asserting his superiority to human nature.

Why did not Jesus do these things? Why did he not come down from the cross? There is but one answer to that question: because he could not do it, because he was a man, and not a God. Do you tell me that a being who could still the tempest with a whispered rebuke; who could drive fever from a woman by his touch; who could set the beauty of health on the throne of disease and change leprosy to loveliness by a word; who could make the water blush to wine beneath the declaration of his power and who could break the seals of death and put life into the form which had been the bride of the grave for four days, could not rend to pieces a wooden cross and tear his body from the prison of the iron spikes that held him captive? That Jesus died upon the cross is proof that the gospel narrative of this person is not to be believed. When he cried out, "My God! my God! why hast thou forsaken me?" he cried with a human voice inspired by human weakness. This speech puts an end to the claim of his divinity. There was humanity in that cry; there was disappointment, despair and defeat in it. The fatal weakness of the gospel-story is in surrendering Jesus to the authority of death. A God should not have died, should not have been killed by men. He should have lived above every earthly power and used human events as the servants of his commands.

The author of the gospel story asserts that the death of Jesus affected Nature with sorrow and grief; that the earth groaned aloud and that the hearts of the rocks broke when he gave up the ghost. He tells us also the dead unfasted the doors of their graves and walked through the streets of the city. What a narrow border of grief for the death of a God! Why, the whole earth should have turned black! Only a hamlet in an out-of-the-way place affected by the event!

The God of the universe die and only a village know it? Every star should have dropped a tear and the whole heavens wept aloud! All earth from pole to pole should have quivered with sorrow, and the seas should have sobbed their grief on every shore. Nature lose its God and the loss not cause a pang beyond a few miles from his death-scene! Why, every tree would have dropped its leaves upon his bier, every flower would have shed the perfume of its life upon his grave; everything that lives would have died upon his funeral pyre and the light faded from the orb of day had the God of Nature died!

The attempt of the author to make the death of Jesus only a cabinet from which to produce another manifestation of his power must be regarded as a cheap afterthought.

The cross performed its mission of death. Jesus died like a mortal. His life ebbed away with no protest of power that should have prolonged his existence and confounded his enemies. Instead of showing divine endurance he perished miserably, and gave up the ghost in mortal agony. In face of this fact, do not point to his career as proving his divinity. Any appearance after such an ending is but feeble evidence of his superiority. To come from the tomb only to hide and skulk about as though ashamed of his defeat adds no dignity to his character and put no glory on his brow. When Jesus was taken down from the cross his crown fell from his forehead, a bauble of pride, not a symbol of divine power. When his body was in the tomb his divinity was buried. To add resurrection to his career in the hope of completing this claim to be the son of God was only to add one more falsehood to the narrative. But this marvelous appearance has not even the ordinary probability of a ghost story.

The rational mind in its study of the person called Jesus must judge the accounts of his performances by human standards. Jesus must answer to the demands of nature.

We must give him a human father and mother, an ordinary birth and a childhood with a child's career. We must take from his hands the power to work wonders; from his lips the right to speak in God's name; from his voice its command over nature, and from his life all those circumstances which sprung from the messianic faith. We must endow him with the estate of human nature; bestow upon his intellect the limitations of his age, and upon his actions the imperfections of mortals. We must make his birth, his life and his death entirely human, and when the stone has been placed at the door of his tomb, let it alone. We have nothing more to do with him.

The person who went about armed with miracles: who made health leap from the grave and painted the smile of life upon the face of death is a myth.

Jesus was born a man, lived a man, and died a man, or else he was never born, never lived, and never died.

This is the verdict of the rational mind in its study of the character called Jesus.

God, His Word, and His Son.

The terrible recklessness with which most people take their religious and moral curves is no doubt responsible for nine-tenths of the wreckage along this world's highways. Probably few people are deliberately bad, yet the effect is, unfortunately, the same. How many are there, who have any rules of conduct of their own, at all? Apparently very few. Nearly all take the Golden Rule, the Ten Commandments, the "Law," or the Bible, at a single gulp, without bothering much about their contents. Analysis might cause them to disgorge.

The "Law" is a contradiction, as it at once denies the ability of a man to govern himself and affirms his ability to govern not only himself but everyone else. Each must look to his neighbor for guidance, after said neighbor has duly disqualified for the job. So they all fall back upon tradition. They must have some authority back of the "Law." Feeling incompetent to govern themselves, they modestly vote to see which authority shall finally be accepted as fit to be thrust upon an unwilling minority.

And how stable are these "authorities"? The "Golden Rule" is out of the question except as a guide for individuals, as no one wishes to go to jail or be punished in any way. Each wants the other punished. The Ten Commandments fail in another direction—they prescribe no penalty, and penalty is to the Law what hell is to the "fall of man." No hell, no salvation; no salvation, no widow's mites; no widow's mites, no preachers. No penalty, no salary; no salary, no officers; no officers, no government. Being written upon stone, "with the finger of God" (Ex. xxxi, 18), they were necessarily brief, fingers not being proper instruments for concrete writing. The marks must have been very faint, but the vigor of expression was in no wise below par. "For I the Lord thy God, am a jealous God, visiting the iniquity of the fathers upon the children unto the third and fourth generation of them that hate me." Was this the same God whose sole earthly representative said (Matt. v, 44, 45): "Love your enemies, that ye may be the children of your father which is in heaven; for he maketh the sun to rise on the evil and on the good?" The rest of the chapter would seem like a "railing accusation" against such a—no, it was Satan that Michael, the archangel, durst not bring a railing accusation against, but said: "The Lord rebuke thee!" (Jude 9). Was Satan alone fearful enough to count? Exodus xxii, 28, says: "Thou shalt not revile the gods nor curse the ruler of thy people." In Deuteronomy x, 17, Moses says: "He is God of gods." But if so, why did he fear Satan? "For the Lord said 'The Lord rebuke thee, O Satan!'" (Zech. iii, 2). And yet he commanded those less powerful than he: "Thou shalt have no other gods before me." Satan was one of a company of devils and devils were "false gods." Beelzebub (prince of devils) was god of the flies. His rank is probably due to his being Beel, the god most hated by Jehovahists. Belial was another of high rank. Satan was the spirit of witchcraft, magic, etc. "The dumb man possessed with a devil" in Matthew ix, 32, was bewitched. Jesus cast out the devil and the spell was broken. "The dumb spake." The Pharisees thought him a servant of Beelzebub. And why not? When the "devils besought him" (Matthew viii, 31, 32) he placed them in a herd of swine, which "perished in the waters" and, I suppose, released the devils. Why didn't he destroy the devils, instead of humoring them? It is no wonder God was jealous!

After all, then, we must refer to the Bible as the authority back of the Ten Commandments. There we find penalties both individual and collective. Deuteronomy xxviii, 58, 59, says: "If thou wilt not observe to do all the words of this law that are written in this book, that thou mayest fear this glorious and fearful name, THE LORD, THY GOD, then the Lord will make thy plagues wonderful, and the plagues of thy seed, even great plagues and of long continuance and sore sickness." God evidently considered all of the commandments very important. And if one of them has been outlawed, none of them can be relied upon. We should be compelled to make our own selection, which would make us, and not the "commandments" the authority. If we don't know enough to decide without them, how can we know enough to decide which ones are true and which false?

The Bible, if trustworthy, must have been divinely inspired, as all authority must finally rest in God. Beyond him, no one seems inclined to go. He has given us these commands, with certain threats against their breakers, and if he be absolutely just (which any worth-while god must be) he must see that all these commands are enforced. A single exception would prove his injustice. Romans v, 20, says: "The law entered that the offense might abound"; so I suppose God gloried in punishing sinners. If so, the Ten Commandments, with a death penalty for everything except stealing must have given him a glorious opportunity! No wonder "the sceptre departed from Judah!" Every man worth mentioning must have died. Jesus, when his disciples were caught picking and eating someone else's corn on the Sabbath (Matthew xxii) did not declare the law to be wrong but claimed immunity because (verse 5) "In this place is one greater than the temple," saying: "Have ye not read how David entered the house of God and ate the shew-bread, which was not lawful for him nor them that were with him? The son of man is Lord, even of the Sabbath day." Numbers xv, 32-36, tells how a man found gathering sticks on that terrible day was stoned to death; for "whoso doeth any work on the Sabbath day, shall surely be put to death" (Ex. xxxi, 15). God himself rested that day. Jesus must have been not only greater than the temple, but greater than God. If Jesus were not a pretender, why did God allow him to be crucified for blasphemy? (John xix, 7).

Proverbs xix, 5, says: "A false witness shall not be unpunished; and he that speaketh lies shall perish." Peter denied Jesus with an oath, and cursed and swore. (Matt. xxvi, 72-74). In Matthew xvi, 18, 19, Jesus says: "Thou art Peter, and upon this rock I will build my church," while presenting him with the keys to heaven, earth, and hell. What did this leave for God?

The Lord should not be too severe, however, for the Bible says (2 Sam. xxiv): "The Lord moved David to number Israel and Judah. First Chronicles xxi, says Satan provoked David to number Israel. If that isn't profaning the name of the Lord, what is? It doesn't really matter who was to blame, for the Israelites got a three-day pestilence in which 70,000 men died. First John iii, 15, says: "No murderer hath eternal life abiding in him," yet the Lord is supposed to be eternal life itself. Job. iv, 17, applies the same standard of morality to God and man in the question, "Shall mortal man be more just than God?"

"Whoso sheddeth man's blood, by man shall his blood be shed, for in the image of God made he man" (Gen. ix, 6). This makes God and man equally sinners and shedders of blood.

David "died in a good old age, full of days, riches, and honor" (1 Chron. xxix, 28); and he "brought out the people and cut them with saws, and with the harrows of iron, and with axes; and so dealt he with all the cities of the children of Ammon (1 Chron. xx, 3). "And the Lord was with the Kai——no, David!" After David had committed adultery with Uriah's wife, he had Uriah placed in the forefront of battle, where he was to be and was killed. (2 Sam. xi, 15.) According to Lev. xx, 10, both David and Bath-sheba should have been killed. Justice was more completely furthered by the Lord's striking the illegitimate child (2 Sam. xii, 15), despite the promise that the children shall not be put to death for the father's sin (Deut. xxiv, 16.) After Solomon had gone after other gods, God would not wrest the kingdom from him, "for David thy father's sake (1 Kings xi, 10-12). Solomon killed his rivals to the throne (1 Kings ii), and reigned forty years thereafter (1 K. xi, 42). Three thousand men were killed to punish Aaron for making an image of a calf, from gold (Ex. xxxii, 28, 35). Moses saved what Israelites had not died by making a serpent of brass—the image of the serpents which had bitten the people

(Num. xxi, 6, 9). Probably this serpent could not talk or it would have got them into more trouble. But it did, anyway; for 2 Kings xviii, 4, says they burned incense to that serpent unto the days of Hezekiah, who broke it in pieces.

The Lord was said to have hardened Pharaoh's heart to instruct the Israelites. If so, the swag they carried away with them must have put them in fine fettle to cope with "Thou shalt not steal." The whole proceeding was an excellent example for future generations. No wonder Joshua took the "whole land" and gave it for an inheritance unto Israel! (Josh. xi, 23.) With Egypt in mind, I suppose, the children of Israel took "all the spoil of these cities, and the cattle," for a prey unto themselves, "as the Lord commanded Moses" (Josh. xi, 11, 15). What sort of justice is this that commands one man to steal, and another not to steal? David seems to have coveted about all his neighbors' wives, as well as everything that was his neighbor's.

"Everyone that curseth his father or his mother, shall be surely put to death" (Lev. xx, 9). In this connection, Jesus acted the part of the Garden of Eden serpent, for he says of himself (Matt. x, 35, 36): "I am come to set a man at variance against his father. And a man's foes shall be they of his own household." Could not he who "shut the lions' mouths" (Dan. vi, 22) have accomplished his purpose in any other way? Let us learn properly to place responsibility, even if it does shatter some of our pet idols.

BERTHA G. WILSON.

The Name of God.

It seems a peculiar thing that the word "God," which is known among Christians as a something to worship and adore on bended knee, was simply and originally an almost inarticulate cry by primitive man in fear as some mysterious phenomenon of Nature which he did not understand.

As to the origin of this name which now means "the uncreated Creator," the "Great First Cause," Daniel G. Brinton, in his book, "Religions of Primitive Peoples," writes as follows:

"Strange as it may seem, the English word 'God' is traced by Aryan scholars through the Gothic guth to the Sanscrit verb hua, to call upon, to invoke (past participle, hutha), the same primitive interjection in verbal form; and the holy name of the Hebrews, Yahve, is now believed to be that of the Chaldean god of the earth, waters and fertility, in whose name Ea, Ya or Yah, we recognize a cognate interjection or refrain, the same which, shouted in the orgiastic rites, gave the name, Bacchus or Iachus."

"Yah" as the name of God was therefore derived from a sacred ejaculation or cry, of the same phonetic value, which occurs repeatedly in the cults of America, Polynesia and Australia. This is also true of hua or ua, from which has come our word "God."

According to the cult of the Polynesians, the two words which expressed in its most general sense their concept of the Divine was io and atua, meaning "the central cause or essentiality of life." W. W. Gill, in his "Myths and Songs of the South Pacific," tells us (pp. 28, 34) that "the concrete meaning of both words is pith, kernel, core, center." Hence, their god or divinity was the core or center of all things.

Among the Indians of Michoacan the epithet of the chief goddess of their cult was "the Sustainer of Life"; in the Muskogean tribes his name was "the Master of Life," and among the Aztecs the highest divinity was Tonacatecutli, the "God of our Life."

According to the German writer, Freidrich Freihold, "the adoration of Light was the foundation of all religion," and when we examine the rude litanies of paganism all over the world it would seem to be true that they all join in the evangelical chant of the Bible: "God is Light, and in him is no darkness at all."

According to Smyth, in his "Aborigines of Victoria," the "Nurali" of the Murray river tribes of Australia was the god of light, while according to Brinton Baiaime was the supreme divinity of the Australian Blacks, living in keladi, or up above the sky. Like the omniscient Jehovah of the Christians he sees and knows all things. His name is etymologically derived from bhai, a verb which means "to make" or "cut out," as one cuts out patterns from cloth, and in the use of this name Baiaime these Australian people evidently intended to mean "the maker of light" or "the producer of light," light being cut out of the darkness of the night when dawn appeared and Baiaime began to reign on earth once more.

JOHN A. MORRIS.

Every absurdity has a champion to defend it.

Secularism Legal in Britain.

The majority judgment (four to one!) delivered in the House of Lords on May 14, by which the appeal in the Bowman case was finally dismissed, makes it clear that Secular societies founded for the purpose of carrying on anti-Christian propaganda are legally entitled to receive bequests of money. Hitherto testators desiring to make such bequests have frequently been uncertain whether their wishes would be loyally carried out. The heirs-at-law, whom the testator had no desire to enrich, might dispute the validity of the legacy, and use the lever of the law to divert to their own pockets money intended for Freethought purposes. In future no testator need feel any hesitation, no Rationalist society need feel any uncertainty; all moneys left to such societies will be handed over to them at the death of the testator exactly as to any other beneficiary. Up to the very last the decision was in doubt; lawyers were not agreed upon the correct interpretation of the law: so much doubt was there that even when the Lords delivered their judgment on May 14 the lord chancellor opened the proceedings by declaring the legacy illegal.

It will be remembered that Mr. Charles Bowman, by a will drawn up in 1905, directed that after the death of his wife his residuary estate should be held in trust for the Secular Society, Limited. Mr. Bowman died in 1908, and his widow in 1914. The heirs-at-law then claimed the residuary estate on the ground that the legacy to the Secular Society was bad, inasmuch as the objects of the society were illegal and contrary to public policy. The case was argued in the Court of Chancery in April, 1915, before Mr. Justice Joyce, who decided that the gift was valid and the Secular Society entitled to receive it. The heirs-at-law thereupon appealed against this decision, and the appeal was heard in July of the same year by the Master of the Rolls (Lord Cozens-Hardy), Lord Justice Pickford, and Lord Justice Warrington. The judgments delivered by them were all remarkable for their breadth of view, and the full official report (Law Reports, Chancery Division, 1915, December 1), ought to be in every Rationalist's library. The Master of the Rolls declined absolutely to consider the personality of the directors or other matters outside the Memorandum of Association, by which, and by which alone, the Society was bound. Many of the objects of the Society were, he said, held by a large section of the community, and he thought it would be retrograde to hold that there was necessarily any illegality in the Company. He refused to accept the definitions of blasphemy given by Stephen and Lord Halsbury; in his opinion the better view was that expressed by Lord Coleridge. If the decisions in "Briggs v. Hartley" (1850) and "Cowan v. Milbourn" (1867) were still good, the society could not claim the legacy; but, in his opinion, they were not good law, and therefore the appeal must be dismissed. Lord Justice Pickford and Lord Justice Warrington agreed. The three judges were unanimous in confirming Mr. Justice Joyce's judgment that the gift to the Secular Society was valid.

That four high court judges should be against them was not enough to satisfy the heirs-at-law, and so they again appealed. They appear to have nourished the hope that an appeal to the Conservative House of Lords would bring to light Conservative judges who were either lawyers obdurately bound by the strict letter of the law, or Christians obdurately bound by the iron prejudices of their creed. The appeal was argued in January and February last before the Lord Chancellor (Lord Finlay), Lord Buckmaster, Lord Parker of Waddington, and Lord Sumner; and on May 14 the final judgment was delivered. It was rumored that the appellants had been authoritatively assured that the decision would be in their favor; and as the lord chancellor proceeded with the reading of his judgment it looked very much as though, for once in a way, Dame Rumor was right. After an exhaustive review of the various authorities, the lord chancellor accepted the more tolerant view that a temperate attack upon religion in which the decencies of controversy were maintained did not constitute the crime of blasphemy; nevertheless, he held that Christianity was part of the law of the land, and that the courts could not help in the promotion of objects contrary to the Christian religion: if the law of England was to be altered on this point, he said, the change must be affected by the act of the legislature, and not by judicial decision. In his opinion, the objects of the society were illegal, and the appeal must therefore be allowed. The lord chancellor seems to have adhered strictly to the letter of the law as found in early decisions, accepting the dictum that Christianity is part and parcel of the law, and admitting the ruling in Briggs v. Hartley and Cowan v. Milbourn as applicable to the present day. Yet he rejected the harsher definitions of blasphemy in favor of the more tolerant view taken by Lord Coleridge. I agree absolutely that if the law of England requires alteration—as it certainly does in regard to offences against religion—then the change should be effected through the legislature, and not through judicial decisions. The common law, however, originates in the decisions of judges and not in the legislature, and older decisions are rejected and more modern ones accepted if the modern authority more closely represents the spirit of the age. The difficulty in regard to the common law of blasphemy is that it is reinforced and strengthened by statute law; and until that is repealed there is always the possibility that "the spirit of the age" may be one of retrogression and intolerance, and call the law in aid.

Lord Dunedin dealt, among other points, with the contention that if the objects of the Society were illegal the court could not lend its assistance to the promotion of an illegal object. The court, he said emphatically, was not asked to give assistance to carry out the objects of the society; its assistance was asked only to compel the executor to do his duty, so that the society might receive what was legally due to it. In his opinion the appeal must be dismissed.

Lord Parker held that the first and governing object of the society was not illegal; that it did not involve blasphemy; that it was not immoral or seditious; that it was not irreligious, although no doubt it was anti-Christian. He said:

"It would be a serious matter for their lordships' house, unless clearly compelled by authority, to lay down a principle which would preclude the courts of this country from giving effect to trusts for the purposes of religions which, however sacred they might be to millions of his majesty's subjects, either denied the truth of Christianity or at any rate did not accept some of its fundamental doctrines."

With Lord Dunedin, he considered that the appeal failed.

Lord Sumner's judgment was read by Lord Dunedin. It was both witty and lively, and gave evidence of a delightfully rebellious temper, most unusual in that solemn chamber. He even spurned the sacred phrase, beloved of generations of lawyers, "Christianity is part of the law of the land," saying that the phrase "is not law at all; it is just rhetoric"! "Thou shalt love thy neighbor as thyself" was one part of our law. Christianity had tolerated chattel slavery; not so the present law of England. The rules and principles of the English law were applied in heathen communities; and its sanctions, even in courts of conscience, were material and not spiritual. The objects of the Secular Society were, in his opinion, not now contrary to law, and the appeal must be dismissed.

Lord Buckmaster agreed with Lords Dunedin, Parker and Sumner in supporting the decisions of the Courts below, and pointed out that, if it were illegal to promote doctrines hostile to Christianity, then there were a number of religious and ethical bodies which were illegal associations; editors and publishers could refuse payment to authors employed to write philosophical and scientific books; and no one could be compelled to pay for such books; a great deal of classical and scientific literature would be condemned under conditions which might vary from year to year as different views from time to time prevailed.—HYPATIA BRADLAUGH BONNER, in the Literary Guide.

A Conspiracy in Restraint of Happiness.

These dog-in-the-manger hypocrites who are trying to shut people off from everything that young, healthy, normal people like, remind me of Tommy and his grandmother. Said she, "Tommy, I wouldn't slide down the banisters, if I were you." "Neither would I, if I were you, grandma," retorted Tommy.

The spirit of puritanism, that is of meddlesomeness, is rampant in Indiana. This is plainly to be seen by the character of many of the bills brought before the legislature. One man proposes a bill intended to put Sunday shows out of business, by requiring every Sunday entertainment to give one-half of its gross receipts to charity.

If the people did not want entertainment on Sunday, the shows would cease from lack of patronage. The pious sneaks who do not pay taxes and who do claim a monopoly of money making on one-seventh of our time should influence people to stay away from the shows, if they can. But they are not content to compete with the shows fairly and in addition to cajole and threaten the foolish to keep them from patronizing the Sunday entertainment. They must get laws passed to help them in the carrying on of their nefarious business without competition.

THE TRUTH SEEKER.

FOUNDED BY D. M. BENNETT, 1873
 CONTINUED BY E. M. MACDONALD, 1883-1909
 G. E. MACDONALD Editor
 L. K. WASHBURN Editorial Contributor
 Sixty-two Vesey Street, New York, N. Y.
 Post Office Box 1610.

SATURDAY - - - JUNE 23, 1917

It would be a good thing if the church would stop saving men and women and make more of them worth saving. It is a job lot that Roman Catholicism sends to heaven. The place must resemble a penitentiary, or a Bowery saloon with a parochial school adjunct. It would help the world if there was less faith and more sense among Christians.

Every day that the United States government postpones the abolition of the parochial school is like putting off a surgical operation for a gangrene limb. As a nation we are fast becoming the victim of Jesuitical intrigue. The success of Romanism is due to stupidity and treachery, the two attributes most cultivated and rewarded by Roman Catholicism.

There are crimes that can be forgiven, but the food-speculator deserves only execration. Every one of the scoundrels who is responsible for the unreasonable price of food-stuffs ought to be sentenced to die of starvation. There are murderers of all kinds, but the lowest, basest, most heartless kind is the murderer who puts the price of food beyond the reach of the poor.

The weightiest thing before the American people is to protect liberty. The greatest foe of liberty is superstition, and the mightiest store house of this undesirable commodity is the Christian church. What this church is doing to preserve our country's freedom I am at a loss to understand. It is more concerned about the preservation of its stupid dogmas than about the fate of liberty.

The Christian church asks exemption of its property from taxation on the ground that its existence in the community exerts a good moral influence. Since when has Christianity stood for morality? There is no question in my mind but what a moral man is a better man than is the Christian man, but morality is the way to hell, according to the most popular Christian preacher in the United States.

What right has the Roman Catholic church, or any other church, to claim exemption from criticism, and to demand that those who do not agree with certain theological or ecclesiastical statements shall be declared heretics by the church and criminals by the state? The only safety for right and the only surety for truth is freedom of criticism, and when this is denied man the hope of progress is at an end. L. K. W.

Making the Touch.

In consulting bound volumes of this paper, which now comprise forty-three imposing tomes, we observe that in at least one respect we have fallen short of the work of our editorial predecessors. Our remissness is in not so often as they reminding readers of their duty toward THE TRUTH SEEKER. Mr. Bennett, the founder, was a very good solicitor, a convincing petitioner, and expert in stating his needs and the way they could be supplied if everybody would help. He used to ask his readers frequently if they did not think that THE TRUTH SEEKER as an advocate of emancipation from the errors and mists of superstition was worthy of support, and tell them that without their support the paper would die a natural death. The friends in those days came forward and contributed as though it were a privilege and a pleasure. But the paper lived on a narrow margin. Bennett occasionally published the fact that he never had funds enough ahead to open a bank account. His successor, E. M. Macdonald, continued Bennett's policy of appealing often to subscribers for their dues, their patronage and their generous aid; and he had the ability to write an article or a circular letter that would "pull." In our many years of association with him as his editorial helper, he entrusted to us the handling of most subjects, but we were never commissioned by him to word a call for subscriptions, renewals or funds. That showed his wisdom and his business sagacity, for we lacked and still lack the touch. Our mind, moreover, was more or less affected by certain cynical maxims, like that of Franklin when he said that if a religion did not support itself and God did not take care to support it, it was a sign that the religion was a poor one. Again, while we were conducting a paper in San Francisco, our associate, Mr. Putnam, sent out a circular soliciting funds to pay our salary. One man replied that if the editor could not make a living running a paper he should try something else. That looked reasonable, and we soon followed the advice.

This attitude of mind accounts for there being fewer S.O.S. calls in THE TRUTH SEEKER than formerly. The writing of them would not be a pleasant task for the editor if he had a gift that way. Perhaps, however, unusual circumstances, like those now prevailing in the country and the world, may warrant reference to the financial aspect of the paper's affairs, which are adversely affected by the war, and justify us in stating that friends have the opportunity, if they are so disposed, to render the sort of assistance our predecessors were willing to ask for.

The excuse for this kind of an editorial this week is a letter from Brother W. H. Harvey, treasurer of the Thomas Paine National Historical Association, inclosing a check that carries his subscription far into the good time coming, and indulging in some commendatory remarks on THE TRUTH SEEKER and paying tributes to the editor that we must place on file for the use of our funeral eulogist. The kindly sentiment of Mr. Harvey's letter rejoices us beyond expression. He tells of what great benefit the paper has been in his family during the past twenty years; and then, switching to the subject of the editor, remarks: "I for one will give him his little bit of well-deserved 'taffy' while he is alive to enjoy its sweetness, and not wait to give him a whole lot of 'epitaphy' after he's gone." He adds that he wishes every reader of THE TRUTH SEEKER might meet us—and here we must cease quoting. We echo the wish, however, and hereby thank Brother Harvey for expressing it. We have some loyal friends who come in to look us over, and who, having done so, lend a hand. This is gratifying, even flattering.

Our attitude, here indicated, would excuse well-wishers of our cause in saying that if we cannot publish a paper that Freethinkers will support without any appeal to their good will, then something is wrong with our method. We solicit attention to that aspect of the matter. There may be something in it. Should the verdict be against us, we shall still find consolation in repeating the well-known saying that more papers have died of excellence than from other causes.

On the other hand, all enterprises are promoted by canvassing, soliciting, recommending, and by gratuities. It may be true that if a man makes a better mousetrap than anybody else, the world will wear a path to his door, but we are skeptical. The best books do not have the largest sale, the best preachers do not have the largest congregations, nor the best papers the widest circulation. To say that the "best" survives is to say that the mass of mankind know the best when they see it, which is absurd. But the test does not apply exactly to THE TRUTH SEEKER and American Freethinkers, because they have practically no choice between papers of its class. It is the only one there is, and their choice is virtually THE TRUTH SEEKER or no Freethought journal.

This article is submitted in conjunction with others on the same line recently published to direct attention to the physical department of the paper—the part that has to do with material things, such as running expenses, bills for printing, postage, rent, white paper, the payroll, and so on. Our readers and Freethinkers themselves are so widely distributed that customers may not be reached by a house-to-house canvass as might be done if this were the best mouse-trap instead of the best paper. We must rely on the remote chance that they will see these words and read them, be favorably impressed, thence moved to think them over and act accordingly. The gist of it is that we wish more Freethinkers would look upon the interests of THE TRUTH SEEKER as their own, and do what they conveniently can to promote its prosperity.

His Most Orthodox Majesty, William II.

Since the European War began there has been no end of Christian criticism of the German emperor's conception of religion. On every side the pious religionist expresses himself as horrified at the kaiser's blasphemy in linking God to his cause. Such behavior is looked upon by the believer as insulting to the Almighty, as well as to the kaiser's loyal subjects. "This is a holy war," exclaim the pietists, and "religious as well as civil liberty is at stake." It is most extraordinary that William II., who before the war was looked upon as the most religious and devout ruler in the whole of Europe—for such is the testimony of the Spanish Infanta, Eulalia, in her book on the sovereigns of Europe—should experience such a sudden transformation in his spiritual nature because of a great war, the philosophy of which had for generations formed a part of the education of every male Teuton.

Contrary to the popular religious judgment regarding the kaiser, we hold that he is eminently loyal to the Christian creed, that in all his military acts he has followed most carefully the traditions of his pious ancestors, and that he is preserving amidst much obloquy and vituperation from persons who ought to know better, the gospel of the triune God in its essential purity. For how has God revealed himself in his "Holy Word"? We read that "the Lord is a man of war." If that be true, why then should not his earthly representative also be a man of war?

For the kaiser to represent himself as the viceroy of divinity was no piece of Teutonic vanity on his part, for the same scripture tells us that "the powers that be are ordained of God. Whosoever therefore resisteth the power, resisteth the ordinance of God: and they that resist shall receive to themselves damnation." In this declaration there is nothing whatever said about the mental or moral fitness of the ruler for his position. In insisting, therefore, upon the divine right of kings, notwithstanding the fact that modern progress spurns as highly pernicious all such antiquated conceptions, the German emperor is in perfect accord with Bible revelation, and with the true apprehension of Christian morality.

This also accounts for his marked intimacy with God, for as one divinely appointed the kaiser naturally feels that God is conspicuously on his side. He plainly thinks with Joshua that God has commanded him, and he wisely applies to himself the scriptural promise: "Be strong and of a good courage; be not afraid, neither be thou dismayed: for the Lord thy God is with thee whithersoever thou goest." "Every place that the sole of your foot shall tread upon, that have I given unto you." "There shall not any man be able to stand before thee all the days of thy life." "I will not fail thee, nor forsake thee, . . . for unto this people shalt thou divide for an inheritance the land, which I swore unto their fathers to give them." These and many other promises and injunctions were given to the Jewish general, Joshua, under the impulse of war, which is the ringing keynote of the Bible from its beginning to its close. Nay, more than this, the biblical narrative carries the war sentiment into the very courts of the celestial home, for we read that "there was war in heaven: Michael and his angels fought against the dragon: and the dragon fought and his angels." The "Word of God"—otherwise known as Jesus—is represented in heaven as having "a sharp sword" which "goeth out of his mouth, that with it he should smite the nations: and he shall rule them with a rod of iron: and he treadeth the winepress of the fierceness and wrath of Almighty God."

The utility of the sword over the gentler implements of progress is again and again emphasized in "holy" writ, for therein we read this command: "Beat your plowshares into swords, and your pruning hooks into spears; let the weak say, I am strong." And again: "I came not to send peace, but a sword." And still further: "He that hath no sword let him sell his garment and buy one." Arms are more than raiment.

Is it to be wondered at for a moment that under the inspiration of such divine and supernatural instruction, a highly energetic and intellectual personage, such as is the German emperor, should at some time in his career feel impelled to break away from conditions of fruitless inactivity, and to strike an effective military blow for the cause of the "Lord of Hosts" and the kingdom of his righteousness? Besides, it must be remembered that there was a great reward promised by God to the human executors of his divine will. Take the case of Jehu, who had slain all the descendants of the house of Ahab. God said to him: "Because thou hast done well in executing that which is right in mine eyes . . . thy children of the fourth generation shall sit on the throne of Israel."

The emperor of Germany has been bitterly denounced not only for having caused the war, as is the popular opinion, but also for the inhuman methods made use of by him in conducting the conflict. He is frequently compared with Attila, king of the Huns, who is known to religious history as the "Scourge of God." His attack upon Belgium, a neutral country, is constantly cited as an illustration of his complete ruthlessness in waging war, and his utter disregard of international law and the rights of a civilian population, just as if nothing of the kind had ever before occurred in the history of a civilized nation. Men reasoning on this wise have entirely forgotten, if indeed they ever knew, that the kaiser had the very best of precedents when he crossed with his army the confines of Belgium, in order that he might peacefully pass through the country into the land of the enemy. Again it is "Holy Scripture" that testifies to the splendid orthodoxy of the German emperor. Here is the proof: "When thou comest nigh unto a city to fight against it, then proclaim peace unto it. And it shall be, that if it make the answer of peace, and open unto thee, then it shall be, that all the people that is found therein shall be tributaries unto thee, and they shall serve thee. And if it will make no peace with thee, but will war against thee, then thou shalt besiege it: And when the Lord thy God hath delivered it into thine hands, thou shalt smite every male thereof with the edge of the sword: But the women and the little ones, and the cattle, and all that is in the city, even all the spoil thereof, shalt thou take unto thyself; and thou shalt eat the spoil of thine enemies, which the Lord thy God hath given thee." "And they burnt all their cities wherein they dwelt, and all their goodly castles with fire." This was done because the Lord had commanded his generals to "kill every male among the little ones, and every married woman: but all the women children that are virgins, keep alive for yourselves." This is the witness of divine revelation to the justice of the kaiser's cause, and of his fidelity to the principles of Christianity as revealed in the "Word of God."

There is no need to enlarge further upon this subject. The truth of the case is that Germany's ruler knows his religious text-book much more thoroughly than the would-be Christians who have so liberally condemned him. If they have forgotten the teachings and practices found in the Bible, he has remembered them and made them effective. If they strive to set aside certain portions of that book made objectionable by advanced ethical culture and intelligence, he continues to receive it in its entirety, interpreting it in accordance with the example of his fathers. If they allow themselves to be affected in part by the results of the higher criticism, he will continue to stand by the complete integrity of the Bible revelation, and ally himself with the distinguished warriors whose exploits are therein celebrated, and who thereby won for themselves the illustrious title, the "Friend of God."

When the Bible ceases forever to be a guide to humanity in matters of highest import, then there will be possible no longer a German emperor carrying on an inhuman warfare, and no longer a body of believers who, while condemning his methods, share his faith in the dogmas of a superstitious creed. The Bible is passing; and it is to Rationalism that men must look for the system of life and truth which shall ultimately occupy the place which that form of superstition partially fills.

Where Is God?

If God is in the world today, where is he? What is he doing? Is he taking part in the world's war which is raging in Europe? If so, on which side is he? Man, more than ever before, is doubting his religion; doubting what he has been taught; doubting his religious teachers. The great question which puts itself to thinking persons is this: Does anybody know anything about God? If so, what? If there is no knowledge of God, why not say so? Why not be honest and face the truth?

It seems to me that the world's name today is Philip. All men and women are saying in one voice, as did Philip: "Lord, show us the Father and it sufficeth us." Did Jesus show Philip the Father? He did not. What did he do? He showed himself, and said: "He that hath seen me hath seen the Father." It is unfortunate that we do not know whether Philip was satisfied with the answer that Jesus made to his request. But, whether he was or not, we are not, and today, as of old, men and women say: "Show us the Father and it sufficeth us."

It is up to the church that teaches that there is a God to show him or to otherwise prove his existence. The world has believed without proof, ever since there was a world. There have been thousands of gods, and men have gone to their funerals. Every man who dies takes his god with him.

What we wish to know is this: Is the church telling the truth, or is it lying? Does its faith rest upon ignorance and superstition or upon facts? It will help clear up the divine mystery to learn upon what foundation it stands. Let us understand what is taught by the church: It is asserted that there is a God in the universe, who is a Father in heaven, and that this God watches over and cares for the children of men. Now, what we wish to know is this: What is the foundation for this assertion? What are the facts upon which the Christian church bases its teaching? We ask the church to give to the world these facts, and, if it cannot furnish any such facts, then we wish to know why it should not be accused of lying. There is or is not a God in this universe. By a God, I mean such a Providential power as the Christian church teaches. I do not mean Nature, the laws of Nature, or any natural force. I mean the Father in heaven taught in the New Testament as God who answers the prayers of human beings. Is there such a God alive in this universe and acting for the safety and salvation of mankind? If there is, where is he?

I assert that there is not such a God in the great world of stars and suns and planets, and I moreover assert that there was not in the past any such God. But I will surrender to facts. If the Christian church will back up its teaching with proof, I will acknowledge that I am mistaken and "take God in mine." I believe that more than half of the men and women on this earth stand just where I do. They are tired of being told to "believe and be saved." They want something for their belief. They want a reason why they should believe. They want to know whether they are being deceived. The church has preached a God long enough. It fails to convince the thinking mind. It must do more than preach. It must furnish the evidence that it preaches the truth. The world says to the church: "Show us the Father and it sufficeth us."

L. K. W.

"Church Exemption."

We advertise week by week the pamphlet entitled "Exempting the Churches" for 25 cents the copy. In view of the exemptions the church is enjoying in the midst of taxation laid right and left on everything else, we are offering two copies of the pamphlet at the price of one, to be sent to members of Congress. A person may pay us twenty-five cents and give us the name of his congressman and senator, and we will mail a copy of the book to each, or to two other addresses he may designate.

It appears that besides the church's being exempt from any expenses in the conduct of the war, its ministers and theological students are to be exempt from personal danger. On what ground the theologs are let out we cannot imagine. They certainly are not too valuable to be spared by the community. They are not worth more to the state than a graduate of the technical, medical or agricultural college. And no one can contend that the church which raises slackers is as important as the home that raises soldiers; but the home is taxed and the church is not. Fire the pamphlets "Exempting the Churches" at your legislators.

The Times of Manila, P. I., May 5, contains a piece of news indicating that the people of the Philippines have caught the idea that exemption of church-owned property is wrong. Says the Times:

"That the archbishop of Manila of the Roman Catholic church should pay the city $12,500 for the use of the land occupied by the Monte de Piedad and cede in turn the premises of the Santa Cruz church on the north, west and east sides, is the motion presented by Member Isabelo de los Reyes at the session of the municipal board Friday morning.

"Don Belong said: 'On September 24, 1914, the municipal board authorized the mayor to propose to the archbishop of Manila to pay $12,500 for the use of the land occupied by the Monte de Piedad and also cede to the city all of the premises on the north, east and west sides of the Santa Cruz church. The archbishop failed to give his answer to the said proposition, and so it is hereby proposed that the mayor be authorized to make again the same proposition, and if refused, that the land be returned to the city or a rent be demanded in proportion with its assessed value of $65,338, according to a report submitted by the city collector dated April 27, 1917.

"The attention of the mayor should be called to a letter of Acting Gov. Gen. Gilbert and to an opinion of City Attorney Escaler dated September 30, 1915, both of which specifically state that the Monte de Piedad, in order to continue enjoying the privileges granted by its franchise as a charitable institution, should be supervised by the government; and as it is not, it has lost its franchise as recently declared by the Supreme Court. Attorney Escaler also said that the Monte de Piedad should return to the city the land it occupies."

"Don Belong's proposition was referred to the mayor." "Constant Reader," who forwards the Manila paper, says that the Monte de Piedad, which it is proposed to tax, is a pawnshop run by the church.

An anti-clerical speaker, Mr. W. D. Bulman, was recently attacked and beaten in his hotel in Walla Walla, Washington, by Catholic ruffians. The affair caused a stir which involved the whole community. The Ministerial Union passed resolutions demanding the enforcement of the laws against the persons guilty of the crime, and because Mayor Mike Toner refused to put the law in motion against his fellow-religionists the citizens of Walla Walla held a mass meeting and demanded his recall. Whether the Catholic thugs are ever caught and punished or not, the church must be convinced by this demonstration that it will be unsafe hereafter to depend on strong-arm methods for the suppression of free speech.

An error is to be corrected. Col. E. A. Stevens of Chicago, whose biography was printed June 9, writes:

"DEAR MACDONALD: Kindly correct the second sentence in biography about commission. While not commissioned during the war, I have about fifteen commissions since, with badges entitling me to wear the colonel's silver eagle. Otherwise the biographical sketch is very good. Yours truly, E. A. STEVENS."

Peace has its colonelcies no less distinguished than those of war. Colonel Stevens has borne arms for three nations, England, Italy and America, and only his age and health prevent him from reinforcing the Allies.

When man has come to the Turnstiles of Night, all the creeds in the world seem to him wonderfully alike and colorless.—Rudyard Kipling.

MAN AS HIS OWN GOD-MAKER

Being a Brief Psychological Study of Religion and Religious Beliefs.

Religion has been studied and investigated from various points of view, such as the historical, ethical and social, but a psychological study of religion gets closer to fundamentals and gives a better understanding of religion because it directly involves the human side and its attributes.

Psychology is defined as the science of the mind and consists of a systematic investigation and knowledge of its powers and functions, describing and explaining the various states of consciousness, which includes such things as the sensations, emotions, desires, cognitions, volitions and decisions.

An acquaintance with the workings of the human mind and an understanding of the causes of such workings or states of consciousness will often explain what has seemed to be an insurmountable difficulty and throw much light on subjects that have heretofore appeared to elude all attempts at explanation.

It is well to remember that the human brain is a most plastic and sensitive organ—like the soft wax of a phonographic record—and that three important anatomical divisions of the nervous system are involved in the production and recognition of all sensations, namely, nerve-fibers that carry currents to the brain, the organs of central redirection, and the nerve fibers which carry sensations out. From this we directly infer three fundamental conscious processes and their conditions, as sensation, cerebration and tendency to action. If we will carry this brief introduction in the mind we can understand more clearly the problems of the origin of religious and other impulses.

Now, all states of consciousness, as such, are subject to investigation and explanation by that branch of science known as psychology; and as all religious "experiences" are certainly states of consciousness, all religious phenomena come under this classification, and a natural, scientific, explanation of their origin and process can be given. As all the gods of any religion are inductions from experience, and their existence made evident in consciousness, they are also proper subjects for psychology to investigate.

Just as physical science denies miracles, and historical criticism contests the authenticity of portions of the Bible, so psychology explains, by natural means, the so-called "revelation and conversion," two very important items in religion.

Those who accept the Christian brand of religion tell us that their "inner" religious experiences or spiritual enlightenment constitute an "act of faith," which not only proves to them the existence of a God, but is a phenomenon beyond the realms of scientific investigation; that these religious experiences cannot be analyzed, and that the apprehension of religious truth requires a special sense or faculty.

The only answer to such rubbish is to proceed at once to analyze these experiences and show that they are states of consciousness and amenable to scientific investigation through psychology, and to remember that before the growth of this mental science all religious men spoke in similar language of practically every phase of mental life, and always rejected a logical, satisfactory, human account of certain experiences in favor of a superhuman one.

They forget that "faith" is not a rare phenomenon, and that it is not limited to religious life, but is met with in every phase of human existence. It is as essential to the progress of commerce, industry or science as it is to religion, for it is in making faith-ventures that commerce and industry are established and that new scientific hypotheses are afforded a chance to prove themselves true. The faith act is a commonplace of life, because it is a corollary of imperfect knowledge and a condition of the acquisition of knowledge necessary to life.

If superhuman factors are at work within human experience, there are no ways of discovering them except the ways of science, and a theology that should remain within the domain inaccessible to science would be limited to a mere description of man's religious consciousness, and would be deprived of the right to any opinion on the subjective reality of its objects (like gods) and on the universal validity of its propositions.

As Professor Denney says: "Though Jesus Christ has for the religious consciousness the religious value of God, he has for the scientific consciousness only the real value of a common ordinary man," for judgments of value belong to psychology as much as any other fact of consciousness.

With regard to sensory feelings, science discovers their partial dependence upon sensations and specific organs, the objective condition of their appearance, their effects upon volition, etc., and a similar statement is true of the higher feelings; they are also dependent upon psycho-physiological factors and belong also to a vast network of causal connections which it is the task of science to bring to light.

To say that a thing is true because of "inner experiences" is not only a ridiculous statement, but shows a lack of knowledge of the elements of mental science.

The existence of every one of the gods in whom man has ever put his faith has been held to be proved by the test of "experience." So fetiches are trusted because their efficiency has been proved. Yahve showed himself to be the true god by helping his worshipers to defeat the hosts of Chemosh; and the Virgin Mary, that valued mother of Catholicism, demonstrates daily her powers of intercession by serving those who address their petitions to her.

Whatever early impressions are made on the human brain along religious lines, and are continually repeated, have a tendency to become so fixed and automatic that it is with difficulty that in later life, if at all, the person so afflicted can ever rid himself of them or be able to think in a rational manner in regard to them. The same impressions, running over the same pathway of nerve fibers, make a road, as it were, and in this manner habits are formed that diminish the conscious attention with which these facts are performed. Thus constant tipping of the hat to a church when one passes, and crossing oneself before a shrine, lead to so fixed a habit with members of the Greek and Roman Catholic faiths that these movements become automatic and almost unconscious.

It was perfectly natural for man, in his struggle to attain physical and spiritual life, to make use of every kind of power in the existence of which he believed; and to gratify these desires he has developed three kinds of behavior by which he endeavors to make use of the forces about him in the struggle for preservation and enrichment of life, and these three modes are found among all peoples.

Leading psychologists classify these types as, first, the mechanical behavior; second, the coercive behavior or magic; and, third, the anthropopathic behavior, which includes religion; and that which makes life religious, in the historical sense of the term, is standing in relation with, or attempting to make use of, a particular kind of power.

The mechanical behavior implies the practical recognition of a fairly definite and constant quantitative relation between cause and effect, and it is in this form of behavior that science finds its beginning. Coercive behavior, or magic, is where an effect is produced upon gods and persons by the coercive power of a mysterious force. The anthropopathic behavior or type of activity includes the ordinary relations of men with men and with animals, as well as those with superhuman spirits and gods.

In primitive culture, the coercive behavior or magic, either by itself or in close relation with religion, is everywhere in evidence. It is clear, then, that for the gratification of instinctive needs and the fulfillment of social requirements, the religious forms of behavior have been acquired by both blind and intelligent struggles. The belief in ghosts, personified natural phenomena, and creators with whom man feels himself in practical relation, are unavoidable beliefs, and arise naturally from a normal use of ordinary mental powers.

Psychology can clearly show that the origin of religion is entirely within the powers of men, that all the gods are no more than mental creations, and that divine personal beings, be they primitive gods or the god of Christianity, have no more than a subjective existence.

The benefits which accrue to mankind from a belief in non-existent gods are many, such as supposed control of physical nature, making rain, the suggestive cures by the action of gods and spirits upon human bodies and minds, and the gratification of the lust for power and of the desire for social recognition.

Here is where the priest steps in as the mediator between the mysterious superior powers and his fellow men, and in the fear and awe which he inspires in a more ignorant people, the religious barnacle and parasite has its origin.

Now, from the beginning, the mental stimulus provided by the idea of gods, ghosts, spirits, has quickened the feelings and intelligence, stirred the imagination, exercised a regulative, moralizing influence, for they have been made the embodiment of the ideals of the community and are still powerful factors in the work of social consolidation, whether objectively real or not.

Religion then, like the rest of life, is concerned with the gratification of human needs, physical and spiritual, individual and social, selfish and altruistic, and should be looked upon as a functional part of life, as that mode of behavior in the struggle for life in which use is made of powers characterized as psychic, superhuman, and usually personal.

To account for the origin of impersonal powers, Mr. E. B. Tylor, in "Primitive Culture," develops a philosophy of nature called "Animism," where he seeks to demonstrate that from thinking about the visions of dreams and trances, from comparisons of life with death and of health with sickness, arose a belief in the existence of spirits as the powers animating nature, and that animism is the groundwork of the philosophy of religion, from that of savages up to that of civilized man. Belief in non-personal forces seems, however, to have been prior to animism and to have had a separate origin.

When it comes to the origin of the idea of gods, there seems to be some difference of opinion; Tylor holding the idea of gods to have had its starting-point in dreams, visions, swoons and trances; Spencer saying they come from the worship of the dead, and Max Müller holding that god ideas proceed from the personification of natural objects. Many modern psychologists hold that gods grew out of several different ideas of superhuman beings having different origins and attributes.

Grant Allen, in his excellent book on "The Evolution of the Idea of God," traces the origin of belief in gods to primeval ancestor worship or corpse worship, rather than to animism. In the vast amount of literature now available, we are able to trace and obtain clear ideas of the origin of all religious opinions and to analyze the origin of the concept. Thanks to psychology, the workings of the human brain can be investigated and explained, and the damaging inroads of superstition checked.

J. DANFORTH TAYLOR, M. D.

(References: "Psychology," by Williams James; "Evolution of the Idea of God," by Grant Allen; "A Psychological Study of Religion," by Prof. J. H. Leuba.)

Those War Songs.

THE TRUTH SEEKER'S complaint as to the theological nature of our so-called national songs is opportune. It is another phase of an immoral invasion that is steadily increasing in our country, in the very face of constitutional guarantees. Bereft of a decent regard for the rights of others, a mis-educated majority feels at liberty to force into public expression theological dogmas that they must know are at variance with the letter and spirit of the Constitution, and the rights of citizens thereunder. The fruitful source of wars and insurrection is just these moralless theological invasions. Till men are educated to respect the rights of minorities there can be no peace on this earth. The roots of the present gigantic war can be really traced to the theological spirit of domineering. If men could be led to understand that "government at best is but a necessary evil," and majority rule an expediency justified only by our necessities, we would be able to reduce this evil to a minimum. But most people assume that the majority is a King who can do no wrong. This false view is cropping out everywhere, and has appeared even in trades unionism. Its members are now being forced into the observance of a theological ritualism that is sowing the seeds of disruption. One is left no alternative but rebellion or hypocrisy. Militarism furnishes a further excuse for its spread, and now the churches are seizing the condition as a vulture drinks in carnage.

One of the most intelligent acts of Theodore Roosevelt was his effort to remove the theological dogma "In God we Trust" from our coins; though his alleged reasons were dissimulative. A debased clergy and a horde of truculent politicians were too much for him; and he was compelled to restore the motto. I keep one of those godless coins as a souvenir, and a prophecy of the yet-to-be. When man comes to his reason these premature tokens of a dawning moral and intellectual awakening will be valuable.

We are too far from peace conditions to dispense with war songs. The Star-Spangled Banner is the nearest approach to a national anthem we have. Its tendency is to arouse courage and patriotism, two sterling virtues in our present stage of progress. The Battle Hymn of the Republic is nothing but militant Christian drivel. It very truly says theirs is a "fiery gospel" written in "burnished rows of steel." Its dogmatism hatches the reptile of war we seek to kill. No Freethinker should sing it. Quite different is the spirit of the Star-Spangled Banner. That does not uphold war as a triumphant, dominating conqueror. It simply places it as protection against ruthless invasion. In a debate before a Pacifist's gathering in Washington I took the liberty to re-word Key's hymn to suit my own convictions and bring it nearer to fact. In this modified form it should be acceptable to all Freethinkers. I drop the third stanza altogether, as lacking good judgment and charity. The last I remold to read:

Oh, thus be it ever when free men shall stand
Between their loved homes and foul war's desolation;
Blessed with victory and peace, may that triumphant land
Praise the courage that made and preserves us a nation;
Then conquer we must, if our cause it is just,
Let this be our motto: "In Justice we Trust";
And the Star-Spangled Banner forever will wave,
O'er the land of the free and the home of the brave.

If all Freethinkers will word it in this way when in public gatherings the song is called for, the modification may be slowly adopted.

DAVID ECCLES.

"Billy Sunday in Heaven."

(God is on the Second Celestial Terrace, meditating.)

God: Gabriel.

Gabriel: Lord?

God: Request those angels to practice further away. This is frightful. Where are they from?

Gabriel: The Earth.

God: Which earth? Ah, yes, I remember. They always ask for harps. Heaven! What possesses them with the idea that every soul on earth is a harp-player? Couldn't you get some of them to play the horn? Go tell them to move away.

Gabriel: Yes, Lord.

(Enter the Archangel Michael.)

God: Well, Michael?

Michael: Billy Sunday wants to see you.

God: Who?

Michael: Billy Sunday.

God: Billy Sunday. You mean Holy Sunday, that Christian ruin of a Pagan day?

Michael: Oh, no; he's not a Christian. Don't you remember that epileptic soul from the earth we fumigated and sent to the idiot's heaven?

God: No, not idiots'. Medicine men's. That poor little vulgar thing. Yes, I remember. What does he want?

Michael: I don't know. He won't tell. He says he has a great scheme, but he only deals with bosses. He did on earth and he will here.

God: Let him come up. I suppose that's one of the penalties for being God. I have to listen to every fool in the universe. (Michael nods to one of the guards, who goes out.) Is he any better? He had fits when he arrived.

Michael: He is about the same, but the medicine men are nearly dead. He says he had them buffaloed; backed off the map.

God: What does that mean?

Michael: I don't know. He talks a language of his own. Here he comes.

(Enter the Soul of Sunday. He nods familiarly to Michael and God.)

Billy Sunday: Hello, Mike. Howdy, Partner. Say, I've got a jim-dandy scheme. If you'll come up with the dough I'll wake this old morgue and put it on the map. Make it pay too. I can pack heaven so tight the fleas will squeal, and all I want is the gate-receipts for the last performance.

God: Did you want to speak to me: about something?

Billy Sunday: Sure. Don't you hear me shouting? I want to bring this old played-out heaven of yours right up to date. I've done it for lots of bigger places, Brooklyn, Boston; Portland, Oregon. I'll make it a regular Coney Island. The crowds will bust the walls. Jokes, weeps, vaudeville stunts, shoot the chutes and mobs you can't get through without tearing your wings off. I can do it. I done it on earth and I can do it here. Say, I've converted all those black and yellow medicine men down below. I out-howled them, out-drummed them and out-frothed them. They are regular Christians now: Howl, weep, shout, froth at the mouth for keeps. Say, you oughter see me lead 'em. Except for color and clothes—no clothes, I mean—you couldn't tell 'em from real Christians. Say, you ought to hear those Africans come in on the home-stretch with:

"I'm a lubber, lubber, lubber of de Lawd.
I'm a lubber, lubber, lubber of de Lawd.
Jesus is my brudder; Mary is his mudder,
Baptized in de blood of de Lamb."

All the tom-toms beating; the gourds and pebbles rattling. It's great. Say, those tom-toms gave me a great idea. They work a crowd up to beat the band. Better than my chorus-yellers. They get the congregation looney all right and all ready for the Holy Ghost in great shape. Oh, I kin work it. Watch me. I used to use flags, singers and exhorters, and it cost good money; but, believe me, the old original tommy-tom for a nickel has got 'em all beat a mile. Say, no weak-minded, hysterical persons can hold out against that steady old thump, thump, and pretty soon, when the brain reels, with a yell or a sob they come to Jesus. Say, we call them old Nigger Medicine Men savages. Take my palaver for it, in true religion they can give us cards and spades. They are gospel sharps all right, all right, and I ought to know. Say, did you ever hear that nigger camp-meeting song about me?

God: No. I don't think that reached here; or maybe I was listening to some other part of the universe.

Billy Sunday: It's great. Goes like this:

Billy Sunday has come to town,
O, my Lord!
A-kicking up and a-kicking down,
O my Lord!
He tear his hair and he tear his clothes,
He lead the Devil 'round by the nose,
There's brimstone smell wherever he goes,
Sunday, Monday, Saturday, Sunday,
O my Lord!

He save the blackest souls in a heap,
O my Lord!
A dollar apiece and that's dirt cheap,
O my Lord!
He stand on his toe and he stand on his head,
His tongue hang out till he almost dead,
"Whoop," "Hell-fire," "Glory," is what he said,
Sunday, Monday, Saturday, Sunday,
O my Lord!

Billy knows the Lord like he made him, 'most,
O my Lord!
Says he, "Old Pal, how's the Holy Ghost?"
O my Lord!
And he call to the Lord in a mighty shout,
"God, spit on your hands and help me out;
We will drag this sinner out by the snout,"
Sunday, Monday, Saturday, Sunday,
O my Lord!

Say, ain't that great stuff? Well, what do you say?

God: I don't say anything. I haven't had a chance. What are you talking about?

Billy Sunday: Just this. I propose to convert Heaven to Christianity. Have a red-hot, old-fashioned Revival meeting. Run out of town all your publicans and sinners, wine-bibbers and scarlet females. No noise. No loud laughter; no singing; no drinking; as quiet and clean as the cemetery at Gary.

God: What is Gary?

Billy Sunday: The Steel Trust town. They are friends of mine. Them and the Rockefellers. John Jr. was going to syndicate with me.

God: What is that?

Billy Sunday: Get salvation on to a business basis and keep the discontented workmen quiet. That was a great stunt of mine. Say, I'll tell you. I'll convert this whole place, including Peter. Run out Mary Magdalen, Bob Ingersoll, Voltaire and them Infidels that yap about freedom—and do it all for the last night's receipts; that's all I want, but I want to make sure they're big. I want to have a talk with Morgan, Harriman, Charley Schwab, the two Johns, and get a line on the last night's checks before I start.

God: The persons you name are not here.

Billy Sunday: Not here? Oh, that settles it. How can I get out of here?

God: Simply walk out. Nobody is holding you.

Billy Sunday: Where shall I go?

God: Go to Hell.

Billy Sunday: But I thought Hell was abolished?

God: It was till you came. We will revive it right now.

Billy Sunday: That's good. Hell was my strong suit. I couldn't do a thing without Hell.

God: Michael, take him away.

Michael: Where?

God: Anywhere. Wherever he is, there will be Hell. I am very tired.—C. E. S. Wood, in the Masses.

The superintendent of the branch of the Volunteers of America that does business in Newark, N. J., was brought into court the other day for misusing the horses that drag about the begging wagons of this rival of the Salvation Army. The Volunteers of America, like the prototype, is neither philanthropic nor humane. It is religious.

The work an unknown good man has done is like a vein of water flowing hidden underground, secretly making the ground green.—Carlyle.

We ought never to do wrong when people are looking.—Mark Twain.

God and My Neighbors.

Uncle Ben told me a good story about Byron which I must just whisper to you, but don't you never tell: It was a snowy time in winter. Byron was not doing much except to do chores a little, and read about the Brotherhood of Man. He came in from the barn and said to his old mother, with whom he lives, "Mother, if you don't want that old horse of yours to die of thirst, you'd better carry him some water. He hasn't had a drop to drink in two days." Now wasn't that kind of Byron, to remind the old lady of her duty? Really, the Brotherhood of Man sticks out all over Byron; but as for his mother, though she is a good, kind, industrious old creature, she doesn't know a thing about such a brotherhood.

Ordinary inspiration, which was originally possession, is a tame affair; but at soul-saving time in some of the country churches the vigorous, old-time sort appears. Ann Eliza tells me of such a case within her knowledge:

It was revival time, and the brethren and sisters had got well warmed up, when one night a brother got the Power, that is, the Spirit seized him; he became god-possessed. He pranced about through the church, shouting, stamping, swinging his arms, when suddenly his suspenders broke. Had not the Spirit of this crisis considerably left the brother, there might have been a scandal; but, as it was, he came to himself suddenly, seized his pantaloons, and, holding them in place, hastened to his wife who with safety pins soon made his connections secure. Thereupon the Spirit again seized him, and the performance re-commenced.

Not long ago I heard of a wonderful case of the fulfilment of prophecy.

When one of Mr. E's sons was born, he gave him such a name as to make its initial letters spell M-A-K-E, "For," said Mr. E., "this one is a-going to make money." And the child lived, and thrived, and grew, and increased in stature and in knowledge, and finally became a counterfeiter.

Speaking of prophecy reminds me that Leo is a right smart of a prophet.

Before the election he told me about a candidate, whom we call for convenience General Bone. And Leo said that the General had spent a heap of money to get the nomination and was spending a heap more trying to get elected. And said I, "How can he afford to spend such a lot of money to get the office? Is he so very rich?" "No," said Leo, "not so very. But he owns a lot of stock in various public utilities. If he gets elected he can manage things so as greatly to increase the value of these properties and the income derived from them. Remember what I tell you, and see what he does if he is elected."

And, sure enough, the General was elected, and the first thing he does is to go after the Public Service Commission that has so much power over public utilities.

No; Leo does not claim to be inspired. He has been around a bit, and has found out a few things.

"And the star-spangled banner, Oh, long may it wa-ave, O'er the land of the fre-ee, and the home of the brave!"

I keep worrying about those girls.

You see, the Sage of Potato Hill* went to Chicago (in a Pullman, I believe), put up at a good hotel, and visited a great mail order establishment. Here he was courteously received, shown about, and instructed as to how the business is carried on so as to secure great efficiency combined with the most rigid economy. And much of the work is done by girls. When business is brisk there are many of them as busy as bees, but if business slackens, one, two, three or more hundred of the girls are laid off indefinitely. And this company does not have to take any trouble to get the old employees back. There are in Chicago so many girls wanting jobs that a great number of them can be procured at any time at very short notice.

The Sage was charmed with the system employed by the company, so perfectly organized, so economical, so efficient! But I worry about those girls laid off indefinitely. What becomes of them? Do they brave the Great White Fear?

Perhaps the Sage never went to Chicago to seek his fortune, hunted for a job and found a decent one hard to get. I did once; hence my sympathy for the girls. Poor girls!

The Literary Digest gives some of the thoughts of Hermione, a Serious Thinker, taken from a small book published by D. Appleton & Co. Let me give you a little of Hermione's serious thought along the subject of spiritual manifestations. It is quite illuminating, you know, if you get what I mean.

*E. W. Howe, editor of Howe's Monthly.

"I have often been told that I am naturally very clairvoyant—if I were developed I would make a splendid medium. Mediums have seen shapes hovering around my head, and once when I was at school I did some automatic writing.

"It was the strangest, easiest thing! I had a pencil in my hand and without thinking of anything in particular at all I just scribbled away, and what I wrote was, 'When in the course of human events it becomes necessary; when in the course of human events it becomes necessary,' over and over again.

"I was quite startled, for the last thing I had been thinking of was an algebra examination, not history at all. We had had our history examination days before.

"I felt as if an unseen hand had reached out of the Silences and grasped mine.

"Wasn't it weird?

"And I know who it was, too. A distant relative of mama's on her father's side, by marriage, was one of the men who signed the Constitution of the United States in Fanueil Hall, in Philadelphia, in 1776, and it was his spirit that was trying to deliver his message through me."

Hermione is worried over the Superman, and to make the matter worse her Mama's attitude towards that person is unsatisfactory. Says Hermione:

"I have worried myself half to death at times over the Superman.

"You know I feel personally responsible, to a certain extent, about what he will be like when he gets here. If he isn't what he should be, you know, it will be the fault of those of us who are the leaders in thought today—it will be because we haven't started him right, you know.

"Mama—poor dear mama is so unadvanced, you know!—has an idea that when the Superman does get here he won't be at all the sort of person that one would care to receive socially.

"Hermione," she said to me only the other day, 'no Superman shall ever come into my house!'

"She heard some of my friends, you know, talking about the Superman and Eugenics, and she has an idea that he will be horribly improper.

"I consider that the Superman would be a dangerous influence in the life of a young woman," said mama.

"Mama," I told her, 'you are frightfully behind the times! There isn't a doubt in the world that when the Superman does come he will be taken up by the Best People. Anarchists and Socialists go everywhere now, and dress just like other people, and you can hardly tell them, and it will be the same way with the Superman.'

"What mama lacks is Contact. Contact with—well, she lacks Contact, if you get what I mean."

The altruism of the Christian is of a quality somewhat different from that of the Rationalist. The Christian, theoretically at least, is making a pilgrimage heavenward. He practices on earth self-denial, self-abnegation with the expectation of being rewarded richly therefor in another life in another world. He works for hire, his wages to be received in the Sweet By and By.

But the Rationalist's pilgrimage is earthward. When he practices Altruism he expects no reward away in the future. For him the "reward" is in the doing, in the self-approval that follows the doing of a worthy act, in the joy that comes to him from giving help.

Many of the seemingly altruistic acts of both Christian and Rationalist are not purely so, for in many cases each has in mind the hope of a reward either in this life that we know or in another alleged one of which we know nothing.

Lycurgus, poor man, never knew of unbelievers doing anything for poor humanity. Of course, Lycurgus was putting up a bluff, repeating a clerical lie; and he knew all the time that it is a lie, for he was too well-informed not to know better. But in addition to the great amount of philanthropic work done by those who are known as unbelievers, there is much that is carried on by church charities financed by unbelievers, who while despising the creeds respect the humanitarian work of the churches and give liberally toward its maintenance.

"He who giveth to the poor lendeth to the Lord," is the keynote with some of our Christian friends. But we, when we give to the poor, are not lending with a view to being repaid with interest by an imaginary "Lord."

PHILO.

Where Crime Is Honored.

In the Vatican at Rome, in the magnificent room which serves as antechamber to the Sistine Chapel, are three frescoes by Vasari which commemorate the most colossal crime ever conceived by the mind of man.

Charles IX., king of France, was in bad with the church. He was accused of tolerating heresy. Ecclesiastical fiat might deprive him of crown and kingdom in this world and secure his soul's eternal damnation in the next. So Charles determined to atone for his remissness. Heresy would be a thing of the past in his dominion. His expedient was simple enough. He would destroy all regardless of sex or age who were not within the fold of the dominant church. In the neighboring kingdom of Spain, under orders from the holy Inquisition, heretics were being burned at the stake. In England a few years previous, during the reign of Bloody Mary of unpleasant memory, over 300 victims of Roman intolerance had been burned alive. Eight centuries earlier Charlemagne, most Christian king of the Franks, in his work of evangelizing had beheaded 4,500 Saxons in one day. Charles determined to outdo all these.

The victims of the holy Inquisition were generally adults who persisted in their heresy. The Saxons beheaded by Charlemagne were of a race with whom he had been at war. Even the chosen people of God who in ancient time, slew so indiscriminately, committed their atrocities upon alien peoples. But the objects of Charles's religious zeal were his own subjects—Frenchmen devoted to their king and country; men, women and children whom by all the laws of state and honor he was bound to protect. These Charles IX. proposed to destroy in one great indiscriminate slaughter.

The massacre began at Paris with the ringing of the matin bell from the old clock tower of the palace of justice, 1 o'clock A. M., Sunday, Saint Bartholomew's day, 1572. The sound of the bells was taken up and echoed from tower to tower, all over the city. At the same time couriers swiftly mounted rode to the provinces with proclamations to kill.

For two months France was sodden with the blood of her children. No count was kept of the slain that have been estimated to total one hundred thousand.

When the news of the massacre got abroad, Germany was stirred with horror. Queen Elizabeth of England drove the French ambassador from her presence. Philip II., king of Spain, sent his warm congratulations, as well he might, since the massacre had removed so many of the best soldiers of France, always a potential enemy.

At Rome the exultation was great. Pope Gregory XIII. attended by cardinals and other ecclesiastical dignitaries, went in long procession to the church of Saint Louis, when the cardinal of Lorraine chanted a te deum. Gregory sent King Charles the Golden Rose and compliments, and ordered medals struck in honor of the event, some of which are yet in existence.

The pope might have restrained his joy. The massacre of St. Bartholomew did not extirpate heresy. It created in the heart of the French people a hatred of priest and church that does not abate as the centuries roll around. A French emperor later imprisoned the pope. France is today an infidel nation.

King Charles, the central figure in the saturnalia of blood, realizing too late the destructiveness of the passions he had unleashed, was tortured by remorse to an early death. He died within two years, at the age of twenty-four. Before his death he expressed relief over the fact that he left no son upon whom the burden of the kingship could descend. Charles was not a strong character, and in his behalf it has been said that he was persuaded in the course he took by his queen mother who was wholly in the hands of the priests. E. GROSSER, Denver, Colo.

Fairy Tales Deprecated.

Should we teach our children fairy tales? No! Most emphatically, I say no! Yet I am sure that there is not one woman in a thousand who will agree with me. In all the articles I have read on the subject, I have seen the contrary opinion. But there are two sides to everything. Might not some fair-minded women care to hear a few arguments on the other side?

Life is so short and there is so much to learn; then why waste its precious minutes teaching our little ones fairy tales? Some say it cultivates the imagination; but any tale of fiction would do as much. In these latter we have possible truth. The things might really happen, the people are like ourselves. Does it do a child any good to teach it that a fairy lurks under every flower, that some beautiful creature from another world hovers near, ready to wave a magic wand and transform us into impossible beings; that cups and saucers can talk and walk, and all the other nonsense ad infinitum which we see in fairy tales?

When a child once believes in fairies, there is no silly idea with which it cannot be stuffed. I use the word advisedly; for the Canadian readers are literally "stuffed" with fairy tales.

Imagination is a wonderful faculty; but imagination to be of any use to the scientist, to the inventor, even to the novelist and the playwright, must be controlled by reason and never go against reason and the known laws of nature. Then why not train our children accordingly? Most fairy tales were invented when people knew next to nothing about the world we live in, and, therefore, nothing came impossible to their simple minds. In these enlightened times, however, people look for more truth than is to be found in "Arabian Nights," "Cinderella," or "Sleeping Beauty," which once delighted the grown-ups as much as they did the little ones. We want a different kind of fiction nowadays. The greatest praise we can give a novel is to say that it is true to life.

Some people say that children love fairy tales. If so, it is because they have been taught to love them. But here I must again differ; for many, many times, in my constant intercourse with young children, it has been: "Tell us a true story," and not: "Tell us a fairy tale." A really sensible child would far rather listen to a true story. Any woman can try it for herself as she watches the little eyes open wide and listens to the eager words: "Is it true? Could it really happen?" True stories give children a liking for things that are real and that will never disappoint them.

Even conceding, for the sake of argument, that children do love fairy tales, which is sometimes true, we all of us know very well that they often love things which are bad for them. We do not feed them on candy because they like it. We do not encourage them to play with dangerous tools which are likely to hurt them. A careful mother takes away the bright-colored candies which might poison their bodies. Should she be less careful of their minds?

Perhaps people think that children's minds would grow sordid and commonplace were they not filled with fairy tales. But such is not the case. The story of a simple seed, from the time it is put into the ground until it blooms into a lovely flower, is enthralling, if told properly. We can make such wonderful stories for our little ones when we teach them about birds and flowers and all the wonders of nature. And surely Mother Nature is rich enough, whether we follow her on the earth, in the sky or deep down under the water. With her unfathomable riches, all of which we could not learn about in a lifetime, it does seem great waste of time to hamper our children's minds with "what never can be."

After a long, Canadian winter, I have seen a little girl of five go into ecstasies of delight over the first fresh blade of green grass which she had herself found. At other times, she has been as excited over a sunset and over a starry sky—but she did not like fairy tales! Her mind had not been filled to overflowing with them, and so she had an enormous capacity for the love of everything real and beautiful.

Another thing against fairy tales is that they encourage untruthfulness. If a mother is always telling fairy tales, how will a little child learn to discriminate between the true and the false? Gradually, from believing all kinds of rubbish, it will take to telling lies itself, and not even see the gravity of it.

I can see people up in arms against me; but I can only conclude, as I began, by saying that I do not expect one woman in a thousand to agree with me. But if I can reach that one woman I shall not have written in vain; for the children whose good luck it is to be taught by her will be full of that most uncommon thing, common sense. They will taste of the beauties of nature in a measure not accorded those brought up on fairy lore. What is more, they will learn the important lesson that—"Beauty is truth, truth beauty,—that is all Ye know on earth, and all ye need to know."

MRS. NESTOR NOEL.

Riere Qui Barre, Alberta, Canada.

Enlightened.

In a recent sermon the Rev. Mr. Haines is quoted as saying that "this is God's war." I am glad that the matter is settled, as most people thought it was the kaiser's.—Frank Hart in the Doylestown Intelligencer.

An unsigned postal card mailed in Cincinnati, Ohio states that "for the purpose of safeguarding democracy in the United States during the war, the Emergency Peace Federation has established a bureau of legal first aid at 70 Fifth avenue, New York City," and that "perhaps Freethought speakers could apply too."

The vulgarest of evangelists makes one perfect defense. He says: "If you do not find my line of talk refined enough to suit your taste, go home and read your Bibles." There is no answer.

NOTES AT LARGE.

Our contemporaries of the Rationalist Press Association in London foresee a day when "a peace congress must settle the terms on which the world war will terminate," and they have issued a protest against the papacy's being admitted to such a congress or represented there. During the year 1916 there were many rumors of diplomatic intrigues by the papacy with the object of obtaining recognition and admission to the congress, and these were followed by press campaigns in Switzerland and in the United States in which the claims of the pope to appear in the rôle of mediator have been discussed for the benefit of neutral nations. That the nations may have their eyes opened the following statement of the facts is put into circulation in all countries:

"1. The pope is not a temporal sovereign, and has no more title to be represented than the Dalai Lama of Tibet, the Archbishop of Canterbury, or the head of any other sect.

"2. The admission of the pope would be a rebuff to our ally Italy, which for forty-six years has been combating intrigues aiming at the re-establishment of the temporal power.

"3. None of the allied governments but that of Belgium is Catholic. In France, Portugal, and Japan the church and state are separated. In Great Britain the state religion is Protestant; in Russia, Rumania, Serbia, and Montenegro it is the Eastern church. (Since this was issued the United States, in which church and state are separated, has become one of the allies).

"4. Belgium, which might have hoped for the support of the papacy, has been consistently ignored, and no condemnation of the invasion and rapine of the country by Germany in 1914 has yet come from the Vatican.

"5. The attitude of the Roman church in all neutral countries has been consistently and constantly hostile to the allies. When the pope was interviewed by the Paris journal Liberté, he sought to palliate the sinking of the Lusitania and the murder of innocent passengers by comparing it with the allies' blockade of Germany. The outrage which the Vatican has found words to condemn has been the seizure of the Palazzo Venetia, the residence of the late Austrian Minister to the Vatican, by the Italian government.

"6. If the papal representative is admitted, he will sit as the accomplice of German-Austrian crimes and the instrument of their diplomacy. The allies will be prudent in preventing this condition of things."

European Freethinkers and other organized bodies on the continent have signified their approval of the protest, and we imagine every Freethinker in America would vote for it; but unless the hue of President Wilson's present resolution is sicklied o'er with the pale cast of thought, and our intervention loses the name of action, as it were, the terms of peace are more likely to be dictated by the allied nations than voted on at a peace congress.

One of the most interesting circumstances of the Russian Revolution is the demand made by the inmates of the monasteries for equal political rights with the lay population, including the vote, which until now has been forbidden by precedent. To prove their fitness for citizenship the monks have set about eradicating all traces of their former autocratist, reactionary and, in particular, anti-Semitic activities, destroying their stores of anti-Liberal and pogrom literature, which were supplied to them by the police "security department," now abolished. The political enfranchisement of these men is certainly a step in the right direction. For centuries the conventual houses of the Russian empire had been filled with an able-bodied class of men who were of very little consequence in the development of the business and social life of the country. Except when a bishopric had to be filled, the monks were seldom heard from, unless by the merest chance one of their number obtained favor at court, or became celebrated for his sanctity as was the case with the notorious Rasputin, whose intrigues with the emperor's family hastened in no small degree the downfall of the unfortunate czar. The religious system known as monkery is in violation of some fundamental laws of nature. Besides withholding a large body of men from active service in fulfilling the duties which a normal life entails, the system is also destructive of some of the noblest virtues, such as courage and the spirit of enterprise; for it has many times been demonstrated that the men who sought the peace and quietude of the monastic life have been men who for various causes have felt themselves mentally or morally incapacitated to withstand a close contract with the world, and so, rather than risk the possibility of the loss of their "immortal soul," they sought to gain favor with heaven by leaving the world to its fate that they might rise to subliminal heights of ignorance, filth and sensuality in their pious seclusion. There can be no more valuable evidence of a progressive people than the act which seeks to abolish all monasteries and convents, on the ground that every man and woman born into the world should bear his or her share in its growth and development, its cares and sorrows, its joys and its rewards. Conventual houses have proved themselves a menace to human advancement, and should no longer find a place in any modern system of life whether religious or secular.

The so-called "deadly parallel" brings out the similarity between the styles of expression affected by our acrobatic evangelist and the editor of a semi-pornographic magazinelet called Jim Jam Jems. The specimens are selected at random from prints of nearly current date.

Billy Sunday in New York Globe, June 1, 1917.

"The average girl today . . . is turning her home into a gambling shop and a social beer and champagne-drinking joint, and her society is made up of poker players, champagne, wine and beer drinkers, grass-widowers, and jilted jades and slander mongers that comprise the society of the average girl today.

"Many a girl has found out after she is married that it would have been a good deal easier to die an old maid than to have said 'yes,' and become the wife of some cigarette-smoking, cursing, damnable libertine. They will launch the matrimonial boat and put the oars in and try it once for luck anyway, and so we have many women praying for unconverted husbands."

In each case there is the intentional appeal to lubricity. The evangelist makes it to add "pep" to his sermons, and the magazine editor to sell his product to persons of the same mind as those who listen to Sunday. Here is an instance where the psychoanalyst may speak with authority. The psychoanalysts lay open the subject's mind by reference to the things he selects for thought or discourse in preference to others that he might have chosen. When certain phenomena are picked as topics and similarly treated by two or more persons, their psychical identity or relation is established. Billy Sunday and the Jim Jam Jems editor are thus shown to be of the same type of mind.

At this writing there are no fresh arrests of Freethought speakers in New York to report, if we except that of Mr. Mitchuly for selling literature, for which he was fined $2, having overstayed the time allowed him in one place instead of "moving on," and that of Mr. Wright for pointing out the inconsistency of the followers of the Prince of Peace going to war with one another. Mr. Wright's accuser did not appear in court, and there was no case. Mr. Meirowitz has felt apprehensive that some remarks he made in answering a street evangelist, which were taken down by police stenographers, may have been indiscreet. The evangelist had upheld war as consistent with Christianity, but the Infidel argued that war was a secular concern. Jesus, Mr. Meirowitz said, gave his followers the precept "Resist not evil," and Paul said: "The powers that be are ordained of God; whoever therefore resisteth the power, resisteth the ordinance of God." This, it was argued, condemned the American revolutionists of the eighteenth century and the Russian revolutionists of the twentieth. Resisting neither evil nor the powers that be, said Mr. Meirowitz, would leave the kaiser undisturbed upon his throne. The talk was polemical only, although a stupid policeman or magistrate might scent anti-war sentiment. The utmost discretion is required in steering clear of war talk, unless one is committed to an advocacy of it at any price. The Freethought speakers, whose names are on the registry, are in a different position from the militant pacifists who refuse to register and thus defy the law. In the Secular cases we have observed that it is the police and magistrates who seem to care nothing for the law or Constitution.

Does Freethought promote longevity? Our subscribers live to an advanced age. We recorded lately the death of L. G. Barnes of Des Moines, Iowa, at 90. He had been a Freethinker during two generations. In Faribault, Minnesota, last month died Geo. W. Newell, aged 93, a long-time subscriber who, as a member of his family writes, "took great pleasure in THE TRUTH SEEKER, and saw that its message was given to others." So also in May passed to his eternal rest William Boeckler of Lykens, Pennsylvania, 87 years old.

They were all honorable and respected men. An obituary notice of Mr. Barnes, thought by the writer to be our oldest subscriber, appeared March 24. Of Mr. Newell we know only what is above stated except that he had been on our list as far back as memory runs. Mr. Boeckler was the oldest citizen of Lykens, and, says the Lykens Standard, "highly respected and admired." He came to that town in 1866, after a long and exciting record as a soldier in the Civil War. He had eight sons and daughters, and his surviving children saw that he had a funeral in accordance with his belief, the service being conducted by L. Birch Wilson, a Freethinker of Reading. These men were sturdy old soldiers of liberty, and lived long in the land they honored.

A faked up picture of a statue of the Virgin Mary preserved from destruction somewhere in France is circulated in proof of divine intervention. It was a stupid divinity that saved this insensate thing. Of what value, compared with human life, is a statue of the Virgin? Of what significance, if true, is the fact of virginity? Catholics are fools in the presence of religious imposture, and devout Protestants are no brighter. A "public character" (as Mr. Roosevelt has dubbed William J. Bryan) asked a while ago why factory chimneys were blown down and church spires were saved; and he answered the question by saying that the churches are of the Lord. One number of a Catholic exchange reports the destruction by tornado of a church at Krouts, Ind., another at Lindsay, Texas, and a third in Fredonia, Kansas. The destruction of the churches was accompanied with loss of life; God did not intervene to protect any living virgins; and they brag of divine protection when a piece of stone carved in the likeness of a woman who may or may not have lived two thousand years ago happens to escape destruction. The fool-killer appears to have perished early in the history of the race—unless he is a myth, as we have reason to suspect—and he left no successor.

For opposing war conscription and refusing to register as a person liable to military service, Louis Kramer of this city was last week sentenced by Judge Mayer in the United States District Court to three years in prison and fined $10,000, with deportation after the sentence shall have been served and the fine paid. There is a Prussian "frightfulness" about this way of administering justice, for judging the sentence by those imposed for crime, it is excessive. Deportation would have been enough with confinement in an asylum as an alternative, for Kramer has displayed a foolhardiness that borders on insanity. He taxed severely the tolerance of the most uncompromising adherents of free speech when he said, if report is true, that President Wilson ought to be shot; and he invited trouble by circulating anti-conscription literature, advising others not to register. He broke the law by himself neglecting and refusing to enroll. He is a victim of bad advisers, and for the credit of American justice let us hope his sentence may be commuted. While an unorthodox conscience has no rights before the law, yet it might be considered by those who enforce the law.

President Wilson prepared and delivered his Flag Day oration without once introducing the religious note. And yet his voice sounds like the prophet's word:

"For us there is but one choice. We have made it. Woe be to the man or group of men that seeks to stand in our way in this day of high resolution when every principle we hold dearest is to be vindicated and made secure for the salvation of the nations. We are ready to plead at the bar of history, and our flag shall wear a new lustre. Once more we shall make good with our lives and fortunes the great faith to which we were born, and a new glory shall shine in the face of our people."

The faith in which we were born was faith in free speech, free assembly, and a government of the people by and for themselves. The government needs to be careful or it will destroy that faith instead of renewing it and making good.

On the capitol grounds in Lincoln, Nebraska, June 14 (Flag Day), Col. Theodore Roosevelt gave utterance to this patriotic and secular utterance: "The clergyman who does not put the flag above the church had better close his church and keep it closed." Those are our sentiments; but can Colonel Roosevelt conceive of a Catholic clergyman flying the flag of his country above his church?

We make daily great improvements in Natural—there is one I wish to see in Moral Philosophy: the discovery of a plan that would induce and oblige nations to settle their disputes without first cutting one another's throats.—Franklin.

THE TRUTH SEEKER

Published weekly by the Truth Seeker Company, President, George E. Macdonald; Secretary, James A. Conway, 62 Vesey street, New York.

Entered at the Postoffice, New York, N. Y., as second-class matter.

Address communications and make drafts, checks, postoffice and express money orders payable to THE TRUTH SEEKER, 62 Vesey street, New York.

Subscription Rates.

Single subscription in advance . . .	$3.00
Two new subscribers	5.00
One subscription two years in advance	5.00
One subscription and one new subscriber, in one remittance	5.00
To all foreign countries except Mexico, 50 cents per annum extra.
Subscriptions received for any length of time under a year at the rate of 25 cents per month. Can be begun at any time.
Single copies, 10 cents.

SPECIAL NOTICE.—We shall be obliged to our readers if they will send us the name and address of any Free-thinker who is not a regular subscriber.

OBJECTS.

It is the object of THE TRUTH SEEKER to educate the people out of religious superstition. It denies the inspiration and infallibility of the Bible, and asserts the human origin of that book. It denies the existence of the theological heaven and hell, but as to the existence and immortality of the soul neither affirms nor denies. It waits for evidence.

THE TRUTH SEEKER upholds the theory of Evolution, believing that to be the solution of the question of the origin, growth, and development of the animal kingdom, including man. THE TRUTH SEEKER believes that the answer to the questions Whence? and Whither? can be given only by Science.

THE TRUTH SEEKER holds that morality and ethics—or man's relation to man—are entirely independent of creed or religion, and are founded on rules developed by experience.

In current politics THE TRUTH SEEKER takes no side or part. In general it holds to the principles of freedom enunciated by the Founders of the Republic.

THE TRUTH SEEKER believes in Free Speech, Free Press, and Free Mails; in full discussion of all sides of all subjects, and affords those having new and worthy thoughts, clearly stated, a generous and welcome hearing, each contributor being responsible for his own opinion. We neither indorse an idea by printing it, nor condemn it by exclusion.

THE TRUTH SEEKER is the recognized medium of communication between the Liberals of the country, and is edited each week for their information, instruction, entertainment, and support against religious error and mental slavery and in maintenance of their equal civil and religious rights as citizens of the United States.

The Editor invites communications on the subjects to which these pages are devoted.

POLITICAL PRINCIPLES.

(THE NINE DEMANDS OF LIBERALISM.)

1. We demand that churches and other ecclesiastical property shall be no longer exempt from taxation.
2. We demand that the employment of chaplains in Congress, in the Legislatures, in the navy and militia, and in prisons, asylums and all other institutions supported by public money shall be discontinued.
3. We demand that all public appropriations for educational and charitable institutions of a sectarian character shall cease.
4. We demand that all religious services now sustained by the government shall be abolished; and especially that the use of the Bible in the public schools, whether ostensibly as a text-book or avowedly as a book of religious worship, shall be prohibited.
5. We demand that the appointment by the President of the United States or by the governors of the various states, of all religious festivals and fasts shall wholly cease.
6. We demand that the judicial oath in the courts and in all other departments of the government shall be abolished, and that simple affirmation under the pains and penalties of perjury shall be established in its stead.
7. We demand that all laws directly or indirectly enforcing the observance of Sunday as the Sabbath shall be repealed.
8. We demand that all laws looking to the enforcement of "Christian" morality shall be abrogated and that all laws shall be conformed to the requirements of natural morality, equal rights, and impartial liberty.

9. We demand that not only in the Constitution of the United States and of the several states, but also in the practical administration of the same, no privileges or advantages shall be conceded to Christianity or any other special religion; that our entire political system shall be founded and administered on a purely secular basis; and that whatever changes shall prove necessary to this end shall be consistently, unflinchingly, and promptly made.

Letters of Friends

Readers desirous of communicating with the writers of the letters in this department may address them in care of THE TRUTH SEEKER, 62 Vesey street, New York, N. Y., and the letters will be re-addressed and forwarded.

RATIONALISM IN LOS ANGELES.

From W. G. Henry, California.

To the Editor of The Truth Seeker:

As the city of Los Angeles is the next stand of the sawdust evangelist, it may not be out of place to tell you how it stands in this locality between the minority of reason and the hosts of superstition. Los Angeles is a noted center for free thought, although such free thought is not always lucid. Like most places in the land of the free the Rationalist movement is not organized, although there are many sympathizers in this locality.

At present there are no Rationalist meetings in the city except those conducted by myself and wife, and these meetings are held on the street. The street work heretofore has been sporadic, flaring up and then dying out altogether. It has been the aim of myself and wife to put these meetings on a solid basis, to make them an established feature with a regular time and place of meeting, with the best literature always on sale. At first our work was disheartening; we drew but small crowds and only with the most strenuous efforts could we hold them until our message was delivered. The crowds slowly began to grow, however, and with this growth the opposition of the religionists increased, but their efforts resulted disastrously to themselves. The drums and horns of the Lord only increased our own crowds and instead of increasing the attendance at the nearby religious meetings, only confirmed the religionists in the belief that if they wished to get any hearing at all they must move away from "the devil's ministers." This they have done and now we have our corner all to ourselves while the gospel squawkers and the atoning blooders bawl their heads off to the pavements and the few boozy suspects that loiter in that vicinity.

We have succeeded beyond expectations in making these street meetings an established success, and they are still growing. We are paving the way for Billy Sunday—to get out of town soon after his arrival. "The Case of Billy Sunday" is doing its work every day and the campaign has not yet really opened. The Sunday campaign has been on for a year, backed by a united church, ministers and capitalists; its only opponent is the little old soap box; but the little box is going to be heard from just the same. Watch our smoke!

We want you to lend us all the assistance you can in our campaign against the devil (Sawdust Devil), and thereby add to the minority of reason a great ingathering of converts with healthy brains instead of cauliflowers in their craniums. I might add just a word as to the ability of the apostles of reason already referred to. For myself I can say that I have been for the past nine years on the public platform, that is continuously, not as a side issue, but as a business. I have spoken in most of the states, including many cities of Canada. These nine years I have survived, and am still in the pink of condition. This is all the recommendation I will now offer for myself. Mrs. Henry has had seven years' experience on the public platform and is not afraid of God, man or devil (women included); she has a powerful voice, splendid courage and a radiating enthusiasm; Christians let her alone.

We intend to open hall meetings in September and continue them all winter. Notices will be sent of these meetings in due time. In closing let me say that Los Angeles is not unanimously for Jesus—not by a mill-site.

MR. BRYAN AND THE SOUL.

From Aurora Thunder, Ohio.

To the Editor of The Truth Seeker:

Perhaps I should not enter the mêlée of spiritism with your correspondent W. S. Bryan because I am not a scientist, but he lays so much stress on mere "reason, intelligence and common sense" that I venture.

The remarkable weakness of his lengthy letter is, that he gives not one single suggestion of evidence for his belief, or even what his belief is, so that readers are left in the dark as to his possible meaning.

Does he mean to imply that the atmosphere is full of spirits of a special creation, or only those of persons who have departed this life?

If, as he says, he believes in a no religion or god creation (which as I understand has hitherto been the only source of the soul idea), will he please explain his idea of the origin of a spirit or soul, as of the world's knowledge.

He is the first writer I know of who ignores "Sir Oliver" and the names always bandied around as the highest authorities of spirits; yet while suggesting that such great scientists "allow their emotions and predilections to get the better of their reason" (which may be true), he swears by "the vast literature on spiritualism from some of the best, the purest, and the most sensible men and women the world has produced," ignoring the fact that the same weaknesses may be suspected of them, too. Christianity, Christian Science, etc., have too a vast literature.

He argues against dogmatism (with which as I understand science is untainted) and yet is himself most dogmatic without giving a shadow of proof.

He also indicates that Haeckel, Weinberg and all other scientists' opinions and beliefs (except his own, I presume) about immortality or the immortal soul are of no value because they have never seen one, and therefore can know nothing about them. Does he mean to imply that he has? He asserts these great scientists have never given it "intelligent thought"—some assumption certainly!

One of his dogmatic (and therefore unproved) assertions is, "when the soul departs, the brain and the muscles cease their actions," whereas the "reason, intelligence and common sense" he appeals to would lead us to an exactly reverse conclusion. If the soul departs it must first have arrived. Will Mr. Bryan tell us when and how? And if in childhood it is immature does it grow with the body?

His most absurd statement however is: "If consciousness is not outside of the body, why does the man cease thinking when he is dead? Simply because the thinking part has gone somewhere else." What could be more dogmatic (unfounded) than this statement?

This is an old abandoned theory on which a Mr. Hall wrote a whole volume, with which I, when an ignorant Christian, was very much taken, because it agrees with the idea of the impostor Paul as to the body being "clothed upon" with the soul. (2 Cor. v. 2.)

But if the thinking part is outside the man, how does Mr. Bryan know that "the man ceases thinking when he is dead"? He doesn't need his brains to think with. Which is the man, that which is outside of him, or that which is inside? And how does he know that that which was outside has not remained where it was but "has gone somewhere else"? Talk about dogmatism! Besides, it has been proven unquestionably that the body can function without the intelligence or soul.

Mr. Bryan says too that a continuous existence is the natural outcome of evolution. Here he confounds natural succession with unnatural continuous individual existence.

He insists on being a better soulologist than Haeckel and the other great biologists, and bases his superiority on "intelligent thought"; but no one will take his mere word for it till he caters to Missouri. He has just said that the thinking powers are outside the body, yet he speaks of using "demonstration" that would have infallibly revealed one (soul) if it had been present." Here he descends from the clouds to science and Missouri.

Will he please explain his discrimination between "soulology" and the immortality of the soul, the former of which he professes knowledge of, and the latter, denies?

He says he believes evolution. Who, then, but a biologist and anatomist understands man—a flesh and blood animal evolution? Can there be such a person as an "intelligent spiritualist"?

He says these scientists allow their opinions to get the better of their "reason," thus admitting that it is by reason alone can we judge this matter.

He says his belief is based on "palpable truths," but offers not one particle of evidence. They are evidently unknown to all other rational writers.

In fact, Mr. Bryan's letter might have been written by the greatest "ignoramus" as far as it goes, for it gives no suggestion of evidence, asserting merely that Haeckel knows no more about the soul than he does; thus persisting in speaking of the soul as a separate entity which science has already unquestionably proven does not exist.

Mr. Bryan must justify his remarks or bear the onus of a dogmatic ignoramus, for Mr. Haeckel is not here.

To hold a "belief" without any base of proof is inconceivable to "reason and intelligence"; all such belief must necessarily originate in imagination or dreams of the material brain, and is going back along with the mossbacks.

SPIRIT MANIFESTATION A DISEASE.

From Dr. Homer Wakefield, Illinois.

To the Editor of The Truth Seeker:

Since I have been a reader of THE TRUTH SEEKER I have read in its columns many nauseous mixtures of contributions on the subject of spiritualism. Among many able exposés of this combination of venal frauds and expressions of disordered and unbalanced minds, I have regretted to read several recitations of data and arguments in behalf of spiritualism from men who perhaps attained to intellectual rationalism in other respects. Some of these have displayed the most dense ignorance on the subject of spiritualism. Some of them are full of superstitions of this sort, while yet others display a lamentable degree of mental derangement which would be immediately so recognized if published in a high-class medical journal.

As a Rationalist, I am ashamed that our foremost American organ should permit its columns to be occupied with such mixtures of ignorance and superstition. To be sure, the publication of such articles has served to bring out many able articles against spiritualism which perhaps otherwise would not be brought to light, yet to the outsider, the occasional reader of THE TRUTH SEEKER, who might see a copy which contained some articles I have read, could not help but think we were not Rationalists after all, but only obsessed bigots.

In your issue of May 26 appears a communication from W. J. Bryan, M. D., of New York, whose academic degree presupposes a medical education, who tells us that he has also made a study of psychology, and this in turn would lead to the conclusion that he is possessed of ability to differentiate normal from morbid psychology. In fact, he proceeds to state his case with all the authority of a medical and psychological expert, and all the ignorance of the most ignorant layman. He has had a personal experience, and now brings his own great brain, learning and professional acumen to bear to decide the question of spiritualism for all mankind.

Dr. Bryan now turns us from the ridiculous to the lamentable. He describes a morbid state of cleavage of his consciousness, and of so wide a separation of his conscious and subconscious egos as to admit of intercommunication between them. He is not conscious of the fact that his conscious self is communicating with his subconscious ego, but such is the fact. If Dr. Bryan will look into his physical status a little, he may find, unless his age is against him, that he can restore his conscious unity by correcting some one or more physical processes, that one of his medical contemporaries will find out of order on examination.

Many psychologists have written on this subject, but I have no doubt but that the book department of THE TRUTH SEEKER can obtain for Dr. Bryan the works on Double Consciousness by Prof. Th. Ribot; Double Personality, by Dr. Morton Prince, and last and best for his purpose, The Psychology of Suggestion and Mental Dissociations, by Dr. Boris Sidis, and The Future Life, by Dr. Singleton W. Davis.

The book first mentioned, of Dr. Sidis, is not well titled; it should have been named for its predominant subject, Bi-ego consciousness. Dr. Davis' work is complimentary to Dr. Sidis, and assumes the fundamental knowledge on the part of the reader, which Dr. Sidis' books contain. It is in consideration of the irrational and ignorant expressions of some Freethinkers a pleasure to know that both Dr. Sidis and Dr. Davis are pronounced Rationalists. They are a credit to their Freethought associations.

Spiritualism in its divers forms, like religion in general, is a disease. Men, who during the years of vigorous mentality, have been thoroughly rationalistic, are subject to forms of intellectual decline which are pitiable to contemplate. It can't be helped. Let us hope that our own decline of life's process will not take that form.

FREETHOUGHT'S OPPORTUNITY.

From A. W. Smith, Connecticut.

To the Editor of The Truth Seeker:

I was more than happy to read the article in the issue of June 2 entitled, "A Here and Now Religion" or "The Democratic View of Religion," for it expressed my essential philosophy perfectly. I knew it had to come and very soon. There is going to be a complete and clean-cut revolution in philosophy and religion tomorrow or the day after, and we ought to be right on the firing line and in the trenches when the great world-war between Autocracy and Democracy in philosophy and religion breaks out.

There is a glorious opportunity in our hands at the present time to smash Christianity, which is nothing whatever but a religion of autocracy, monarchy and aristocracy on the one hand, and of slavery, subjection and serfdom of every kind on the other, and to establish an absolutely super-Christian and Monistic philosophy, and republicanism and universal cosmic freedom. The Human Kaiser must go, and the Cosmos Kaiser of Christianity and dualism and autocracy must go with him. This is the most revolutionary period in human history, and there is no institution, not even the Freethought movement, which is not going to be overhauled and revolutionized. I say it, in all charity, but with clear conviction, that the present Freethought movement in its present form has seen its best days, and it must modify its philosophy, its policy and tactics or it will go under in the wreck, with other too conservative institutions. It will have to keep up with the rapid progress of present day evolution and revolution or get left behind.

I see that your speakers are being suppressed and abused in New York! Why not organize as "The Religion of Democracy"? Democracy and Humanity are practically equivalent words, and connote the same essential things, viz., "The Common People." Don't quibble over mere words. Use a little policy. Follow the line of "least resistance" and not of the greatest. This is no time for immaterial verbal quibbles.

The Freethought movement in its present shape has outlived its best and most effective usefulness. An opportunity to advance and to put new life into it is right at our hands, and we should have the insight and courage and enterprise to use it. Life is a great adventure, enterprise and game, and if we never venture, we shall never win.

THE KAISER'S DREAM.

[I enclose copy of a piece of poetry written by a 14-year girl of Castleton, N. Y., thinking it might please you to read it and possibly publish it for your readers.—WM. HASKELL, Sawtelle, Cal.]

There is a story, though strange it may seem,
Of the great Kaiser Bill and his wonderful dream.
Being weary of fighting, he lay on his bed,
And among other things he dreamed he was dead
And in a fine coffin was lying in state,
With a crowd of brave Belgians bemoaning his fate.

He was not long dead when he found to his cost,
His soul, like his soldiers, would quickly be lost.
On leaving this earth to meet his true fate
He hastened to heaven and knocked on the gate.
St. Peter looked out and exclaimed loud and clear:
"Try down below Bill; you can't get in up here."

"Now," said the Kaiser, "I call that uncivil,
But a welcome I'll get from my old friend the devil."
He turned on his heel and away he did go
At the top of his speed to the regions below.
But when he arrived he was filled with dismay,
For while waiting outside he heard old Nick say:

"See here, all you Imps, I give you fair warning,
I'm expecting the Kaiser down here any morning;
But don't let him in, for to me 'tis quite clear,
He's after my job, and we don't want him here.
If he once should get in there'll be numerous quarrels;
In fact, I'm afraid he'll corrupt our good morals."

"All right, my dear friend," the great Kaiser cried,
"Excuse me for listening while waiting outside.
If you don't let me in, where then shall I go?"
"Indeed," said the devil, "I'm damned if I know."
"Oh do let me in, for I'm feeling quite cold.
And if you want money I've plenty of gold."

"Let me sit in a corner, no matter how hot,"
"No, no," yelled the Devil, "most certainly not.
We don't allow folks here for riches and pelf,
Here's sulphur and matches, make hell for yourself."
And he fast kicked him out when he vanished in smoke:
And just at that moment, the Kaiser awoke.

He jumped out of bed in a shivering sweat
And said, "That's a dream I shan't soon forget.
That I won't go to Heaven I know very well,
But it's really too bad to be kicked out of hell!"

EXPERIENCE.

From D. Bobspa, California.

To the Editor of The Truth Seeker:

There is a preacher out in Los Angeles who is telling some things about the brethren since he got his eyes opened. "The clergy are the most inconsistent people on earth," declares the Rev. Dr. I. F. Tanner.

It all grew out of Dr. Tanner's stand on war. Dr. Tanner was a good Methodist preacher for a lifetime. He was considered safe. Hence when the pastor of the Highland Park M. E. church was called away for a Sunday recently, he invited the brother to occupy his pulpit. Now, notwithstanding his experiences, which should long ago have taught him better, Dr. Tanner was of childlike faith. (Right here I want to say that, having heard this newly-born comrade speak and talked with him, I am convinced of his perfect sincerity.)

His belief in the church led him to think the Carpenter of Galilee was taken seriously by the canting hypocrites who have used his name whereby to keep the slaves in subjection. So he went into the pulpit that Sunday morning with a hatred of war and a disgust at the attitude of the ministers. His congregation drove him from the church with angry cries and hisses; there were threats of violence and much talk of "treason." The real minister and his official board rushed to the newspapers with denials of responsibility for the heretical views of their former "brother." They denounced him and hastened to assure the public that Christianity sanctions butchery and is opposed, as of old, to any enlightening truths being proclaimed from its gold-supported pulpits.

"The church is following the old Hebrew church in its ideas," said Dr. Tanner. "The Hebrews were great warriors. If they were licked by the other fellows, then they thought God was displeased with them. But if they succeeded in butchering innocent men, women and children, it was a sure sign that God was with them."

"I reminded the Highland Park congregation," he continued, "that Jesus is 'the Prince of Peace,' and not 'the Prince of War.' How could such a one enlist to fight the battles of a Caesar, of a Hannibal, of a kaiser, of a Russian czar, of any man on earth? Every nation founded by the sword has fallen by the sword. There are some still standing that will yet fall by the sword."

"Christianity has never had a trial on this earth," according to Dr. Tanner. We have had "churchianity," but "the spirit of Jesus has never been given a chance in the churches."

"What would the commander-in-chief of an army say if the chaplain were to choose any of Christ's statements on war as a text? Most wars are long protracted before the soldiers of either side know the causes of the war. If the objects of most wars could be understood by the soldiers there would be no fighting."

"Since the time of Constantine there has not been one war for defense alone. It is a desecration to the memory of Jesus whenever preachers go down on their knees to ask God to slaughter thousands of their 'enemies.'"

"In Los Angeles there are many women and children every day marching up and down the alleys to feed from the garbage cans; and yet the preachers of Los Angeles have just raised $50,000 to bring Billy Sunday here to have the people get a move onto them."

"Don't charge Jesus with the work of the churches. Christianity is one thing that has never been tried. The clergy are the most inconsistent people on earth. In times of peace they preach peace, but when war is declared they are the first to get into the band wagon of popularity."

"The most humiliating sight I know of is the spectacle of Arthur Balfour at the tomb of Washington, where he shed his crocodile tears at the grave of the worst traitor England ever had—a man who would have met the fate of Sir Roger Casement if England could have gotten hold of him."

It was just four weeks after Dr. Tanner was spewed forth by the church that I first heard him. He had made good progress and is now engaged in a study of the working class problems.

The good "brethren" of Nampa, Idaho, have given similar proof of their fidelity to the bloody religion of Jehovah. H. H. Stallard reports that a young preacher went into the Socialist headquarters there on May 25 and stated he intended to carry a banner with a picture of Jesus and the words "Thou shalt not kill," at a war booster meeting.

"He wanted to see if the Socialist could furnish him with a picture (knowing the churches would not)," said Mr. Stallard. "The State Secretary, C. F. Fields, pointed to the only one he had in his office, the one showing Christ looking at the modern implements of war, and told him he was welcome to use that one if it would do; so he arranged his banner and went to the meeting.

It created a stampede. They were dumfounded, but, recovering, began a tirade against the fellow. Someone yelled "Kill him!" and the fellow, not being accustomed to that kind of religion, ran, the crowd after him, part of them trying to get him to stop and others against him, as the sentiment was divided. The fellow got away.

APPARENT INCONCINNITY.

From A. W. Gohenour, Pennsylvania.

To the Editor of The Truth Seeker:

I have read with much interest and indignation your editorial entitled "Framing Up the Freethinker." It makes one's blood boil to learn that free speech in the great city of New York is held in such low esteem by the powers that be. I am glad that one editor at least has the courage to make a stand against persecution of this kind.

I have also read in "The Letter Box" an answer to a letter by T. J. Bowles, M. D., stating that "we live under the protection of the American flag, which would lose its potency if the protection were not reciprocal."

It is not necessary for me to point out to you that your editorial and the quotation from "The Letter Box" do not harmonize. However, to one who has read THE TRUTH SEEKER for the last four years it would seem that one inconsistency so evident should not appear.

One does not expect to meet with harmony and consistency in the daily and weekly publications of capitalism, but the organs of Rationalism cannot afford to commit errors of this kind. I write this with no spirit of bitterness, but I do wish to emphasize my belief that the American flag gives very little protection to those who find it impossible to agree with the teachings, (economic and religious) that the capitalist system bends every effort to set forth.

I am the father of two boys, but I do not care to give them into the service of a country that frames up Freethinkers.

(Your point is apparent, but apparent only—not real. While the protection of the American flag for citizens under it is imperfect and leaves something to be desired, it is all we have to appeal to against invasion actual or threatened; and our appeal might seem to be without grounds if we did nothing to support it. But the imperfection is not constitutional; so far as Freethinkers are concerned, it is due to the recreancy of bigoted officials to their trust, and to disregard of the Constitution and what the flag stands for. It is no reflection on the flag that some of these pervert the principles it represents. For us to fail now would seem to be giving aid and comfort to a country where Freethought publications and meetings were suppressed early in the war; and then our sons are not called to the colors to back up Judge Murphy in fining Meirowitz for giving an officer an argument. Still we hope your protest may reach and enlighten "the powers that be."—Ed. T. S.)

"It is a great plea, a grand argument for freedom. The verses are wonderful, dramatic, filled with the real fire."—INGERSOLL.

The Light-Bearer of Liberty

By PROF. J. W. SCHOLL

Is the book containing the verses of which Ingersoll speaks and which deserve the praise he has given them. That The Light-Bearer is Ingersoll himself adds to the value of the poems, which as poetry are unsurpassed by anything the living poets have written. To the title piece, occupying more than forty pages, are added other verse by Professor Scholl, making a book of 148 pages, cloth bound, deckle edge.

To place in the hands of appreciative readers the few copies left of this rare book, it is offered at a price just covering the cost of distribution.

Fifty Cents per Copy, Postpaid.

Send to The Truth Seeker Office for it.

CHILDREN'S CORNER FOR BOYS AND GIRLS YOUNG AND OLD

"Between the dark and the daylight,
When the night is beginning to lower,
Comes a pause in the day's occupations
That is known as the Children's Hour."

FREETHOUGHT CALENDAR.

CONDUCTED BY FRANKLIN STEINER.

Joseph (Giuseppe) Mazzini, June 22, 1808-March 10, 1872.

Joseph Mazzini, the agitator for and hero of United Italy, was born in Genoa, June 22, 1805. That country for centuries had been divided into different provinces or states, under separate governments, or under the control of other nations. A number of these extending from the Adriatic to the Mediterranean, consisting of 15,289 square miles and containing 3,126,000 inhabitants, were under the temporal power of the pope, who ruled over them as an absolute monarch. Liberty of any kind was here unknown, and the people often rebelled against the yoke. The wish for a united Italy, with Rome, its ancient capital, for the seat of government, had long been the dream of the Italian people. Twenty-six times had different popes called in foreign armies to stifle the Italians' desire for liberty. Joseph Mazzini was born at the time when Napoleon I humiliated popery by seizing upon the temporal power, which, when he formed the Concordat with the church, he afterwards restored. His father was a physician and Joseph studied for the same profession, but was finally graduated as a lawyer. Finding that he did not relish legal lore, he turned his attention to literature, writing a number of essays and reviews. As he was an enthusiast for Italian union and liberty, he began to write upon these subjects, but his writings were suppressed. He joined the Carbonari, a society organized to further the cause, where he rose to a high rank. He went on a mission to Tuscany, but was betrayed and imprisoned for six months, after which he went to France. He was now the leading spirit of "young Italy," determined to free his country from foreign and domestic tyrants—chief of the latter being the papacy. He began a campaign of education. His motto was "God and the people," he being a deist, but a hater of priestcraft. On one side of his banner were the words "Unity and Independence"; on the other, "Liberty, Equality and Humanity." From Marseilles in France he started a propaganda to arouse his countrymen, and his writings were smuggled across the border. In 1832 he was obliged to flee to Switzerland, and for twenty years was an exile from his native land. During this time he kept no record of dates, made no biographical notes and preserved no copies of letters. In England his letters were opened and their contents communicated to the Neapolitan government. In 1849 the pope was driven out and Rome became a republic.

Mazzini became a member of the triumvirate. The pope appealed to that true son of the church, Napoleon III, who sent an army in his defense. The Italians were unable to make a stand against the veteran French army. The republic was overthrown and Mazzini fled to Switzerland and then to London. For twenty years, French bayonets upheld the temporal powers of the church. Mazzini continued his work from abroad, taking part in several insurrections, and, returning to Italy in 1857, was laid under sentence of death, which in 1866 was removed. He was elected a member of the Italian parliament, but refused to serve. In 1870 he was arrested at sea while on his way to Italy, and was imprisoned two months. This year freedom dawned upon his beloved country. Napoleon III had provoked a war with Germany, and needing all his soldiers at home, he withdrew his army from Italy. Rome now fell, and the Italians took possession of the city. Italy was united and free and the pope's temporal power was gone forever. Mazzini's dream was realized, but his health had begun to fail and he died of pleurisy, March 10, 1872.

Other events of which the past week is the anniversary are:

June 17, Abner Kneeland imprisoned for blasphemy, 1838. Battle of Bunker Hill, 1775.

June 18, Cobbett died, 1835. U. S. declared war with Great Britain, 1812. Grote, historian, died, 1871.

June 19, George Stephenson, railroad pioneer, born, 1781.

June 20, Bishop Colenso died, 1883. Jesuits expelled from France, 1880.

June 21, Mrs. Annie Besant and Charles Bradlaugh found guilty of publishing "Fruits of Philosophy," 1877. Anthony Collins born, 1676.

June 22—Galileo forced to recant his teachings on astronomy, 1633.

June 23, Charles Bradlaugh, M. P., imprisoned for insisting on his right to take his seat in Parliament to which he was elected, 1880.

Death of "Smoke," Fire-Fighter.

Members of Hook and Ladder Company No. 12, New York city, are still telling stories about "Smoke." Not an unusual topic among firemen, perhaps, but in this case "Smoke" was a Dalmatian dog and one that lived up to the high standards of his blue-blooded ancestry, and died in the performance of a self-imposed duty.

"Seven years ago," says the New York Sun, "Smoke was a fussy, awkward pup with kindly brown eyes and a tongue that seemed a yard long when he insisted upon kissing every one right on the mouth." The puppy was brought up on a bottle by the men of the fire-truck company, and the Sun says:

"A year later he was a trained fire-fighter. He knew the stations and when the alarm came in on the gong no one could fool him. The first stroke of the alarm in the truck-room brought him to his feet. With ears alert and his keen, intelligent eyes bright with expectation, he waited until the signal was complete. If it was not his station he curled up and went to sleep again like a philosopher.

"There was no haul too long or no pace too fast for Smoke. He was always at the head of the company as it rolled out of the house, and he seemed able to sense the fire, for he was never known to make a mistake; that's why they called him Smoke. The men said he could smell his way to a fire in Iceland.

"When his other four-legged friends, the trio of big gray horses which had drawn the truck for years, left to give place to the new and noisy automobile-truck with its shrill siren, Smoke was for a time inconsolable. The speed of the new apparatus, however, attracted him, for he found he had to go faster, and after a few weeks he went back to his philosophic existence and ceased to pine.

"So Smoke grew to be the pal of every one in Truck 12, and year after year he guided the men to their heroic work without any hurt until two weeks ago and then the faithful dog was called to his station for the last time.

"Shortly after midnight, when the men were in their beds and only Smoke and the lieutenant in charge were on duty, a third alarm came in. Smoke dashed away at the head of the truck, instinctively finding his way to the fire. When the men reached the scene they saw it was a grave task in front of them, for a chemical factory was burning, and even then the fumes of chlorin gas were laying men out as they attempted to get their lines of hose into the building.

"Smoke never faltered. He snarled a little as the gas-fumes hit his sensitive nostrils, and shook his head, but he wagged his tail encouragingly, and although half strangling he never faltered, but entered the building at the head of his company.

"Three times Smoke, half-suffocated, located men of his company who were overcome and guided rescuers to where they lay unconscious. Then Smoke staggered out into the street and dropped on the pavement. Tender hands picked him up, and he was sent back to the house in the battalion-chief's machine, where he was treated and carefully wrapped up in blankets and put to bed.

"The next day found Smoke a changed dog. The gentle expression in his eyes was gone. They were bloodshot and strange and he growled for the first time in his life to the men who loved him and wanted to care for him. A consultation was held and it was decided that Smoke should have the 'best dog specialist in the country.' All the men chipped in, a private dog-ambulance was called, and old Smoke, growling with a cruel display of his fangs and a glaze over his usually kind eyes, was taken away to the hospital of the Society for the Prevention of Cruelty to Animals."

Smoke never recognized his friends again. He had gone insane from the effects of the chlorin gas, and it was necessary to chloroform him. There is a suspicious moisture in the eyes of the sturdy fire-fighters of Truck 12 when they tell about Smoke and the days when he was "brought up by hand."

Since When.

An Irishman walked up Fifth Avenue, dropped into a Presbyterian church and immediately went to sleep. After the services were over the sexton came and shook him by the arm.

"We are about to close up," said that functionary, "and I'll have to ask you to go now."

"What talk have you?" said the Irishman. "The cathedral never closes."

"This is not the cathedral," said the sexton. "The cathedral is several blocks above here. This is a Presbyterian church."

The Irishman sat up with a jerk and looked about him. On the walls between the windows were handsome paintings of the Apostles.

"Ain't that Saint Luke over yonder?" he demanded.

"It is," said the sexton.

"And Saint Mark just beyant him?"

"Yes."

"And, still farther along, Saint Timothy?"

"Yes."

"Young man," demanded the Irishman, "since when did all thim turn Protestants?"

The Intelligent Dog.

A dog was in the habit of going daily to a baker's shop. His master would give him a penny, which he would drop out of his mouth on to the counter, receiving in exchange a penny bun.

One day his master said to the baker, "I should like to know how much my dog really does know. Try him with a half-penny bun to-morrow."

When, the next day, the dog dropped his penny, and only a halfpenny bun was given to him, he sniffed at it, turned it over and over with his paw, then in a dignified manner walked out of the shop, leaving the bun.

In ten minutes he returned, accompanied by a policeman.—Tit-Bits.

Goethals' Method.

The following story is told of Colonel George W. Goethals, who at the time it occurred was an instructor in engineering at West Point.

One day, during a recitation, he gave out this question to a class of cadets:

"The post flagpole, sixty feet high, has fallen down. You are ordered by your commanding officer to put it up again. You have under your command a sergeant and ten privates of the engineer corps. How would you get the pole back into place?"

Each cadet, after long consideration and much figuring over derricks, blocks, tackle, and so on, evolved a different method.

"No," said Goethals, "you are all wrong. You would simply say: 'Sergeant, put up that flagpole!'"

Change.

Ruth is an alchemist, I know,

And so I'll have to drop her.

For every time I'm out with her

My silver turns to copper.

—Widow.

Self-Condemed.

Robert's mother's admonishing to her small son generally ended with the words: "I'd be ashamed of you if you did so and so," and the word "ashamed," therefore, was constantly in his ears.

One day, after he had eaten up his little sister's candy, his mother said to him:

"Robert, did you eat Dorothy's candy when I told you not to?"

"Yes, ma'am," said Robert in a tone of triumph, "and I'm jest as ashamed of myself as I can be, so you needn't be ashamed of me at all!"—New York Evening Post.

How It Struck the Boy.

A Philadelphia divine was entertaining a couple of clergymen from New York at dinner. The guests spoke in praise of a sermon their host had delivered the Sunday before.

The host's son was at the table and one of the New York clergymen said to him:

"My lad, what did you think of your father's sermon?"

"I guess it was very good," said the boy, "but there were three mighty fine places where he could have stopped."

Worth the Risk.

For three successive nights the new and proud father walked the floor with the baby. On the fourth night he became desperate, and on arriving home from the office unwrapped a bottle of soothing sirup.

"Oh, James," exclaimed his wife, when she saw the label, "what did you buy that for? Don't you know it is very dangerous to give a child anything like that?"

"Don't worry," was the husband's tired reply; "I'm going to take it myself!"—Tit-Bits.

Her Idea of It.

The sitting-room carpet was being taken up preparatory to housecleaning, and little Dorothy, aged three, was watching the operation with a great deal of childish curiosity and interest. Taking up carpets evidently was something new to her infantile mind. Finally, after some hard thinking on the subject, she looked up at her mother and asked:

"Mamma, is you goin' to let the floor go barefooted?"

Misleading.

"Well, for instance," said the teacher, "supposing you want to remember the name of the poet Bobby Burns. Fix in your mind's eye a picture of a policeman in flames. See—Bobby Burns?"

"Yes, I see," said the bright pupil, "but how is one to know that it does not represent Robert Browning?"

But There Still Are Slippers.

Mrs. Hive—"Why are children so much worse than they used to be?"

Mrs. Bee—"I attribute it to improved ideas in building."

Mrs. Hive—"How so?"

Mrs. Bee—"Shingles are scarce, and you can't spank a boy with a tin roof!"—Argywan.

Recognition Was Easy.

"You don't recognize me, do you, Bobbie?" asked a lady who had recently been baptized.

"Sure I do," piped the young boy. "You's de lady what went in swimmin' wid de preacher las' Sunday."—Harper's Magazine.

Humiliating the Cat.

Helen, aged seven, was feeding the cat at the dinner table. Her father told her that the cat must wait, whereupon the small girl answered, "I think it is a shame, just because she is a poor dumb animal, to treat her just like a hired girl."

The Trapper.

A man all out of breath recently rushed into the basement and said to the clerk: "A nickel mouse trap, please, and let me have it quickly, as I want to catch a train."

Easy Work.

"What is meant by below par?"

"Working for dad, I guess."—Lampoon.

THE LETTER BOX.

H. W., New York.—The advocate of free speech today is a voice crying in the wilderness. If we don't watch out we shall be suspected of trying to take autocracy away from the Germans in order to use it ourselves.

JOHN McLEMORE, Virginia.—We have no knowledge of ancient law that would qualify us to say whether or not in the supposed time of Christ anyone could be put to death in the Roman empire without first getting the sanction of the emperor. You can buy a book by Sir Henry Maine, on Ancient Law, for about 75 cents, and there find, no doubt, the answer to your question.

DEAN RATHBUN DININNY, Arkansas.—You are perhaps the only Arabian and Mohammedan descendant of Abraham and Katura that we have on our list of correspondents, and we regret that on giving it the once over your communication does not appear to be available. We shall mull over it further, however, in the hope of finding portions of it that can be made into an article.

SCOUT ALLISON, South Dakota.—Your sarcastic question about the mental condition of the Spiritualist contributors to our columns cannot be commented upon here. Spiritualism is a survival, probably, of the habits of thought induced by prior beliefs in angels, demonology, witchcraft, wizardry, and so on. That the phenomena relied upon as proof are produced by spirits would not enter the mind of one who did not already believe in continuity after death and in "possession" or "control" of the living.

W. J. H., Port Hope, Ont.—We get many commissions from readers, who send us clippings, to make comment on a variety of subjects, which we should uniformly do if the mind always worked, or there were time or room. The "remarkable document," concerning which we made a note, was an ecclesiastical affair of most interest to church people. We recall a number of cuttings you have sent chronicling the doings of the army chaplains. If we have overlooked any of them in making up our Notes at Large it was for reasons stated above—they did not start a train of thought or suggest a point. Doubtless, however, all such matter serves to fructify the mind.

JOHN S. SUMNER, Secretary the New York Society for the Suppression of Vice, 140 Nassau street, New York.—Your communication of June 8, regarding "Awakening of Spring" and "Susan Lenox: Her Fall and Rise," is at hand and contents noted. We have not seen a copy of "Awakening of Spring" since we took some long ago from the publishers on a debt not otherwise collectible at the time and disposed of them at a sacrifice. The work did not fascinate nor shock us, but if its sale is, as you say, in "violation of the penal law of the state of New York," we are sorry for the law, and God save the state. There has been no call for "Susan Lenox" here. You remark that the publishers, D. Appleton & Co., have been obliged to cut out "101 solid pages of objectionable matter." No doubt. Reams of objectionable matter are printed. The cutting of 101 pages from the Bible would not hurt it any.

THE CHRISTIAN MYTHOLOGY

A Work that Traces the Principal Features of the Christian Religion to Their Source in the Mythologies of Older Religions.

By BRIGHAM LEATHERBEE
Illustrated.

A feature of the work is the uncovering of the phallic principles in Christianity, to which the key is given in a series of illustrations.

"The Christian Mythology" is printed on light but substantial paper, convenient in size, handsomely bound in cloth, with gold sidestamp, and is provided with a sufficient index and a Bibliography that guides the reader to works drawn upon as authorities. The unpretentious little volume will bring light to thousands who know nothing about the origin of the dogmas they believe or the rites they practice.

Published by

The Truth Seeker Co.
62 Vesey Street New York
Price, 75 cents

The Ingersoll Birthday Book

Selections by
GRACE LELAND MACDONALD

(Mrs. G. E. Macdonald)
Preface by EVA INGERSOLL-BROWN.
(Granddaughter of Ingersoll)
Decorations by PAUL F. BERDANIER.

Cover by HUGH HENNESSY.
Printed in Color on Cameo Plate Coated
Sepia Paper, 252 pages, Octavo.
Descriptive Circular sent free on application.

PRICE, $1.65 POSTPAID
The Truth Seeker Company
62 Vesey Street, New York

This Is the Book We Have Been Waiting For

The Belief In God and Immortality

A STATISTICAL STUDY

By JAMES H. LEUBA
Professor of Psychology and Pedagogy in Bryn Mawr College.

The work is the result of an inquiry among men of science — biologists, sociologists, historians, psychologists — as to whether they believe or want to believe in a prayer-answering God and in continuance of life after death. The answer is altogether different from what might be expected in view of the frequent affirmations of the supernaturalists that belief in Christianity, or at least its fundamental dogmas, is held by the majority of the men of science.

It puts into the hands of Freethinkers exactly the information they want on that subject, with the facts and figures verifying it.

As a logical conclusion, founded upon the general aspect of the case, we have held that science leads its votaries to a rejection of such undemonstrable propositions as the existence of gods and the survival of the "soul" when the body is dead. Here we have the evidence, in statistical form, which confirms our view.

To the inquiry into the attitude of the scientists there are added statistics regarding the thought of college students regarding the same religious dogmas.

The author is himself a man of science, an authority in his special branch, which is Psychology, and he knows and sets forth the origin and history of the beliefs with which he deals.

No recent book has attracted more attention from the press, or presented such a serious problem to the supernaturalists.

Cloth, 8vo., $2, postpaid
Sold by

The Truth Seeker Company
62 Vesey Street, New York

MIRACLES OF SCIENCE. A Record of Scientific Progress in This Century. By Henry Smith Williams. Price $2. Postage 15 cents.

FOURTH EDITION
THE BIBLE

By John E. Remsburg

Eleven Chapters on the Authenticity of the Bible—
Thirteen on the Credibility of the Bible—Ten on the Morality of the Bible, with an Appendix of Unanswerable Arguments Against the Divine Origin and in Favor of the Human Origin of the Bible

Twenty-six Pages of Index, enabling the reader to refer in an instant to any authority quoted or Argument used by the Author.

The book makes some five hundred pages, and is printed handsomely on heavy paper, with wide margins.
Price, $1.25 net

The Candle from Under the Bushel

(Mark iv, 21); or,

1,306 Questions to the Clergy

And for the Consideration of Others.

Instructive, Interesting, and Laughable.

By WILLIAM HART

Price, paper, 50 cents; cloth, $1.00.

Address THE TRUTH SEEKER CO.

MYTH AND LEGEND IN THE BIBLE.

By Keighley Snowden.

A valuable handbook for those who desire to keep handy a clear statement of the most assured results of modern thought as applied to the critical examination of the Bible.

Price, cloth, $1.50.

Address, THE TRUTH SEEKER CO.,
62 Vesey St., New York.

SELF-CONTRADICTIONS OF THE BIBLE. By W. H. Burr. One hundred and forty-four propositions embodying the most palpable and striking self-contradictions of the Bible with a summary. Price 15 cents.

THE FOURTH DEMAND. Religious Teaching in Public Schools, with Reasons Why It Should Be Abolished. By Woolsey Teller. This is a fresh and up-to-date discussion of the subject. Price, 10 cents.

DESIGN ARGUMENT. Anatomically and Physiologically Considered. By an East Indian. Per copy, 10 cents; fifteen copies, $1.

ANTICHRIST. By Ernest Renan. Paper, 50 cents; cloth, $1.00.

ASMODEUS; or, THE DEVIL UPON TWO STICKS. By A. R. Le Sage. Translated from the French. With 14 illustrations. Paper, 50 cents.

"THE CHRIST"

A Critical Review and Analysis of the Evidences of His Existence

By JOHN E. REMSBURG

Author of "The Bible," "Six Historic Americans," etc.

In deciding who Jesus was we are compelled to choose between the character drawn with scores of divergences in the synoptics, and that other character which is elaborated by the gospel of John; for nothing is plainer than that though Matthew, Mark and Luke may have the same Jesus in mind, theirs is not the Jesus of John. Little of the Jesus limned in one of the gospels is preserved in the others, except the name. With the name left out would anybody be sure that all the gospel writers were writing of the same man? What resemblance is there between the Jesus Christ of the synoptics and the Christ Jesus of Paul that does not subsist between either of them and any other "messiah" known to the history of religion?

One who begins Mr. Remsburg's book with curiosity to learn what can be said for the myth theory is likely to end with the conviction that this theory alone is supported by probability.

There are chapters on Christ's Real Existence Impossible; Silence of Contemporary Writers; Christian Evidence; Infancy of Christ; The Resurrection of Christ; Character and Teachings; The Christ a Myth; Sources of the Christ Myth. An Index of 19 pages enables the reader to open the book at the place where he desires to reread or at the subject to which he wishes to refer.

599 Pages; 12mo; Cloth Bound, Linen Finish; Gold Back and Side Stamp

Price, $1.25

ADDRESS:

THE TRUTH SEEKER
62 Vesey Street

TENTH EDITION.
Crimes of Preachers

A RECORD OF THE CLERGY WHO HAVE COMMITTED CRIMES AND IMMORALITIES.

As was said of previous editions, the record is startlingly instructive and will open the eyes of the people, proving as it does that in thousands of cases the Bible and the Christian religion have totally failed to keep even their exponents from committing acts of grossest immorality and deeds of darkest crime.

Cover in colors. 247 pages.

PRICE, 35 CENTS

Address, THE TRUTH SEEKER CO.,
62 Vesey St., New York.

Is The Bible Worth Reading?
And Other Essays

By LEMUEL K. WASHBURN

Price, postpaid, $1.

Address THE TRUTH SEEKER,
62 Vesey St., New York

DEPARTMENT OF ECONOMICS.

A World Safe for Democracy

A little while ago, when there was more or less excitement over the sinking of the Lusitania, I stood on the street and listened to the heated arguments of men in "bee-hives," or groups gathered near the rostrum of a street speaker. Being surprised at the views of many of the speakers, I went about and asked of various persons this question: If the United States should declare war on Germany, do you think that any great number of people would oppose the step?

Without exception they replied that they, personally, would refuse to go to war. Various reasons were given, but for the most part they entertained the idea that they were under no obligation to the government. In fact, most of them had grievances against the government.

As time wore on, and one act after another on the part of Germany drew us closer to the brink of war, this same spirit began to be manifested in various walks of life, from the lofty pinnacle of W. J. Bryan down to the dirty, ragged bums who hang around the platforms of street orators.

I fail to understand this. It does not seem possible that in this age there can be people who do not understand their relation to society or their obligation to the government under which they live. It is a far cry from the birth of the American republic back to the ages of serfdom, autocracy and monarchy; but the tears and groans and blood of untold thousands of victims finally fused together this federation of states of free men into a single body and unfurled a flag dedicated to freedom and equality. When the mind travels back over this long road and history's pages recount to us the steps by which man finally achieved the system of government under which we now live, every right-minded person must unconsciously align himself with our heroic forefathers, and thrill at the deeds they did and the ideals they labored for.

Now, as a matter of fact, there never was a right worth having which has not cost mankind rivers of blood; and every man, woman and child today owes an obligation to those who have in past time fought and bled and suffered in the cause of liberty; and as imperfect as our present system is, it is and has been for over a century the hope and inspiration of the world. Every one of us owes our forebears an obligation. Every one of us owes an obligation to our government, and every one of us should be willing to make any sacrifice in behalf of human liberty.

When the world-war began there was more or less argument about who was to blame, and much confusion regarding the real cause of the war. Germany had her champions ready to deny and to refute every charge of wanton cruelty and wickedness generally that was made by anti-Germans. But there came a day when the truth was brought home to us in a way we could not misunderstand. The ominous warning of a high official of England was sent throughout the nation to the effect that if America did not realize her duty and render assistance against Prussian militarism there would come a day when it would be America's turn to suffer at the hands of the Hun.

Thousands of misguided persons in this country have been confusing the ideas of peace, humanity, brotherhood and Christian "non-resistance" in their minds. They have been living in a "fool's paradise," and imagined that the world had passed the stage of wars of conquest and Hun invasions. They take an individual view of social questions and argue that because they wouldn't do this or that, the other fellow is animated by the same idea. Most of us confine our reading to the newspapers and our thinking to what our favorite publication says, we have not noted the growth of a degenerate idea which time and again has overmastered some individual or nation, and led to the attempt of a conquest of the world.

When the United States promulgated the Monroe Doctrine it was in answer to the national consciousness that in a great measure we stood alone. We represented an idea that was obnoxious to the monarchical governments of Europe and we felt that if their idea of government were allowed a foothold, pressure would be brought to bear upon us in such a way that our national existence would be jeopardized.

That the Monroe Doctrine was resented we well know, but not until recent months was the realization brought home to us that at least one European monarch had deliberated upon a plan to humble us to the dust. It was hard to believe, but no one in his sober senses who has correctly read the record of recent events can doubt that the German rulers have planned and no doubt are yet planning the conquest of America. The state of affairs in Brazil is the answer to all those who under one pretext or other have deprecated our attitude toward Germany.

The Bible says that a man who looks after a woman with lustful eye has committed adultery in his heart; and it is no less true that a nation that has for years plotted and planned for the time when it could strangle the life out of this republic has in its heart already invaded the United States. Every one who loves liberty, every one who realizes what the establishment of this republic has cost the human race in blood and pain and treasure, must know that as units of this great confederation of states we are all bound to rise as one man to the defense of the principles upon which our government is founded.

Constitutional government is the safeguard of human liberty, and constitutional government calls upon the individual to subordinate his individual idea to the will of the majority.

In our political contests we recognize this. However much we disagree with the "ins," those of us who are "out" settle down to upholding the hands of those who are in control, the while pressing the campaign of education to turn the balance in our favor.

No matter how much we may confuse in our minds the ideas of militarism and national preparedness; no matter how much we confuse the idea of universal military training with the idea of autocracy, the fact remains that we are a nation basing our faith on laws enacted by Congress and executed by certain elected officers; and that our continued existence depends upon giving to our government our loyal support.

The time of argument having passed, the time of action has arrived. Every one who opposes in any degree the course that is mapped out for us is in some degree a traitor to his country, a traitor to the cause of human freedom, and unworthy of the times in which he lives.

The United States never entered a war with a more just cause. No nation, either ancient or modern, ever endured with more patience the insults and injuries that have been heaped upon this country by the German autocracy; and no man with red blood in his veins could have done otherwise than the President of this nation has done in the face of the outrages perpetrated against us, culminating in a virtual order for this great nation to remove all its shipping from the high seas except such and such a vessel which might carry mail to such and such a place previously provided the vessel was painted and labeled in such fashion as to please the humor of the high-handed bandits purporting to be the rulers of a great nation.

Pacifists, conscientious quibblers, blatant idiots posing as Socialists, or what not, deluded individuals who do not understand their relation to society, who do not comprehend their duty to their country, or all who are covering their cowardice in one way or another to evade their obligation to the present and to the future,—all are mendicants who accept the blessings of the present, the fruits of the blood and travail of our forefathers as alms, and then kick about the quality of it. These should all be gathered together, labeled, ticketed and shipped to Germany, there to adore the monster whom their activities are tending to thrust upon us.

I here and now repudiate all connection with any and every part of the Socialist movement or the Rationalist movement which in any way gives aid and comfort to a nation and a government which respects neither the rights of a peaceful, friendly nation, nor its solemn treaties, nor the maimed, the wounded, the helpless or the starving. Germany is a nation which has gone mad with the lust for dominion, and which has degenerated into a horde of savages and ruthless Huns, seeking whom they may destroy or despoil. Never since the days of Abraham Lincoln has this nation been blessed with so wise and great a President as Woodrow Wilson, and I sincerely second his declaration that the world must be made safe for democracy.

GEO. H. LONG.

SOCIALISM AND THE WAR.

Whether regarding it as a most dreadful blunder or a premeditated monstrous crime, one must conclude that the lasting effect of the present world struggle lies in its emphasizing the greatest weakness of our social structure; we mean competitive production with its consequent destructive anarchy, nationally and internationally.

This revelation hastens the issue all along the line between private and public ownership of industries and the solution of the weightiest problem pertaining to man's progress in historical times. Upon it depends his deliverance from the blight of "the great open acres" of poverty and militarism, allowing his efforts to become permanently useful and himself to grow in grace. H. MELL.

Overalls.

Maud Muller when she rakes the hay
And with his Honor flirts
This summer will in overalls
Appear instead of skirts;
And all the pretty country maids
From Saratoga Springs
To Portland, Oregon, will wear
The bifurcated things.

The man upon the moon who takes
A telescopic look
At our terrestrial planet now
Will go and write a book,
Or give a lunar lecture full
Of facts as hard as nails,
To prove the earth inhabited
Exclusively by males.

—Minna Irving.

MR. BRYAN AND RATIONALISM.

From J. B. Galbraith, Texas.

To the Editor of The Truth Seeker:

W. J. Bryan lectured at Arlington, May 25 at the Chautauqua, and made a great attack on Rationalism; of course he called it Atheism all the time. His lecture was divided into three parts: First, man's duty to society; next, his duty to the government, and third, and the most important, his duty to God. His argument was the old stuff we have heard so long about no creation without a creator. In his puffing he made the assertion that he could ask an Atheist two questions that would make him commit suicide, and he made other assertions that ruined an otherwise fine lecture. His plea for democracy was second to none.

What I want to know is this: Why can't Mr. Mangasarian, Mr. McCabe or some body else get into the Chautauqua circuit and make it a special feature to answer W. J. Bryan on religion? The only question about the matter would be getting on the program. It would be just like Mr. Ingersoll returning to life. The people want to hear it and will pay the price. We need somebody with a national reputation to wake up the South as Ingersoll did in his day. Can anything be done along this line to help us out?

I made the assertion that Bryan was offered $5,000 to meet Mangasarian in joint debate; was I right? Now is the accepted time to attack the church. We must fight now; we must strike while the iron is hot.

Patriotic Rivalry.

A man we hate
Is Samuel Bowers;
His backyard garden's
Better'n ours.
—Macon Telegraph.

Going Too Far.

Certain prominent Socialists should read Esop's fable of the Cock who betrayed his rival to the Fox. Something very similar to this is the effort by a minority faction to invoke postal censorship in order to prevent circulation of resolutions adopted by a majority at the recent convention of their party at St. Louis. The cock in the fable has been held up for generations as a horrible example, more on account of the despicable nature of his act than its unpleasant physical result. For the same reason these Socialists should remember that there are limits to the manner of conducting a fight within an organization, beyond which one cannot go without sacrificing the respect of all fair-minded persons, both within and without its ranks.—The Public.

PEOPLE

vs.

THE HOLY BIBLE

An imaginary trial where Christian witnesses, telling the truth, become involved in serious difficulties. It was published recently in THE TRUTH SEEKER under the title:

"John Doe Proceedings"

This 24-page pamphlet is suitable for those who have not read criticisms of the Bible; or is good propaganda for your friends who are still bound by the authority of scripture.

Price 10 cents.

THE TRUTH SEEKER CO.

CANON OF THE BIBLE; its Formation, History, and Fluctuations. By Samuel Davidson. Paper, 50 cents.

Rolliglon

AND

Civilization

The Conclusions of a Psychiatrist

By WILLIAM HIRSCH, M.D.

PSYCHIATRY: The branch of Medicine that treats of Mental Diseases.—Standard Dictionary.

PARANOID: A chronic incurable disease which, as a rule, persists throughout the entire life of the patient. The chief characteristic of paranoia is the existence of delusions, either alone or combined with hallucinations.

THE PATRIARCHS and MOSES were PARANOIACS.

So were JESUS and PAUL, whose cases are examined at length.

CHRISTIANITY has been the greatest obstruction to the progress of the world.

THE REFORMATION was not beneficial in its results.

Judaism and the modern Jewish people.

God, the Soul, and Immortality are concepts unknown to Science.

Why educated men still profess belief in inherited superstitions.

Religion incapable of producing the men needed by the future, which will belong to Humanity and Science.

OCTAVO, 610 PAGES, WITH INDEX. PRICE, $2.50 POSTPAID.

Address, The Truth Seeker

"Cursed by the Past: Blessed by the Future"

REMSBURG'S LATEST WORK

Thomas Paine

The Apostle of Liberty

BY JOHN E. REMSBURG

This is the Great Address delivered by Remsburg in Chicago last year, pronounced a masterpiece of thrilling oratory. To the Address is added The Testimony of Five Hundred Witnesses.

This list of the names and words of eminent persons in all walks of life who have praised Paine is a revelation even to his admirers and students, and the eulogy of Remsburg is unsurpassed.

220 Pages; 12mo, Paper, 50 Cents

Published and sold by

THE TRUTH SEEKER CO.
62 Vesey St. - New York

DYNAMIC THEORY OF LIFE AND MIND. By James B. Alexander. An Attempt to show that all Organic Beings are Both Constructed and Operated by the Dynamic Agencies of their respective Environments. Over 400 illustrations, 87 chapters, 1,057 pages, and a 3-column index of 11 pages. Price, express prepaid, $2.75.

FOUR GOSPELS. By Marilla M. Ricker. Cloth, illustrated, $1.00. Monographs on Robert G. Ingersoll; Thomas Paine; John Calvin; Jonathan Edwards; and What is Prayer?

SEVENTH EDITION — REDUCED PRICE

BIBLE MYTHS

AND THEIR PARALLELS IN OTHER RELIGIONS

Being a Comparison of the Old and New Testament Myths and Miracles with those of Heathen Nations of Antiquity

CONSIDERING ALSO THEIR ORIGIN AND MEANING. WITH NUMEROUS ILLUSTRATIONS.

IT is a perfect Encyclopedia on the subjects treated, containing a vast amount of out-of-the-way knowledge not accessible to the majority of readers, and all the objections to the dogmas of Christianity one is likely to encounter, grouped under appropriate heads. No author has struck harder blows at the Christian religion. It is the most important Biblical criticism that has ever appeared, being the result of many years of study of the religions of antiquity. It is thoroughly reliable, every fact being verified by copious notes and authorities.

COL. ROBERT G. INGERSOLL said: "This work demonstrates the fact that there is nothing new or original in Christianity; that its maxims, miracles, and mistakes, its doctrines, sacraments, and ceremonies, were all borrowed; that its virgin mothers, miraculous babes, courier-stars, crucifixions, resurrections, and ascensions were familiar things hundreds of years before the founder of Christianity was born. It shows that all the machinery of the supernatural has been in active operation for countless generations; that all the nations of antiquity had about the same religious experience, and substantially agreed as to the correctness of about the same mistakes. Catholicism administered on the estate of Paganism, and appropriated most of the property to its own use. Christianity furnished new steam for an old engine. Fables, like most other things, wear out and have to be patched, gilded, or replaced."

"The author of 'Bible Myths' has succeeded in showing that our Bible is not the great central fire giving light to the world, but a collection of candles and tapers and sparks borrowed by the 'chosen people' from those whom Jehovah, according to the scriptures, had left in the darkness of nature."

REV. M. J. SAVAGE says: "To me, the volume is worth twenty times its cost."

THE BOSTON COMMONWEALTH says: "Here we have evidence upon evidence that there is no myth, legend, supernatural occurrence, doctrine, rite or ceremony recorded in the Bible which cannot be paralleled in some ancient record centuries older than the page on which the same thing is narrated in the Hebrew and Christian scriptures. We confess we are curious as to how the orthodoxies of the Christian world will greet this book. We more than suspect that they will not greet it at all, but will be content to pass it by in fearful silence."

Seventh Edition: Large 8vo, cloth, 614 pages, $2.

Address THE TRUTH SEEKER :: 62 Vesey Street, New York

In Best of Humor.

What the Other Girl Thought.—"Why, Helen, I think eleven proposals in one week is positively immodest."—Life.

Financial View.—Wife—Big checks for dresses will not be in demand this season. Husband—Thank heaven!—Puck.

No Hope.—The minister of the Gospel who asserts that the war will make an end of hypocrisy is indeed an optimist.—Don Marquis.

He Saw Her There.—He—"Haven't I seen you somewhere some time?" She—"Quite likely. I was there."—New York Sun.

Against B. Sunday.—Mother—"Marjory, you shouldn't use slang so freely." Marjory—"Yes, I suppose it is sacrilegious."—The Lamb.

Jealousy.—Zelle—"He said he was a millionaire's son, and I find he is working for $10 a week."

Ida—"That looks suspicious! A millionaire's son couldn't get over $5."—Philadelphia Bulletin.

What They Fight For.—"What's the difference between a socialist and a plutocrat?"

"There are many; but the leading one is that the former fights for his principle and the latter for his interest."—Baltimore American.

The Gentle Cop.—She—Well, not many policemen this warm weather would have done what the paper says a kind policeman did to the poor drunken man he found asleep on a doorstep.

He—What did the kind policeman do to the poor drunken man?

She—The paper says he fanned him.—Baltimore American.

Time to Revive It.—Way back yonder it was customary for subscriptions to be paid in chickens, eggs, hams, wood, wool, apples, sweet potatoes, butter, or any other article raised on the farm. The plan worked all right in the days of long ago, and it looks like it is going to become popular with the rural press again. It is a good sign when a man wants his weekly paper had enough to be willing to bring in a bag of sweet potatoes, goobers, or other things with which to reimburse the editor.—Montgomery Journal.

The Point Settled.—The following conversation was overheard on a street car the other day: "I think card playing is terrible." "Well, it is just like anything else. If you go too far with it, it is wicked. The same is true of music. Some people get so crazy about music they worship it. That's wicked, too." "But music is an art." "Yes, and card playing is a science." "But some people make a living with music." "And some people make a living playing cards." "Well, I think you are unreasonable." "Well, that is what I think of you."—Coast Seamen's Journal.

Rhymes for Days.

THE SLUGGARDS' CALENDAR.
You know that Munday is Sundaye's brother;
Tuesday is such another;
Wednesday you must go to church and pray;
Thursday is half holiday;
On Friday it is too late to begin to spin;
The Saturday is half holiday agen.

NAIL CUTTING.

Cut your nails on Monday, cut them for news;
Cut them on Tuesday, a pair of new shoes;
Cut them on Wednesday, cut them for health;
Cut them on Thursday, cut them for wealth;
Cut them on Friday, cut them for woe;
Cut them on Saturday, a journey you'll go;
Cut them on Sunday, you'll cut them for evil.
For all the next week, you'll be ruled by the devil.

MARRYING.

Mary Monday for wealth,
Mary Tuesday for health,
Marry Wednesday, the best day of all;
Marry Thursday for crosses,
Marry Friday for losses,
Marry Saturday, no luck at all.

BIRTHDAYS.

Born on a Monday,
Fair of face;
Born on a Tuesday,
Full of God's grace;
Born on a Wednesday,
Merry and glad;
Born on a Thursday,
Sour and sad;
Born on a Friday,
Godly given;
Born on a Saturday,
Work for a living;
Born on a Sunday,
Never shall want;

So there's the week,
And the end on't.

SNEEZING.

Sneeze on a Monday, you sneeze for danger,
Sneeze on a Tuesday, you'll kiss a stranger;
Sneeze on a Wednesday, you sneeze for a letter;
Sneeze on a Thursday, for something better;
Sneeze on a Friday, you'll sneeze for sorrow;
Sneeze on a Saturday, your sweetheart tomorrow;
Sneeze on a Sunday, your safety seek—
The devil will have you for the whole of the week.

THE SOUL AND ITS BEARINGS

SHOWING

The Material Quality of the Soul and the Mechanical Nature of Its Functions and of the Business Relations It Sustains with the Environment on One Side and the Rest of the Corporal Organism on the Other.

BY JAMES B. ALEXANDER

This is a Materialistic book. The author does not believe that the soul survives the body. He says: "Is it right to lie for the concealment of a disagreeable truth—to inclose the vital truth in a pleasant husk of fiction by tricking the people with the delusion of agreeable falsehoods? No! Tell the truth! Let not the truth be brought into disrepute by unworthy and debasing associations."

A very frank book; serious, scholarly, convincing.

Price $1.00

Sold at THE TRUTH SEEKER OFFICE

Paine's Age of Reason

By THOMAS PAINE, M.A.

This edition of Thomas Paine's masterpiece is the one that is sure to become the standard for all future correct editions. It is reprinted from one of the first copies in English published by Barrois at Paris, January, 1794, and the proofs were probably read by Paine. It enables the world of the twentieth century to read Paine's AGE OF REASON as Paine wrote it in the eighteenth century. It is printed from large new type. 180 pages. 15c. T. S. Co.

THE CHRISTIAN HELL

From the First to the Twentieth Century
By

HYPATIA BRADLAUGH BONNER

There is no book in the English language which describes the theory and experience of the doctrine of the Christian Hell with such fulness of details as this work by Mrs. Bonner. No one who wishes to know what this doctrine means when carried to its natural conclusions, as in the teaching of the Roman Catholic church, should fail to secure a copy of this startling work. Mrs. Bonner's sources are entirely authentic, and the reader is held spellbound by her graphic descriptions, which grow in intensity as she reaches the climax of her subject. There are some twenty-eight illustrations in the book, taken from pictures actually circulated by the churches, which serve to bring to view all the horrifying phases of this most inhuman of conceptions. This work alone is sufficient to condemn Christianity as a thoroughly unnatural institution.

PRICE, PAPER, 30 CENTS
CLOTH - 45 CENTS

The Truth Seeker

62 Vesey Street - New York

EXEMPTING THE CHURCHES

A Presentation of Facts and Reasons
to Show Why

CHURCHES SHOULD BE TAXED

Argument of

JAMES F. MORTON, JR.,

Before the Committee on Taxation of the Constitutional Convention at Albany, New York. Expanded into a pamphlet of 84 pages, to which is annexed a tract by John E. Remsburg.

It Covers All the Ground

The many pretexts for the exemption of church property from taxation examined and exposed.

Price 25 Cents

Write for rates on quantities.
THE TRUTH SEEKER CO.

ETERNITY

World-War Thoughts on Life and Death, Religion, and the Theory of Evolution

By ERNST HAECKEL

(Professor at the University of Jena)

Author of "The History of Creation," "The Evolution of Man," "The Riddle of the Universe," etc.

Of highest importance are these latest thoughts of Professor Haeckel, which embody the ideas of a Monist philosopher and Humanitarian Freethinker on War, Religion, and the nature and origin of Man. The conclusions of the evolutionists on these questions are restated, emphasized and strengthened. Apart from severely scoring the hypocrisy of nations that profess to be followers of a Prince of Peace, and yet enter upon wars of conquest and make arms and munitions their trade, what the author has to say on the merits of the parties to the present war is given in an appendix. In the main he confines himself closely to the themes indicated—science, religion and humanity. He rejects utterly the Christian scheme of this world or any other.

Cloth, $1.25 net.

THE TRUTH SEEKER COMPANY

62 Vesey Street, New York

SELF-CONTRADICTIONS OF THE BIBLE. By W. H. Burr. One hundred and forty-four propositions embodying the most palpable and striking contradictions. Price 15 cents.

News of the Week.

The American mission, headed by Elihu Root, has arrived at Petrograd.

All the prisoners in the Irish rebellion of Easter Sunday, 1916, will be released without reservation.

There are 4,662,000 alien enemies now resident in the United States—nearly 5 per cent. of the total population of the country.

Cheering crowds greeted Major Gen. J. J. Pershing both when he set foot on French soil at Boulogne June 13, and as he drove through the streets of Paris.

Madame Terese Carreno, one of the most famous of woman pianists, died June 12 at her home in New York, after a long illness, at the age of sixty-three years.

The Italian cabinet is being reorganized with a view to securing a more harmonious combination of official factors and to assure a more vigorous prosecution of the war.

The Right Rev. James Augustin McFaul, the notorious Catholic bishop of the diocese of Trenton, N. J., died June 16, at the age of 67 years.

Belgian civilians interned in a German camp near Luebeck refused to work. Out of 2,000 interned 500 died of starvation in three months. The condition of the survivors is described as pitiful.

George Baillie-Hamilton Arden, eleventh Earl of Haddington, died June 11. He was eighty-nine years old, owned about 34,000 acres, and had been representative peer for Scotland since 1874.

The United States government has awarded to the Winchester Repeating Arms company at New Haven, Conn., a contract for 320,000,000 small arms cartridges. It involves the expenditure of $100,000,000.

An additional $25,000,000 was loaned by the government to Great Britain June 14, bringing the total British loan up to $500,000,000, and the total for all the Allies up to $948,000,000.

In less than two hours, three and a quarter inches of rain flooded the streets of New York, June 14. It was one of the heaviest storms in the forty-seven years of the Weather Bureau's existence.

During a heavy storm June 14, lightning struck one of the mills of the Hercules Powder company, at Schaghticoke, N. Y. The building was blown to atoms, but there were no fatalities.

Constantine I, king of the Greeks, in response to the demand of the protecting powers—France, Great Britain and Russia—abdicated June 12 in favor of his second son, Prince Alexander.

Max Holtz, a Chicago publisher who had been missing from the Hotel Biltmore, New York, since June 8, was found lying in a puddle of water at Tuckahoe and Bronxville roads in Yonkers, N. Y., June 14.

The American Commission for Relief in Belgium announced June 16 that since June 7 eleven of their ships, carrying an aggregate of 50,000 tons of foodstuffs, have arrived at Rotterdam.

The famous German club, the gathering place of the Germans of Yokohama, Japan, has been closed by the government. This is one result of the newly promulgated ordinance preventing communications with enemy subjects.

Full pay at $100 a month for all National Guardsmen attending reserve officers' training camps was promised by the War Department June 13, thus correcting the present discrimination against Guardsmen as compared with ordinary civilians.

At least 20,000 persons are living in the streets and parks of San Salvador, destitute and without food and shelter, as a result of the earthquake and volcanic eruption. The situation is made worse by the fact that the rainy season has just set in.

With returns from six states missing, the war registration total June 14 stood at 8,839,582, or 93.5 per cent. of the census estimate of 9,552,641 eligibles in the forty-two states reported and the District of Columbia.

Louis Kramer and Morris Becker, avowed anarchists and "citizens of the world," were found guilty by a jury in the United States Court June 12 of conspiracy to violate the Selective Draft law by trying to induce young men not to register.

Three thousand Germans in New York city, known to have been active in propaganda before this country entered the war, and who have applied for permits to allow them within the barred zones, will be informed they can not receive them.

Emma Goldman and Alexander Berkman, considered by the authorities to be the two most dangerous anarchists in the United States, were arrested June 16 in the office of Mother Earth, and held under $25,000 each.

Francisco Villa, according to report from El Paso, Tex., is now advancing upon Chihuahua City, Mexico, having captured the city of Santa Rosalia, massacring the garrison there, and defeating a large Carranza force before reaching Santa Rosalia.

New York's contribution to Evangelist Sunday's "free-will" graft is $113,000, making $725,000 in the past seven years. The evangelist closed his "campaign" Sunday evening. There was a considerable display of enthusiasm in the next morning's papers.

The official report of the minister of agriculture on the crop situation in France to June 1 shows a great improvement over the report of April 1. Fine weather seems to have repaired much of the ravages of the severe winter on wheat, while the acreage of potatoes is greater than last year and growing under excellent conditions.

Werner Horn, who declared himself an officer of the German Landwehr, was found guilty in the Federal Court at Boston, Mass., on a charge of unlawfully transporting dynamite in interstate commerce. Horn was arrested in February, 1915, after an attempt to blow up the international bridge at Vanceboro, Me.

President Wilson has decided that the food situation confronting the United States admits of no further delay, and has given Herbert C. Hoover, the proposed food administrator, "full authority to take any steps necessary" for the organization of the women of the country and for co-operation with all men engaged in the distribution of foods.

The body of Ruth Cruger, the 18-year-old girl who disappeared on Feb. 13 of this year from her home in New York, was found June 16 buried five feet deep under two floors, one of wood and one of cement, in the basement of the motorcycle shop at 542 West 127th street, New York, owned by Alfredo Cocchi, who fled on Feb. 15, and is now in Bologna, Italy.

President Wilson affixed his signature June 15 to two important war measures—the Espionage bill, a sweeping measure designed to punish spies and to defend the United States against the intrigues of enemies and enemy sympathizers, and the War Budget bill, appropriating $3,000,000,000 for the first instalment of army, navy and shipping contracts necessary for the war. The measure went into effect immediately.

A special American supplement of the Novoe Vremya, a Russian daily, made its appearance June 15, apparently out of compliance to the American commission. The cover represented an American flag with a medallion of Washington as an inset. The title page carried a large portrait of President Wilson flanked by smaller portraits of Secretaries Baker and Daniels and a photographic reproduction of the White House.

THE WAR

Austria has called to the colors all of her boys 17 years old.

Two of five hostile seaplanes sighted by a trawler of the Dover patrol June 12 were destroyed by the British craft.

Italian forces have carried Corno Cavento, a strongly fortified Austrian position in the Eastern Trentino.

General Cadorna swung his offensive to the Trentino region June 12 and struck the Austrians heavily at widely separated points.

The British armed merchant cruiser Avenger was torpedoed and sunk in the North Sea, June 13. All but one were saved.

The American sailing vessel Magnus Manson has been sunk by a German submarine. She was sent down after the crew had left her.

The Japanese steamer Tansan Maru, which left Boston May 9 for Manchester, England, has been sunk by a German submarine.

Several thousand women are digging trenches for the Italian soldiers along the Austrian front. Altogether, the Italian War Department employs 72,324 women, many of whom are in munition factories.

Entente forces are now landing at the Greek ports of Piraeus and Castella. Some of the troops are occupying the heights near Phalerus Bay, while others are marching to Athens.

The Norwegian Foreign Office reports that the Norwegian steamships Soerland, of 2,472 tons gross; Tordenvore, of 1,565 tons gross, and Bricid have been sunk by German submarines.

German airplanes June 13 made the deadliest raid of the war on London, killing ninety-seven persons and wounding 437, largely women and school children.

The British moved forward again June 12 southeast of Messines, in Flanders, and captured another mile of enemy trench system, seven field pieces and a number of prisoners.

One hundred and ninety-nine persons are missing out of 550 passengers aboard the French steamship Sequana, torpedoed and sunk in the Atlantic. Some of those missing are Senegalese soldiers.

The War Office announced June 16 that French cavalry had occupied five towns in northern Thessaly, while the infantry has reached Vole in its advance south.

The armed American tank steamship Moreni, of the Standard Oil Company's fleet, after a spectacular running fight with a German submarine lasting for two hours, was sunk on the morning of June 12.

The one boat of the steamer Petrolite which made shore after the ship was destroyed by a German submarine contained the first and second officers, three naval gunners, two wireless operators and eleven of the crew.

The British forces June 15 delivered an attack upon and captured further portions of the Hindenburg line northwest of Bullecourt, despite the resistance of the Germans, who suffered heavy casualties.

Retirement of the German forces at two points on the front in Belgium is reported. The Germans were pressed back by the British between Hollebeke and the region of the River Douve and also southwest of Warneton.

The action begun by the Italians on the Trentino high plateau of the Alpine front is proceeding at an altitude of 7,000 feet amid stormy atmospheric conditions. The fighting is along the same front where the Italians stopped the Austrian invasion a year ago.

Another instalment of the vanguard of the American army has arrived in France in the form of 150 ambulance drivers and 75 nurses. Preceded by a British military band they marched through the streets to their quarters, amid the enthusiastic cheers of the population.

Fort Saliff, a Turkish stronghold on the Red Sea, has fallen before a British naval attack. The capitulation took place June 12, after a three-hour battle, and yielded ninety-four prisoners, two mountain guns, three machine guns and the entire harbor plant, at the cost of one British life.

British captures since the beginning of the battle for the Messines-Wytschaete Ridge, June 7, total 7,432 prisoners, including 145 officers, and forty-seven guns, 242 machine guns and sixty trench mortars. This brings the number of German prisoners taken by the Allies since the opening of their West front offensive in April up to more than 61,000.

Lectures and Meetings

The New York Secular Society. Mr. Irving Meirowitz and Mr. Nicholas Mitichuly of this society will speak at Thirty-seventh street and Broadway every Wednesday and Saturday night; and at 137th street and Broadway every Thursday night.

The Clarksburg (W. Va.) Rationalist Society holds its next meeting in the Auditorium of the Waldo Hotel Sunday, June 24, at 1.30 p. m.

A good lecture and musical program is being arranged for this meeting. The only business before the society will be the adoption of the new Constitution and By-Laws, so an afternoon of high-class instruction and entertainment is promised.

For further information write the Secretary, G. A. Miller, 644 S. 7th St., Clarksburg, W. Va.

The Rationalist Society of Toledo, Ohio, meets in the Arcade Bldg., Room 133, St. Clair and Jackson sts., Wednesday evenings at 8.

The Chicago Freethought Society meets in Corinthian Hall, Masonic Temple, Sunday mornings, at 11 o'clock; H. Percy Ward, lecturer.

The Freethought Congregation of Cedar Rapids, Iowa, meets every second Sunday of the month at the C. S. P. S. Hall, corner Eleventh Avenue and Third Street; Jos. J. Hajek, Speaker.

The Columbus Rationalist Association meets the second and fourth Tuesday evening of each month, 7.30 P. M., at the Hotel Vendome, Third street, opposite State House. O. C. Weatherby, president; Olin J. Ross, 23 East State street, Columbus, O., secretary.

The Friendship Liberal League, (Inc.) of Philadelphia, meets every Sunday at 2.30 and 7.30, at 1417 Columbia avenue. Open platform. The Truth Seeker and liberal literature on sale. F. Garfield Bowers, secretary, 245 N. Ninth street.

The Milwaukee Rationalist Society meets every Friday evening in Convention Hall, Republican House. Joel Rubin, Pres., 9, 10 Cawker Bldg.

The Denver Rationalist Association meets the first and third Thursday of each month at 319 Kirtledge Building; Olive Oliver, president.

The Meetings of the Independent Lectureship of San Francisco, Walter

Holloway, Rationalist and Lecturer, are held every Sunday night at 8 o'clock, at Golden Gate Commandery, 2135 Sutter Street, San Francisco, Cal.

The Toledo Rationalist Society meets every Wednesday evening at 8, Room 133, Arcade Building, St. Clair and Jackson streets. W. M. Braun, secretary. Speakers, Dr. Rullison, J. Carl, J. Braun and K. Pauli.

Tacoma Rationalist Society, meets every Sunday at 3 p. m. in Maccabees Hall, 1109 Broadway, Tacoma, Wash. S. T. Hammersmark, Secy., Colonial Hotel.

The Ferrer Association holds public meetings at the Ferrer Centre, 63 East 107th street, New York, every Saturday and Sunday evening.

The Detroit Society of Truth Seekers (Lithuanian) meets the second Sunday of every month at 2 P. M. in C. O. F. Hall, Chene, cor. Trombly st.; Karl Rutkus, organizer, 338 West End ave., Detroit, Mich.

The Detroit Freethought Association and the Toledo Rationalist Society will hold a joint picnic at the Piers, a park at Monroe, Michigan, on Sunday, July 22, 1917.

The secular organization of Kansas City, Mo., heretofore known as The Church of This World, has changed its name to The Rationalist Society of Kansas City, Mo., and has taken out papers of incorporation under that title. The meetings of the new society will be held in Apollo Hall, Kansas City, beginning with next October. Dr. John E. Roberts will continue as lecturer.

Sinai and Olympus

Parallels in Heathen Myth and Hebrew Scripture.

By a Texas Pagan.

PICTURES BY RYAN WALKER.

This is a lecture by a Texas Pagan, which has been illustrated by another. The text is what the title describes, a comparison of the heathen myths with the Hebrew tales told in scripture. The illustrations are exquisite bits of satire and wit, made by a genius with the pencil, and each is a gem. Text and pictures together, the book is certainly one of the wittiest ever produced, while the information it contains is solid and reliable. It will be a source of pleasure to every Liberal, and is at the same time a splendid Freethought lecture. We guarantee its quality from start to finish. 115 large octavo pages, 75 illustrations. Illuminated cover, fine paper. Price, 50 cents

SHORT HISTORY OF THE INQUISITION. Illustrated with about 100 pictures of the instruments of torture used upon heretics; auto-da-fe scenes, etc. Nearly 800 pp., including pictures. Large 12mo. Price, $2.00.

Here we have not only the story of the Inquisition, but chapters on the Persecution of the Jews, Expulsion of the Moors from Spain, The Crusaders, The Popes and the Inquisition, Persecution of the Waldenses, Persecution of the Albigenses, Persecution of the Huguenots, The Jesuits, The Killing of Witches, The War Between Religion and Science, and The Attitude of the Church Toward Slavery. There are more particulars about the Inquisition than any other one volume contains, and as the work has been written from a Freethought point of view, there has been no attempt to conceal the responsibility of religion and the church for the horrors and infamies of the institution. The chapter on the War between Religion and Science is full and inclusive. The attitude of the church toward Slavery will be a revelation to many readers. The presentation of the subject in this book is unique.

THE GREAT INFIDELS

A Lecture by Robert G. Ingersoll

"Have all the clergymen, monks, friars, ministers, bishops, priests, cardinals and popes, from the day of Pentecost to the last election, done as much for humanity as Thomas Paine? As much for Science as Charles Darwin? What would the world be if Infidels had never been?"—Ingersoll.

Price, 25 cents.

THE TRUTH SEEKER CO.

WHAT WE OFFER IN EXCHANGE. By W. A. Croffut. "If you take away my religion, what will you give in its place?" 5 cents.

THE TRUTH SEEKER

A Freethought and Agnostic Newspaper.

Vol. 44.—No. 26.

PUBLISHED
WEEKLY

New York, June 30, 1917.

62 VESEY
STREET

$3.00 Per Year

VALUE OF SKEPTICISM

Evidenced by the Fact That the Ages of Progress Are the Ages of Unbelief.

BY RICHARD ELLSWORTH.

MANKIND is today considering, as it has never considered before, the intrinsic merits of skepticism as contrasted with the weakness of present-day Christianity as the latter appears in connection with the great European war, now in progress. The old disposition on the part of believers to look with indifference, if not with contempt, upon the skeptical Agnostic because of his having dissociated himself from religion, no longer holds the conspicuous place in religious thought of a few decades ago. The failure of the church and Christian people in general, from the pope, the Pontifex Maximus of Roman Catholicism, to the influential burgomaster of a pious German community, to lift the individual voice in determined protestation against the greatest crime of the centuries, has altered completely men's estimate of religion, and their aspect regarding the essential qualities of truth. And when there is added to this the awful fact, that amid the prayers and heart-rending appeals to a beneficent God by those bound by a covenant to love and serve him, that he would show his hand and stay the bloody slaughter, there was none that heard and none that answered, the cup of bitterness was filled to overflowing, and the minds thus freed started to think anew, and each mind for itself.

The history of skepticism has everywhere demonstrated that as a method of mental activity it has always been on the side of growth, and in accord with those conditions which aimed at the improvement of human society. Religion itself has been greatly benefited by the spirit of doubt, not only because of the changes which the church felt compelled to make in its general policy as the result of skeptical criticism, but also because of the repealing of certain laws injurious to the various denominations of Christians in their intercourse with one another, in consequence of the tolerant indifference of skepticism. Science, likewise, is the child of skepticism. The wonderful results of scientific investigations, well-known to the most thoughtful among mankind, are plainly not the result of the religious spirit, but the outcome of the labors of those who dared to face the curses and punishments of the church by doubting its traditional tales and impossible theology. The progress that we witness today in the development of the natural sciences is due entirely to the fearless heroism of those first noble spirits, who, regardless of the fiendish machinations of a cruel church, were not afraid to speak the sublime truth of Nature as testified to by Nature's unerring laws.

Every religion changes. There are many conditions which enter into and cause such changes; but it is not an uncommon thing in the presence of such modifications for believers to belie the source of them, and to attribute the improvements in society to the benign influence of religion, when the truth of the situation is, the best phases of modern civilization have reverted to the benefit of the church. The Christian church of our day bears little resemblance to what has been called the primitive church. As the church in its progress through the centuries gathered to itself many an aspect of theologic thought and ritual which can plainly be traced to a pagan origin, so likewise, when brought in contact with a purer civilization, did it drop some of its unpopular doctrines and usages, while at the same time arrogating to itself the best to be found in the newest civic life. Religions do not die; they change, passing from one phase to another: but because of this instability on the part of the religious organization, the historian is able to trace the source of a religion by virtue of the elements which it has retained of the religion or religions which preceded it.

One religion is always a modification of the religion which it supplants. There is no such thing as a revealed religion, occupying a unique position in the plain of pious thought. One religion grows naturally out of another, being influenced for better or for worse by its accidental environment, very much as language grows and tends to improve under the sway of an intelligent people. It may be, therefore, that no religion as constituted at any particular time will die a sudden death, but its gradual extinction will appear from the fact that its distinctive features are ever in a state of flux, with the result, that eventually few if any of its earlier characteristics are to be found remaining. This is the way in which religions pass away; under the dominance of a higher and nobler conception of life they are gradually transformed, until, after the lapse of centuries, they lose completely all the marks that identified them in their initial days.

The value of Skepticism to religion is first seen in the greatly altered opinion which men today hold regarding the book called the Bible. About the middle of the seventeenth century Spinoza, the great Monist philosopher, put forth his learned work, "Tractatus Theologico-Politicus," which was the first modern rationalistic critique of the Scriptures. To this great man is due the honor of having first called the attention of the thinking part of the world to the inconsistencies and contradictions of the so-called "divine revelation." Since his day, how wonderful has been the progress in biblical criticism! Narratives and incidents that at one time were accepted all over the Christian world as actual occurrences under the surveillance of a divine providence, are today viewed as mythological tales borrowed from Babylonian or Egyptian traditions. Even the story of the Fall of Adam, upon which hangs the theory of the redemption wrought by Christ, is treated by many learned theological writers of distinction as being a "pure myth with a heavenly import." On every side we hear Christians apologizing for the Old Testament in the matter of war and revenge and hatred, the spoils system, murder of children and ruthless destruction of property; they are now beginning to say that they do not stand sponsor for the Old Testament morality, for Christianity is based upon the New Testament and not upon the Old. Man's humanity, under the influence of Skepticism, has revolted against Old-Testament barbarism, and, therefore, he has attempted to dissociate the Old Testament from Christianity. The reason why Christians of every shade of theological opinion are now desirous of putting the Old Testament in the background is because they are outgrowing their Christianity. Under the impulse given to the higher critics of biblical literature through the labors of advanced skeptical thinkers, the ancient conception of the Bible has been completely modified, making obvious to all the fact that it was not the despised skeptic that was false in his judgment, but the proud and arrogant believer. Skepticism has been proved right in all of its criticism of the Bible, and Faith wrong. The gain resulting from this decision has been incalculable to the world.

Let us now turn to theology and learn for what Skepticism counts in this department of religion. Theology, like religion itself, is a changing factor in the matter of human thought and experience. Not being a science—though theologians have always claimed that it is, notwithstanding it has no scientific data from which to argue—it has followed the history of all metaphysical adventures, and been dependent upon the judgment of the individual thinker or of a school of thinkers such as the Franciscans or the Benedictines of the Romish church.

The fact that theology has more frequently than otherwise borne the name of an individual exponent, as for instance the name of St. Augustine, Liguori, Calvin or Wesley, is sufficient evidence of a doubt surrounding the question of theology as an assured revelation from God. There are, however, certain fundamental articles of Christian belief which are quite generally accepted by Christians, and which are gradually yielding themselves to the spirit of Skepticism; I refer to the doctrines of God, the immortality of the soul, and the belief in a place of eternal punishment. The work accomplished by honest doubt in these phases of Faith has been most signal both within the church and among those who owe the church no allegiance. Take first the doctrine of hell. One hundred years ago this hideous tenet of religion was preached in every church and chapel throughout the country. It was the great stock-argument of the preacher by which he hoped to win souls to Christ. To picture unbelieving human beings burning forever in hell to the spiritual delight of the redeemed in heaven, and to the endless praise of the perfect justice of God, brought peculiar satisfaction to the preachers of the time of Jonathan Edwards. What has wrought the change in respect to this doctrine since those pious days? Why is it that few of the churches today ever refer to this inhuman conception of a future existence? Why is it that among Christians themselves the doctrine now is held in disgust, so much so that, when a notorious Christian evangelist sought to revive it in many communities of the land, he was listened to by a large number of curiosity-loving persons because he was amusing, but who looked upon his hell-fire proposal as merely a joke—certainly something to be laughed at?

Here again we are met by the mind-refreshing efforts of the skeptical thinkers of every age. Such a doctrine, cries the honest skeptic, is an insult to frail human nature, and a complete violation of every species of justice as conceived by the human heart and mind. It cannot be possible that any being of whom men speak as a wise and holy God could conceive such an awful type of punishment for the sinner of a day—a sinner that merited pardon and reformation rather than vengeance and a lake of fire! Men are only now beginning to appreciate what horrors of thought have been removed from human experience by the eliminating of the Christian doctrines of an endless hell and a vindictive God. The number of those who in the past have had their lives darkened and their earthly prospects filled with fear because of the false teaching of the existence of God and hell, no living man can tell. It is not, then, a matter of surprise to any thoughtful man that under the effect of such opinions, persons, rather than ally themselves with these banal crudities of thought, have given up wholly any desire for a personal immortality, preferring the rest of an endless sleep to a future companionship with a god of war and cruel hate, and a society whose chief enjoyment is to praise him forever. It is Skepticism that has gained for the world this precious satisfaction. It is Skepticism that has blotted out God and hell forever, and has put in their place human love and a happy residence on this earth, which have now become the honest man's supreme hope.

Let us now turn to human governments and note the effect upon them of the results of Skepticism.

With the principle of divine sovereignty over the operations of the universe came the idea of the divine right of kings. In virtue of this notion every nation of the old world has at some time groaned under the weight of an unscrupulous imperialism. Wherever the hand of democracy has been raised in opposition to this false system of government, it has always been met by the God-commissioned ruler with the sword of persecution and death. Wherever the voice of democracy has made itself heard above the mandates of absolutism, there it was that men were burned at the stake, all their property confiscated, and their wives and children left desolate to the mercy of the stranger or the ravages of wild beasts.

The greatest abettor of unconstitutional authority, of unlimited monarchism, was the so-called "Church of the Living God." From the earliest ages the church coupled itself with the dominant state authority, and tried to share with it in controlling the destiny of mankind both in this world and in that which was supposed to follow when life here was ended. No doctrine has proved more injurious to the right of free speech and free thought, to the privilege of free assembly for personal education and communal advancement, than that system of state government which claims to hail from God. The general unrest in Russia today, though the yoke of servitude has been broken, is a realistic picture of the evil results of a heaven-born government backed by a God-inspired church. When the minds of a people have become so thoroughly unbalanced by centuries of serfdom that they do not know how to use their liberty when it is fully granted them, one can begin to understand dimly the oppressive character of oligarchism, and the inestimable benefits of a well-ordered democracy. These benefits are the fruits of Skepticism; for until men learned to doubt the idea that kings were divinely commissioned, they made no effort to better their political state.

The blessings that have accrued to the world in the matters of human health and sanitation as the result of men's doubts and unbelief have been great and enduring. The religious notion that men were to be healed of their diseases by prayer to God while neglecting the most ordinary rules of hygiene and sanitation; that disease found an embodiment in the being of an evil spirit or demon, which must first be exorcised before recovery could be hoped for, was one of the most marked conditions that contributed to keep the people in ignorance, and to narrow the possibilities of the nations becoming numerous and well-constituted. Modern science, the offspring of doubt, has accomplished wonders for the modern world in maintaining the nations in good health, and providing for their quick recovery when assailed by sickness. Religion, in this regard, has done nothing. To illustrate the hold that the old régime concerning the healing of disease has still upon the practices, in this regard, of some religionists, we have only to point to the society of Christian Science, and to other bodies of fake-healers, who because of their constant failure to fulfill their promises, frequently fall under the ban of the civil authority. It is the advance of knowledge brought about by sincere doubt which has rendered the idea of satanic agency, through the medium of demoniacal possession, grotesquely ridiculous. For more than fifteen hundred years the belief in demons and witchcraft was universal in Christendom. The public mind was saturated with the idea of satanic agency in the economy of nature. If we ask why the world now rejects what was once so unquestionably believed, we can only reply that advancing knowledge, originating in a spirit of Skepticism, has gradually undermined the belief. At least, we may plead that unbelief has healed the bleeding feet of science and made the road free for her upward march.

I will not here dwell upon the great good accomplished for the world by the abolition of slavery. There is not a darker page in the history of Christianity than that which records the sad effects of the system of slavery as practiced by that religion for many hundreds of years. "Century followed century, and the church never raised its voice against slavery as an institution. It excommunicated heretics, but not slaveholders. Christian divines invariably justified slavery from scripture." All the great saints of the church taught that slavery is a divine institution. Christian jurists, even in the eighteenth century, defended negro slavery, which it was reserved for the skeptical Montesquieu and the arch-heretic Voltaire to condemn. It has been rightly said that "the first public act against slavery came from republican France, in the madness of atheistic enthusiasm."

The gain to the world through the disbelief in witchcraft and wizardry has also been valuable and impressive. Professor Huxley writes that "the belief in demoniacal possession and witchcraft gave rise in the fifteenth, sixteenth, and seventeenth centuries, to persecutions by Christians of innocent men, women and children, more extensive, more cruel, and more murderous than any to which the Christians of the first three centuries were subjected by the authorities of pagan Rome." The statute 1 James I., c. 12, condemned to death "all persons invoking any evil spirits, or consulting, covenanting with, entertaining, employing, feeding, or rewarding any evil spirit," or generally practicing any "infernal arts." This was not repealed until the eighteenth century was far advanced. Had the electrical and other inventors of today lived three hundred years ago, their works would have insured for them the "gift" of martyrdom.

The changed conditions touching the care and management of the insane, which is a marked feature of our modern civilization, may very properly be attributed to the growth of learning regarding the true nature of their complaint growing out of a feeling of doubt as to the medieval opinion in their case. For centuries, under Christianity, mental disease was most ignorantly treated. Exorcism, shackles, and the whip were the penalties, rather than the curatives, for mental maladies. From the heretical departure of Pinel, the eminent French physician, who completely reformed the old method of dealing with the mentally unbalanced at the opening of the nineteenth century, to the position of Maudesley in the twentieth, every step illustrates the march of unbelief. The Christian church did nothing for these unfortunate people. Her knowledge of such cases for purposes of healing was equally inadequate with her knowledge of many another phase of human life, and of the natural universe about her. She appeared to be well-informed concerning the operation of the forces of the celestial world which she had never seen, but knew little or nothing concerning the natural world, the forces governing which were a matter of daily observation. Modern study of the laws of health, experiments in sanitary improvements, more careful application of medical knowledge, have proved more efficacious in preventing or diminishing diseases of various kinds, and the evil results which naturally follow a squalid manner of living, than all the intercessions sent up to heaven by a hired body of mercenary priests.

Those who today hold the old faith that prayer will suffice to cure disease, are looked upon as an eccentric people, and, as I have said, are occasionally indicted for manslaughter, when their sick children die, because the parents have trusted to God instead of appealing to the resources of science.

Great fear had been imparted to the life of our ancestors by the childish yet fatal idea that war, plagues, famine, and all the convulsive operations of nature such as earthquakes and volcanic eruptions were the visible expressions of the wrath of an angry God. In their pious fear of God they left no place for the workings on a natural basis of the essential functions of a great and wonderful universe. They looked upon God as a personal being of gigantic power and vision enthroned in majesty and state somewhere outside our visible planetary system, but controlling arbitrarily all the forces of nature at his will. When men opposed his wishes he pulled the cord which opened up the floodgates of volcanic eruptions, or unloosed the bars which held the earth stable so that it trembled into a gaping earthquake; or he broke up the fountains of the great deep so that the land ran with rivers of water, or unlocked the cave of the winds so that they blew into a mighty cyclone, which carried before it death and destruction. This explanation of natural events is still held by many pious and even learned Christians of our own day. But thanks to the power of science to discover the truth of nature, and the courage displayed by Skepticism to honor its labors, every honest inquirer may learn today that nature follows in its revelations of power as well as of beauty a system of orderly arrangement which knows nothing about an arbitrary will or a plan of operation based upon feeling or sentiment. Thanks to the skeptical spirit we are now learning how to anticipate some of the more harmful phases of nature's functioning, and to guard against their serious effects by following the suggestions proposed by scientific enlightenment.

The claim, then, made by Christians that all the good things included in the civilization of our day are the direct result of the great worth hidden in the nature of the Christian religion, is entirely false. The situation is somewhat complicated, it is true, for many persons associated with modern progress make some profession of Christianity; but whatever such persons have accomplished for the benefit of the race has not been because of their religion but rather in spite of their religion. For it will be found upon investigation that wherever they are in accord with the results of Skepticism and the natural sciences, they are distinctly out of accord with the traditions of their religion. The late Mr. W. E. Gladstone, when writing of the effect produced upon the Roman world by the introduction of Christianity, makes this statement: "Christianity changed profoundly the relation of the rich to the poor. It abolished slavery, abolished human sacrifice, abolished gladiatorial shows, and a multitude of other horrors. It restored the position of woman in society. It proscribed polygamy; and put down divorce, absolutely in the West, though not absolutely in the East. It made peace, instead of war, the normal and presumed relation between human societies." Likewise Guizot, in his "European Civilization," endeavors to make out a case for Christianity in the matter of the abolition of slavery; but these views are but the Christian side of the matter, and by no means tell the complete story as revealed in the investigations of more recent and less interested writers.

All the improvements in life as we witness them today are the offspring of civilization, not of religion. "Why was there so little civilization in Europe when Christianity was supreme? Why did Europe wait so long for the advent of what we call 'progress'? Why was every new idea baptized in blood? Why was every reform opposed by the church of Christ? Why have Skepticism and civilization moved forward with an equal pace? Why does Christianity fade as men become wiser and happier? Why is this age of progress the age of unbelief?" To answer these questions and others with the old plea that Christianity without a doubt has been the cause of all men's happiness today, but the spirit of persecution which lurks in unbelief is unwilling to give the credit where it is justly due, is to waive entirely all the unquestioned results of scientific discovery, as well as to lay the reproach for the evil practices of religion at the door of science and honest Skepticism. This Christianity would be glad to do; but thinking men of today are too well informed to insure such a falsehood passing muster with any but the most stupid and superstitious. All good men are now well acquainted with the distinguished value of Skepticism to Humanity.

Miracles Unknown to Paul.

From the enormous circulation of the Bible persistently boasted of by the churches as still the biggest of the "best sellers"—a result fraudulently arrived at by sale at less than cost, free distribution, etc.—it must be realized that the best fight that can be made against superstitious error is through the demolition of its authority as divine revelation.

My most recent discovery is that Paul practically disproves all the miracles of Christ; showing that, like the miraculous conception, they were invented after the time he wrote.

In 1 Cor. xv, 20, 23, and Rom. xi, 16, Paul by insisting on Christ being "the first fruits of them that slept," and necessarily so that the "first fruits be holy," disproves the miracles of the raising of Lazarus and Jairus' daughter; and in disproving these greatest of miracles practically renders all the others fabulous.

His "interpreter" Luke, the supposed writer of Acts, also in xxvi, 23, distinctly confirms it.

As the miracles were originally relied on to prove Christ's divinity, this fact goes a long way in annihilating this superstition. A. T.

"It may come as a matter of surprise to many," says the Catholic Citizen, "to hear that the late governor-general of Belgium, General von Bissing, who died recently, was a Catholic." In view of the atrocities of Von Bissing's rule in Belgium, we should suppose the above information would come to Catholics as a matter of shame and regret. Had the Prussian general been an unbeliever, we should feel a strong temptation not to mention the fact.

As an old German soldier is reported to have said: "There is no God in the trenches." Perhaps his remark could be extended with truth to "There is no God in artillery." And if there is a God anywhere in war a man of any feeling for his brother-man would say: "Better to have peace without God than to have war with God." There seems to be no God anywhere in the world to-day, except where men and women haven't brains enough to think.

A certain amount of opposition is a great help to a man; it is what he wants and must have to be good for anything.—John Neal.

Experience does take dreadfully high school-wages, but he teaches like no other.—Carlyle.

THE EVER-ADMIRABLE PAINE

Generous Praise of the Author-Hero Comes from a Member of an Orthodox Church.

It is late to express an appreciation of a patriot of our Revolution, but not too late when he is still maligned and vilified as no other American patriot has ever been. A living historical writer has dubbed him a "filthy little Atheist," and such he is commonly considered by the ignorant. This reputation began with the publication of his criticism of the Bible, which was couched in rather strong language, but no stronger than that in which theologians of his day attacked each other. His assailants have long since become reconciled to each other in a degree, but they have never forgiven Paine. At the beginning of his "Age of Reason" he declares his creed: "I believe in one God and no more; and I hope for happiness beyond this life." If that be Atheism, then I, a member of an orthodox church, am an Atheist, and so is the distinguished author of the cruel gibe quoted. He continues his creed. "I believe the equality of man and I believe that religious duties consist in doing justice, loving mercy, and endeavoring to make our fellow-creatures happy." Few men have been truer to their creeds than was Thomas Paine to his. His motto was, "The world is my country and to do good is my religion." Franklin once said, "Where Freedom is there is my home." Said Paine, "Where Freedom is not, there is mine."

Paine came to this country in the late fall of 1774. The colonies were in the throes of impending revolution. They were demanding their political rights. Paine's sense of justice impelled him to write, within three months of his arrival, an essay against slavery in which he mentioned the inconsistency of the demands of the colonists when they themselves were holding human beings as slaves. The following May he published a protest against dueling. In August of the same year, 1775, he issued the first American plea for the rights of woman. In the summer of 1776 Paine enlisted in the American army. He had taken the oath of allegiance to the state of Pennsylvania and was an American citizen. In the meantime his pen was not idle. His correspondence with Franklin, Jefferson and others revealed an understanding of the times and of the needs of the colonies unsurpassed by anyone. His published writings did much to prepare the people for independence. It was his hope that the coming Declaration of Independence should include a provision for the emancipation of the slaves, but he was too much in advance of his time.

In the continental army he was a soldier by day and a pamphleteer by night. Under these conditions his first "Crisis" was written. Its opening paragraph ranks high in patriotic utterances.

"These are the times that try men's souls. The summer soldier and the sunshine patriot will, in this crisis, shrink from the service of his country; but he that stands it now deserves the love and thanks of man and woman. Tyranny, like hell, is not easily conquered; yet we have this consolation with us, that the harder the conflict the more glorious the triumph; what we obtain too cheap we esteem too lightly; 'tis dearness only that gives everything its value. Heaven knows how to put a proper price upon its goods, and it would be strange indeed if so celestial a thing as Freedom should not be highly rated."

The soldiers of Washington read the stirring words and, with their commander and the author, marched to victory at Trenton. Other "Crises" appeared, were published, inspired the weary soldiers of the American army, and brought profit to the publishers, but none to the author.

It was Paine who first proposed obtaining financial aid from France. He gave up his salaried position, went to France with Colonel Laurens, brought back money and supplies to the value of six million livres, paid his own bills and received nothing in return. The value of Paine's services to the young republic have been too well attested by Washington, Franklin, Jefferson, Adams, Madison and others to be slightly considered now. Paine was one of the first to suggest independence and he was one of the first to urge a stronger federal government. His efforts in this line were by no means slight.

The war over, a stable government on its way to realization, Paine sailed for Europe. He carried with him a model of his recently invented iron arch bridge to be submitted to the French Academy of Sciences. He was soon after in his old home at Thetford, England, on a visit to his aged mother. There, as in France, he was received with honor. A crisis in the governmental affairs of his native country called forth his "Rights of Man," with speeches in favor of popular liberty, and he became an outlaw. Before the English courts succeeded in hanging him, however, the National Assembly of France made him a French citizen; three different departments elected him deputy to the Convention, and he sailed for France.

The most trying portion of his life was to come. His vote and influence were always opposed to violence. He persistently voted against the death of the king. His argument that, as a matter of policy, no less than of humanity, it was better to keep the king alive as a hostage, while abolishing the office, fell on deaf ears. The Mountain gradually gained control, and the reign of terror began. It is fitting here to transcribe a portion of a letter by Lord Edward Fitzgerald to his mother, written October 30, 1792: "I lodge with my friend Paine—we breakfast, dine and sup together. The more I see of his interior the more I like and respect him. I cannot express how kind he is to me; there is a simplicity of manner, a goodness of heart and a strength of mind in him that I never knew a man possess."

It was an opinion that was duplicated by all his friends to the last. A Captain Grimstone of England, in a controversy with Paine at a dinner party, lost his temper and struck him a violent blow. Death was the penalty for striking a deputy, and Paine had difficulty in securing a passport for his assailant, paying his expenses to England from his own funds.

The king was beheaded. The sight of blood was crazing. The Mountain was supreme. Citizens and deputies made a short stop at prison on their way to the scaffold. Paine's turn came at last. However, he remained in prison for ten months and escaped the guillotine. His appeals for help to Gouverneur Morris, American minister to France, were ignored for the ostensible reason that he was not an American citizen! With the advent of Monroe as minister Paine's release was secured without difficulty. He was recalled to the Convention and remained in Paris till the triumphant return of Napoleon from Italy.

It was 1802 before he again saw his beloved America. Applause and abuse contended for ascendancy in public prints. His last years were passed on his farm in New Rochelle, given him by the state of New York as payment of her debt to him for his Revolutionary efforts. June 8, 1809, marked the end of the earthly life of Thomas Paine.

He has been accused of debauchery and the vilest vices by his enemies. They have never presented proofs of their statements and have apparently judged him by themselves or their friends. His friends were unanimously enthusiastic regarding his character, his talents and his personality.

A recent writer has declared that Paine has few followers. It is true that his direct followers are few, especially in attacks upon the Bible, but his indirect followers are many. He was the first American to offer a definite plan for freeing the slaves. That work has been finished. He was one of the first to point out the dangers of monarchy to the states seeking a government and to urge a strong federal government on republican lines. That matter was settled in 1787. He was the first to advocate international arbitration. We are moving slowly towards his position. He was the first to show the absurdity and criminality of dueling. Public sentiment in most civilized countries has adopted his view. He was the first to advocate more rational ideas of marriage and divorce. That question is not yet settled. He was the first to urge national and international copyright. The leading nations have followed him, far in the rear. He was the first to demand justice for woman. She is slowly getting it, but as a nation we are more than a century behind him. There are few followers of Thomas Paine who keep his name or know what he has done for them. There is a vast multitude of those who are living better, freer, safer lives because he lived.

W. H. HUSE.

Proposed Evangelical Quintet.

Count Leo Tolstoy once said, "The only difference between the minister and the footpad is, that whereas the latter knocks you down and rifles your pockets, the minister gets at the pockets of honest people by a more ingenious if less violent process. Furthermore, both minister and footpad eat food that they have never earned, and which consequently cannot possibly be theirs by right." In view of this the pious sky pilots show a fine sense of fitness and propriety in asking "grace" and thanking God for what they consume.

Now that Billy Sunday, ex-thug and booze-fighter; Al Jennings, ex-train-robber and outlaw, and Pat Crowe, kidnapper, have heard the jingle of coin, otherwise known as the "call," and entered the scramble for loot, there still remain in the background two more evangelical possibilities of even greater notoriety and promise; namely, Abe Reuf and Harry K. Thaw. If Sunday's common-place stories of his indecencies and carousals can make 'em "hit the trail" by the hundreds, what results might be expected of a candid confession from the others? Realizing the value of teamwork and organized spoliation, as the churches do, it is astounding that they have not brought this wonderful quintet of saints together. This is undoubtedly the first opportunity for graft that they have ever overlooked. In a one-week's stand these five evangelical prodigies should convince and convert the entire population of any city or community.

Starting on the evening of the seventh day (the Sabbath) Billy Sunday could give a pulpit exhibition of his gyrations, coupled with his usual stock lies about Ingersoll and Paine, a vulgar recital of his own worldly career, the decline of his earnings as a ball player and his sighting a ray of financial hope in his present promising field. Admission 50c.

On Monday evening Pat Crowe could edify and spiritually elevate the sinners with a narration of his Cudahy kidnapping and blackmailing stunts, later enforced idleness, short rations, subsequent conversion and financial salvation through evangelical channels. Admission only one dollar ($1).

Tuesday evening Dr. Al Jennings' inspiring recital of his many daring hold-ups, train robberies and shooting affrays, election as sheriff, gubernatorial defeat, succeeding bankruptcy, conversion and evangelical rehabilitation would make 'em long for the "sawdust." Admission $2.

On Wednesday evening wild-eyed Harry K. Thaw, pistol in hand, would be the stellar attraction in the rôle of the prodigal son. His description of a red-light career in New York and Europe, culminating in the deliberate murder of Stanford White, his fight to evade justice, incarceration in an asylum for the insane, hair-raising escape to Canada, recapture, retrial, final liberty and metamorphosis into an evangelical divine, would far surpass anything thus far offered by the three lesser lights, and with the air of their commanding presence to back him on the stage, this wholesome rehearsal should make even the hardest hearts and stubborn minds "hit the trail." Admission $4, with free-will offering during the hand-shaking.

Thursday evening (admission $8) any of the unfortunate sinners still hell-bent would be given a last opportunity to climb the fire-escape (otherwise known as "joining the church") and be rounded-up by the Hon. Rev. Abe Reuf (treasurer of the Evangelical Troupe) with a tearful and eloquent account of his grafting machinations and robbery of the San Francisco earthquake victims, subsequent trials and imprisonment in San Quentin, with recent parole and consequent opportunity to realize arrested evangelical aspirations. The series of entertainments would close on Thursday evening with a grand trail-hitting fiesta and religious jubilee, at least 57 varieties being represented. After coralling the final free-will "offering" the Evangelical Quintet would sing, as the doxology, that grand old hymn, "I Got Mine, Boys, I Got Mine." Friday would be spent in dividing the spoils, Saturday in moving to another Sodom, and Sunday in praising the Lord and concocting schemes for the new campaign.

There is one possible flaw in this plan. While Sunday, Crowe and Jennings are already in the game, Thaw and Reuf may not yet be in need of funds. But I am offering it only as a suggestion, knowing that the clergy, with their ample time and proven ingenuity, can work out the details.

Tampico, Mexico.

W. H. WHITEKIN.

If the church wishes to aid this country during war times and set the right pace for all times, let it pay the taxes on all of its property; stop asking the government for emoluments; set its chaplains planting gardens or doing other useful work; quit offering prayers for peace and shoulder a rifle and everywhere do something for the salvation of liberty and justice and brotherhood.

The value of reading lies not in the fact that you accept what you read as truth. The big value is that it makes you think for yourself, opens the way for you to reach new conclusions and form new ideas in your mind.—Barstow.

One thing only in this world always depends upon ourselves, and that is the resolution to do what is in accordance with right reason. Here is virtue; here, also, is the only true happiness.—Descartes.

To business that we love we rise betimes and go to it with delight.—Shakespeare.

THE TRUTH SEEKER.

FOUNDED BY D. M. BENNETT, 1873.
 CONTINUED BY E. M. MACDONALD, 1883-1909
 G. E. MACDONALD Editor
 L. K. WASHBURN Editorial Contributor
 G. W. BOWNE Associate Editor
 Sixty-two Vesey Street, New York, N. Y.
 Post Office Box 1610.

SATURDAY - - - JUNE 30, 1917

There is a saying in the New Testament that you cannot serve two masters, that is, you cannot serve the state and the church. Every man will be called upon at a late day to decide which it shall be. It is impossible for a man to be loyal to both. The flag is above the cross, and must be kept above it, at any price. Save the flag and destroy the cross.

Jesus was never born, he was made. No woman was his mother because no man was his father. There is only one way that human children come into the world. They must have parents. Jesus had only one parent. We have no knowledge of persons who had mothers but not fathers. Only a religion could have invented such a preposterous notion as a miraculous conception.

The worst enemy of America is not Germany, but Romanism, and the autocrat that we have most to fear is not the kaiser but the pope. There is the plain truth in plain words, and the American citizen who does not agree with this statement should take a day off and study the political situation in this country. What Romanism has not got she is after with both hands and feet.

Strip the four gospels of what is false in them and you would not have enough left to make a Sunday school leaflet. It is now known for a fact that there never was such a person on earth as the person called Jesus by the authors of the four gospels. It logically follows that whatever is said of this person then must be and is false to a letter. This makes Christianity a lie and the Christian churches liars.

If Massachusetts is expected to take and pay for $300,000,000 worth of Liberty Bonds, how many of these bonds should be allotted to the Roman Catholic church, the wealthiest corporation in the United States? Now is the time for this rich church to show its love for this country. It has told of its admiration for our flag, now let it follow that flag. The attitude of Romanism towards America in this war will prove its patriotism.

If Christianity is true and its teachings the best for human beings, why is there such fear among Christians to discuss their faith? If I were defending a lie I should act just as Christians act. The TRUTH has nothing to fear, but Christianity is afraid to meet its opponents. Not one single dogma of the Christian religion stands upon a fact. The thirty-nine articles are thirty-nine lies. The Christian cannot defend his faith because it is false.

A Fictionist in Theology.

Sentiments worthy of the backward centuries and backwoods preachers are emitted by Mr. H. G. Wells, the imaginative fictionist and imagined scientist, in his latest book, "God the Invisible King." The one redeeming word in the title is "invisible"—that accurately describes "God."

Mr. Wells was once thought worthy to be numbered with the iconoclasts, but he has hit the trail. He says that life without God has no meaning, and that benevolent acts not performed for the glory of God have no virtue. This is seventeenth century theology (see the Westminster Confession of Faith) and twentieth century evangelism (see the sermons of Torrey and Sunday). He has to explain the benevolent deeds of the unbeliever, which he is candid enough to admit, although strict orthodoxy ignores or denies there are any; and this is how he does it:

"The difference is this, that the benevolent Atheist stands alone upon his own good will, without a reference, without a standard, trusting to his own impulse to goodness, relying upon his own moral strength. A certain immodesty, a certain self-righteousness, hangs like a precipice above him; incalculable temptations open like gulfs beneath his feet. He has not really given himself or got away from himself. He has no one to whom he can give himself. He is still a masterless man. His exaltation is self-centered, is priggishness; his fall is unrestrained by any exterior obligation. His devotion is only the good will in himself, a disposition; it is a mood that may change. At any moment it may change. He may have pledged himself to his own pride and honor, but who will hold him to his bargain? He has no source of strength beyond his own amiable sentiments, his conscience speaks with an unsupported voice, and no one watches while he sleeps. He cannot pray; he can but ejaculate. He has no real and living link with other men of good will."

The turgidity of this utterance compared with the clear writing of which Mr. Wells has at times shown himself to be capable is proof of the laborious task he encountered when, to the prejudice of the unbeliever, he tried to show the difference between the benevolence of an Atheist and that of a believer in God.

The impression that results from reading the last sentence of the foregoing quotation is that Mr. Wells is exceedingly stupid or mentally crooked. How else could he blunder upon such a statement as that the Atheist "has no real and living link with other men of good will"? Is he ignorant of the Atheist's professed purpose to serve humanity, to promote human welfare on earth, and to diminish as far as he may the amount of human suffering? This looks to us like the most "living" of all links that could bind together men of good will. It is a far livelier proposition than any god Mr. Wells could name. There never was a really live god, except among the worshipers of animals, and it is a historical fact that when a religion has wanted a "living link" between men of good will it has always drawn upon that humanity which Mr. Wells repudiates as inanimate. They had to take a man and call him a god in order to get a live one. Jesus is an example, and only the blind and perverse will deny that the despised humanity of Jesus has linked together a thousand times more men of good will than all his pretended divinity, or the divinity of his alleged begetter.

The right of opinion is one by Rationalists steadfastly maintained, but they dislike to see it supported by false reasoning. Mr. Wells says that the proof of God is sacrifice. His phrase is, "Sacrifice implies God." There surely have been enough sacrifices in God's name—millions of them human sacrifices. The Inquisition implied God. The God idea begot the kaiser. If Mr. Wells means that self-sacrifice implies God, he is blind to the careers of thousands of Atheists who have given their lives to science and humanity. But self-sacrifice is not an ideal. It is a misfortune—a thing to be prevented and abolished. The conditions that at times make it imperative are invariably bad. God and religion have always demanded it, and they have created the conditions that bring it about.

Self-sacrifice implies not God—at least not a benevolent one—but the reign of wrong in human affairs. The ideal of humanity is to make self-sacrifice forever unnecessary; it is a preventable disease, and if God goes with it, so much the better. It has flourished in his name; let him share its grave.

In our Rationalist contemporary of London we find Mr. Wells quoted as affirming: "Without God the 'service of Man' is no better than a hobby or a sentimentality, or a hypocrisy in the undisciplined prison of the mortal life." The Catechism and Torrey and Sunday once more! As a trail-hitter Mr. Wells has gone the limit. From the evangelist he most flatters by imitation we should like to borrow one word to describe that statement: it is "rotten."

If devotion to the service of man professed by Atheists is "hypocrisy," why did Atheist physicians from America go to Serbia at the risk of their lives to stamp out disease? Why does an Atheist physician write us in a letter received today that he is going to the front with a surgeon's unit? Why does Jack Binns, the "wireless" hero of the steamship Republic disaster in 1909, enlist in the aviation corps? Why does a British army captain, the president of a Rationalist society, return to the front when his wounds would exempt him? And what about all the soldiers in the Allied armies who are, as their chaplains say, "without God," and those French Atheists whose records are given by Alfred Loisy in the articles we have published—are all of them "hypocrites"? We mention these particular Atheists because they are our contemporaries, but history is full of other instances.

If we were looking for persons who make hypocritical professions of devotion to the service of man we should not search the ranks of Atheism to find them. Rather we should seek where they apparently most abound, among those subjects of "God the invisible King" who pretend that serving man depends on belief in a supernatural deity.

A passage in the New Testament runs: "No man can serve two masters: for either he will hate the one and love the other, or else he will hold to the one and despise the other." The passage means that you cannot serve God and man. The instance we are here discussing shows that when you get the God idea fixed in your mind you cannot tell the truth about men; and it is no service of man to misrepresent him.

Religious Studies for the Few.

There are persons of sound judgment who, though they fully approve of a comparative treatment of religions, and of the freest criticism of a particular religion, as for instance Christianity, still insist that it is wise to keep such studies for the few. Like the Roman Catholic church, they express the opinion that theological books ought to be written in Latin. Religion, they say, is common property. It belongs by its very nature to the young and to the old, to the wise and to the foolish, to men, women and children. Unless it fulfills that condition, unless it is open to little children as well as to the wisest of the wise, it ceases to be religion. Now, they say, the technical character of the language which is employed in treatises on other subjects restricts their influence to those who can judge for themselves. No one would think of restricting lectures on botany because such lectures might teach people to extract poisons from plants. No one would prevent professors of chemistry from lecturing to large classes because some of their pupils might wish to learn how to prepare dynamite. But while every other subject is thus, by its very nature, restricted to a professional class, we are reminded that a study of religion, or at all events, an interest in religion, appeals to every human heart, and that a treatment of religion that may be quite harmless, nay quite legitimate, with advanced students and expert thinkers, may prove very hurtful to younger minds that are not prepared as yet for such strong diet.

Now we know quite well that there is some truth in this. We do not deny even that the use of the Latin language in theological discussions which were likely to prove a stumbling-block to the uninitiated, had its advantages. But it is useless to discuss such proposals now. We must learn to accept the times in which we live, and to make the best of them. Whatever is now discussed in academic precincts is preached the next day in the streets, and there is neither palace nor cottage that is not reached by the million arms of the public press. Latin is no longer any protection; we doubt whether it was so altogether even in the middle ages. The discovery of Copernicus (1473-1543) that the earth moves round the sun and does not form the center of the universe, may, indeed, have been kept back for nearly a century, remaining known only to those who could read Latin; but it burst forth all the same in the Italian writings of Galileo (1564-1642), and people soon recovered from the shock, even though deprived of a much-cherished conviction.

Artificial protection of any kind is out of date in the century in which we live, and in which we must learn to act and to do as much good as we can. To expect that religion can ever be placed again beyond the reach of scientific treatment or of honest criticism, shows an utter misapprehension of the signs of the times; it would, after all, be no more than to set up private judgment against private judgment. We believe, on the contrary, that if the inalienable rights of private judgment—that is, of honesty and truth—should be more generally recognized, the character of religious controversy would at once be changed. Restriction provokes resentment, and thus embitters all discussions on religious subjects. To encourage people, and particularly theologians, not to speak the truth openly, though they know it, must be fatal to every religion. Who can draw the line between the truth that may, and the truth that may not, be communicated? We have known theologians, occupying the highest positions in the church, who have frankly admitted among their intimate friends that physical miracles are impossible. But they did not consider it right to say so from the pulpit, though to many of their hearers such a confession would probably have been far more helpful than many an apologetic sermon. Unfortunately there exists at present a very widespread impression that preachers do not preach all they know, that they will not help others to face the abyss which all have to face, and that they will not open the shutters to let in the light of the sun and the fresh air of the morning which we all are meant to breathe; but that they will keep the truth to themselves—we will not say from selfish motives, but from fear that it might do more harm than good to others. To all this we know but one reply: Can there be anything higher and better than truth? Surely, he who cannot trust in truth cannot trust in anything, and his religion is vain indeed.

The Divine Slacker.

The Outlook has an editorial article, presumably written by Dr. Lyman Abbott, with the suggestive heading, "If God reigns." Beginning with the question, "If God reigns, why does he not stop this terrible war?" it goes on to affirm that he (God) "could easily swallow up the kaiser's army by an earthquake, as Dathan and Abiram were swallowed up; he could destroy them by a pestilence, as the Assyrians were destroyed. Why not?" Two columns are devoted by the Outlook to evading the question. We are told that God is not an autocrat; that he does not rule in that fashion; that "he is a democratic God." Or, "at least it is thus that God is represented in the Bible." All which is humbug; and when Dr. Abbott adds that God "governs men by teaching them self-government," we know that the case for God is lost.

In his new work on "Jesus the Christ in the Light of Psychology," Dr. G. Stanley Hall, president of Clark University, announces the truth, which all knowledge verifies, that there is no deity but those which man has created. The gods originate in the imaginations of men, and the God of Dr. Abbott is his own private manufacture.

There is nothing more conspicuous in the Bible than the fact that God was always fighting on the side of the Jews, and resorting to all sorts of interference to give them the victory and annihilate their enemies. The kaiser, who claims that God is with his army as he was with that of Joshua, has a much more faithful conception of the Bible God than Dr. Abbott displays.

The orthodox ministers have no hesitation in asserting that God has brought on this war, and to keep up the farcical pretense they appoint days for praying that he will bring about peace. And judging from the character of God as portrayed in the Bible, if he were to interfere by doing some miracle of destruction, it would not be the kaiser's army that would be destroyed, but the armies of the Allies. The kaiser is his most obedient servant, and his warfare is strictly that of the Jehovahists of the Old Testament.

Passing to the New Testament, the Outlook editorially says that "Jesus would exercise no authority except over those who yielded to his authority." No scripture is cited in support of that assertion. Dr. Abbott's Jesus, like his God, is of his own manufacture. The text applicable to the argument would show that Dr. Abbott does not know his Bible. It reads (Luke xix, 27): "But those mine enemies who would not that I should reign over them, bring hither and slay them before me." When a ruler orders the slaying of those who do not yield to his authority, he is surely carrying his authority to the extreme. The Inquisition professed not to extend its authority beyond those who yielded to its authority; it only demanded that the state should exterminate them, as Jesus commanded.

If God reigns, asks Dr. Abbott, why does he not swallow up the kaiser's army by an earthquake or destroy it by pestilence? Why the kaiser's army? Why not the British and French armies? On what does Dr. Abbott assume that God is on the Allies' side? That is a question he should answer before wasting any more mental effort on the problem presented by God's acting the slacker and not getting in on either side.

"If God reigns, why does he not stop this terrible war?" is only an "academic" question with Rationalists, who know well enough that God is merely a proposition. He is an inference, a hypothesis, whereby ignorance seeks to solve the unknowable. The very scriptures which Dr. Abbott misinterprets to explain the conduct of God affirm that his ways are past finding out. He is confessedly a mystery, and, as Ingersoll said, a mystery is never great enough to become an explanation.

The confusion on this subject is introduced with the sign of the subjunctive mood, which as Hensley the grammarian tells us "expresses something not as a fact but as a conception." "If" God reigns? But God does not reign. Kings and kaisers and emperors reign. That is why the war was begun; that is why the war is not stopped. God exists only in the conception that they reign by divine right.

Refreshment.

A wavelet of appreciative letters flowed into this office the past week—some from old and some from new friends. An early one or two fall into the Letters of Friends in another part of the paper. The writer of one is subscribing because a friend handed him a copy when he did not know that such a journal was published. The moral is that well-wishers can increase our list by introducing the paper where it is a stranger.

Another is attracted by a column extract from THE TRUTH SEEKER appearing in the Literary Digest of June 16. Such incidents lead to the supposition that the paper needs more publicity, more advertising. (The Digest's selection for reprint was a fine article on "Theology in National Songs" contributed by Professor Bowne).

One of this year's recruits, writing from a conservative community in New York state, where a kind of stigma attaches to heterodoxy, says:

"It certainly is refreshing to get a copy of THE TRUTH SEEKER each week, and we only regret that we never heard of the paper until this spring. It seems to me there must be many isolated instances of Agnostics who would be glad to be numbered among your subscribers if they knew such a paper was published. In brushing up against the people we meet there is, I find, occasionally one who with a little encouragement and backing would be a Free-thinker, but who hasn't the courage to assert himself. We only regret that we had not seen a copy of THE TRUTH SEEKER years ago and can assure you our name will always be on your list as long as the paper is issued."

The writer of that letter has been getting Ingersoll's works and reading them, and we have to agree with him that it is a kind of crime against progress and civilization "that works of such marvelous literary beauty, to say nothing of the wholesomeness of the subject matter, should be banned by public libraries."

From still another, a state of Washington reader, we pick a few sentences:

"THE TRUTH SEEKER is an absolute necessity in our intellectual menu. With us it has filled a felt want for a number of years. The principles it advocates are mighty and must prevail, but, 'O Lord, how long' must we wait for the light to penetrate the boneheads that fill the earth?"

He renews for a year; and in doing the same a West Virginia reader observes:

"THE TRUTH SEEKER reaches me regularly and I look forward to its arrival with greater pleasure than all the magazines combined; and I am a patron of no less than nine."

Lastly, for the moment, comes one of our New York city reliables, renewing, purchasing and "donating" with this remark:

"As usual, I cannot but express my pleasure at reading your weekly paper. I am in full sympathy with your views in regard to the failure of our Congress to tax church property, etc., and I only wish that our daily press could have manhood enough to ask for such measures, which would be only fair and square."

There is nothing fickle about the wind that blows this way and keeps the wavelets at their constant office of refreshing and renewing THE TRUTH SEEKER at its source. The manifestations of good will are at times almost enough to make an editor get sentimental or drop into poetry and fine writing. There is also the practical and material part to be grateful for. We have to thank the friend who passes his paper to some acquaintance who may be a possible subscriber. Gratitude is doubled when with the good word comes the renewal; multiplied when something is added to cover the percentage of expense due to the high cost of everything. If the readers of this paper were a penurious bunch it would never have lived to be forty-four years old. Were they unappreciative, the hearts of the publishers might long since have been eaten out by disappointment. We occasionally receive letters soliciting some service we are pleased to render, and closing with the words, "Thanking you in advance."

It is thus that our gratitude expresses itself, with thanks for past favors and a lively sense of benefits to come; for one good turn is the harbinger of another. Thus are we kept in heart for the present and hope for the future.

It is now becoming a matter of inquiry with certain believers as to who will stand for the "Law of Christ" in the Parliament of Nations at the end of the war. The Catholic theologian, who is ever ready to show his zeal for his church, has long since declared that there is one august figure—one, and only one—to be named on such a day. He is described as the "Bearer of the keys," the "Servant of the servants of God, uniting in his own person the Rome of the Cæsars with the Rome of the Apostles; and as Leo XIII warned the Conference at The Hague, which would not give him a share in its deliberations, he is by divine appointment 'the mediator of peace.'" The arrogance displayed in this Jesuitical attempt to force a denominational opinion upon the world as if this view of ecclesiastical polity was the latent creed of all mankind, is a bold illustration of the dangerous capacity for evil that still lies hidden in the modern papacy, notwithstanding the current plea that Catholicism has been greatly liberalized in recent years. While every Roman Catholic knows that the foregoing statement of papal authority is accepted only by members of his own denomination, he still reiterates it constantly in order to keep the idea before people's minds as much as possible. It is a part of the hypocritical plans of that liberty-destroying organization. As a matter of truth and justice, the pope of Rome has no more right to sit in a "parliament of man" as a divinely appointed "mediator of peace" than has the High Priest of Buddhism, the Grand Llama of Thibet, or the Archimandrite of Jerusalem. When will Roman Catholics quit their childish game of bluff? The authority that did absolutely nothing to prevent the war ought to be the last considered when terms of peace are being negotiated.

We have received from readers of THE TRUTH SEEKER and forwarded to Judge Jesse W. Weik of Greencastle, Ind., $13 as contributions to the proposed marker for the grave of the Hon. W. H. Herndon, the Freethinking biographer of Lincoln who was for twenty-five years the law partner of the martyred President. Other readers have sent their contributions direct to Judge Weik, who reports the receipt of something more than $150. Contributors through the TRUTH SEEKER office are H. J. Winegardner, C. W. Seavy, E. A. Stevens, M. H. Gold, W. Knight, R. C. Nash, J. H. Duel, John Sherrill, Jos. Barnard, Jack Potter, D. Lafe Hubler and Aaron Sullivan. Judge Weik writes that he expects to place on Herndon's grave a stone costing about $200. His original call for $100 has been oversubscribed.

Because of his organizing ability, the evangelist whom New York has lately entertained at a cost of hundreds of thousands of dollars is recommended for the office of secretary of war. But the claims of Get-Rich-Quick Mrs. Ray Hyman to a place as secretary of the treasury are overlooked.

A man is rich in proportion to the number of things which he can afford to let alone.—Thoreau.

THE NEW RELIGIOUS CENSUS

Futility of a Numbering that Omits 61 Per Cent. of the Population.

Another census of religions is now being taken, according to the Catholic News of April 14, and this one is to be different from the one taken about twelve years ago, the results of which were published in "Bulletin 103, Religious Bodies, 1906," in so far as the returns given in that Bulletin exclude Roman Catholic children under nine years of age, while this present one is to include all the children baptized by that church.

This seems only fair at first sight, but as nothing is said of including the children of Baptists and other sects who do not admit children to church membership, many of which would not claim such young persons as members of their church, an obviously incorrect importance is again being created for the Vatican communion.

Exactly five years ago a series of three articles by the present writer appeared in this magazine. These dealt with the whole question of Roman Catholic statistics. The adventures of those articles before they finally appeared would read as a piece of detective fiction of the wildest description. They were put in a box to be sent from Boston to Chicago and it was ten months before the writer obtained possession of it; when he was charged $4.55 for storage! The main points of those articles bear repetition at the present moment in regard to this new census. In those articles it is pointed out that the initial error of religious statistics is the having such a census at all—a census which on the face of it must be fallacious. A man's religion is not a reality like his avocation. It is not a fact like his age. It is a sentiment which powerfully affects him, but which he cannot define nor reason on. In England all proposals to take a religious census have been successfully opposed as attacks on liberty, and no such census has been made. Such an inquisition is in direct contradiction of the spirit of the American Constitution, and moreover was demonstrated to be actually impossible, for on page 41 of the Bulletin is a diagram which shows that no information is given regarding sixty-one per cent. of the population. Further, the number given for Jews represent households, not individuals. It is a burlesque on government to publish officially as a "census" of the whole population a report which omits sixty-one per cent. and so seriously underestimates the numbers, and consequently the power of so wealthy, aggressive and influential a sect as that of the Hebrews, as to ignore all who are not the head of a household.

But this "census" is a strange hole-and-corner concoction done in secret. The persons enumerated know absolutely nothing of it. The citizens are not approached, nor are they regarded by any official of the state, but are numbered at the discretion of absolutely irresponsible private persons: secretaries and ministers of churches. There is the wildest difference in the data on which these work. A few sects keep well ordered books, and are in a position to speak with certainty of all the details of their organization. On the other hand, there are small bodies which resent anything like a record, and some who regard a census as unscriptural and blasphemous. For the numbers of such sects, the enumerator admitted he had to fall back on guess-work and intrusive observation. Then the church for which in point of fact this grave nonsense is perpetuated, the Vatican church of the asserted overlord of the world, the Roman church, frankly admits that its knowledge of its membership is confused; and the sect itself is chaotic. Cardinal O'Connell on October 29, 1906, said at the dedication of a church "that it frequently happened that before the debt could be paid off a church it stood in a district totally changed; and from which the original parishioners had removed their residence and their interest."

What good religionists expect to obtain from a census beyond a kind of governmental peg on which to hang falsehoods, it is difficult to conceive. The last religious census demonstrated that the majority of the population were not attached to any church, that all churches were heavily in debt, while many were so loosely organized they were mere names which represented no institution.

On what pretext is this census made? And why is it not made in a regulation manner and by government employees? The Constitution of the United States has no further knowledge of the existence of religion than to prohibit persecution on account of religious opinions. It concerns itself in no way with what those opinions are, and the persons who have been so aggressively unwise as to cause public money to be spent to discover how many sets of religious opinions have adherents in this republic, and what are the numbers of those separate associations professing those variations of belief, have been so purblind in their propagandist enthusiasm as to overlook that the next and logically necessary step is an enquiry what those opinions are; and the consideration how far they are consistent with—not the Constitution, for the whole thing is an obvious breach of the Constitution, but the existence of the Republic itself. This is already done, in regard to the Mormon church, and one of its religious opinions and ecclesiastical institutions has been made penal, and men are imprisoned for holding the opinion and adhering to the institution. There is no consistency in demanding that an Algerian Mohammedan should repudiate polygamy, which is consistent with the Bible, the majority of the religions of the world, and with physiology, as the United States does as a condition of permitting him to land on American soil, and in not requiring a Spaniard to condemn celibacy, a practice which is not merely race suicide but, if generally accepted, would extinguish not the republic only, but the whole human race. If the state is within its right in suppressing all sexual relations save such as have been registered by a state official as existing between one male and one female only, how much more is it just for it to take account of the fatal delusions of priestly and monastic celibacy. Again, having recognized the existence of religions and priests by a census, can it rationally continue to tolerate the usurpation by priests, of its right of inquisition into conduct, and not take drastic measures to suppress the confessional, as it has attempted in regard to polygamy in Utah? Further still. Cardinal O'Connell volunteered the information to the Unitarians of Boston that his church is monarchical. This fact is patent enough. It is more than monarchical, for these Vaticanists, who are so eager to expand the statistics in their favor, have forgotten that every unit they report to the authorities of the Republic as a member of their church is under religious obligation to maintain the head of his communion as the owner and overlord of the whole earth—an overlord who once actually divided America in two and gave one portion to Spain and the other to Portugal. Every member of the Roman Catholic communion holds that Christ ordered, to the end of time, all nations to obey the authority of this pretended king of the capital of Italy, the self-styled successor of Numa Pompilius, "Pontifex Maximus of Rome." In collecting these statistics, therefore, these enthusiasts are in fact simply enumerating an organization of traitors to the Republic. If not traitors to the Republic, then they are making a census of puzzle-pated traitors to that asserted divine right suzerain they are sworn to obey as the head of the church to which they, like Cardinal Gibbons, still protest they belong.

But the attempt at censuses of religion are dangerous and misleading from the fact they deal only with overt communions and omit the occult societies and mystic orders, many of which are more really religious sects than several of the churches which are numbered. Consequently, they show neither the strength of religion nor the relative forces of different varieties of religious opinion. The Freemasons, as Roman Catholic authorities have asserted, are a duplicate of the Roman church, and far more essentially religious than the Friends or Brethren who are enumerated. The Elks appear to have a brand-new paganism of their own invention, and, if they do not worship a clock, reverence it much as Catholics do the cross. They are emphatically a religious body, and the census is futile while they and similar freak religionists are ignored.

The real object of this census, and the reason the larger churches desire it, is that it is the first step to transmuting the Republic into a theocracy. Already, by the arrangement authorized by the government, Vatican bishops are recognized as rulers of a section of the citizens; and are made responsible for them. They are assumed to have duties in regard to them which are recognized by the government of the Republic. But this is in relation to matters with which the Constitution has absolutely no concern, and can only serve to defy the Constitution by pointing out to the fanatics and bigots who are thus given a quasi-official authority, those persons who have left their communions and whom they now have to regard as enemies. It is just such a theocracy as this census lays the foundation of which Ireland in its Vaticanist provinces has now become, and which Newfoundland also is becoming. There, the peasants are taught all are equal—the land is their communal property, and the priest is king. But the anxiety of Vaticanists to run with the state is purblind and dazed. The Free churches in England for about two hundred years have been alive to the danger of Erastianism, and have pointed to the enslaved condition of the Anglican Established church as an awful example of the results of communion with the state. Already the efforts of the Vaticanist enthusiasts have gone towards an enslavement of their sect to the American government. For many years one of the most prominent bankers in the country has been a member of its ruling committee. Roosevelt intrigued to get another prominent American appointed to the same Vatican board of directors to look after the interests of our western states. Since then two other prominent Americans have in a manner been forced upon that board. But what have been the consequences to the Americans acknowledging the authority of the Vatican church? An arrangement has been made by the state with their pretended king of Rome, and he has sent a legate who is outside the existing hierarchical organization, and has a power from him to over-rule everyone, and to deal for them with the government of the Republic. The American Romanist church, therefore, is by this practical, if yet unwritten, concordat between the Federal government of the United States and that of the Pretender who claims the crown of Rome, put in a condition of puerile tutelage to the two high concurring parties and becomes an oscillating feudatory under both.

But again it must be pointed out to the adherents of the successor of Numa Pompilius that wherever their church comes in contact with the state it loses its freedom. It is not at this moment free wherever it harmonizes with the state. It is established in Austria, and the late emperor vetoed the man elected by it for its head; and Rampolla was put back for an ignorant peasant, Sarto. Its history from Constantine to the present French republic is a long record of slavery to the state, and defeat by it, and in as far as it unites itself with the government of the United States it will find itself the servant, and not the master, of this Republic—which is ruled by that vast majority of non-religionists represented by a blank in the Bulletin of the Religious Census.

GEORGE TREBELLS.

P. S.—Since writing the foregoing article I have re-read the Constitution and find the exact words of Article 1, section 9, subdivision 8 are: "No person holding any office of profit or trust under them, shall, without the consent of Congress, accept of any present, emolument, office or title, of any kind whatever, from any king, prince or foreign state." By "Congress" must be understood every authority in the United States, as Congress is the ultimate source from which all authority springs. It is in fact the Republic. Note that this does not debar such persons as have such foreign offices or titles from being appointed to offices by the government; quite the contrary. They are citizens and they cannot voluntarily outlaw themselves from obedience to Congress by accepting servitude from a king or foreign state; and the pope is a king and the Vatican a state. It is merely that upon being called by the American government to an office all engagements of service to a foreigner become void. Consequently the Vatican bishops and parish priests who are now appointed census enumerators of religions cease their relationship with the mediatized king of Rome, and become merely heads of American communions—those institutions which have been founded by popes in America—and are under their personal rule, such as the Josephinum at Columbus, and the Jesuit Colleges and Houses—are entirely emancipated from control by the hierarchy; and consequently, being separated from the American officials of the Vatican communion, these colleges and Houses cease to be in any way American institutions. Thus the Catholic bishops and priests while enumerators are no longer "Roman," and the seminaries and Jesuit colleges are purely Roman and non-American. G. T.

A priest who will teach the "Lives of the Saints" as reliable biography ought to teach the Arabian Nights as divine revelation. There is a difference between ordinary fiction and lies. The Romish church is a monument to the biggest impositions ever saddled on ignorant humanity, and it is unfortunate that the children of the world are imposed upon by this corrupt amalgamation.

Theologians do not and cannot believe that the authority to govern comes from the consent of the governed. They regard God as the monarch, and themselves as his agents. They always have been the enemy of liberty.—Robert G. Ingersoll.

THE MANGASARIAN IDEA.

It Solves all Difficulties of Citizenship and Loyalty for the Americanized Alien.

M. M. Mangasarian, Rationalist lecturer and author, formerly of Chicago and now of Spokane, Washington, is doing splendid service for his adopted country. Mr. Mangasarian is an Armenian by birth, and he makes the point that a foreign-born citizen, having deliberately chosen America as his home, should be more loyal to his adopted land than the one in which he happened first to see the light by no volition of his own. We reproduce one of his recent lectures from a report in the Spokesman-Review (May 21), which in introducing it said:

"More than 200 persons were turned away and all available space in the Clemmer theater was taken yesterday morning when M. M. Mangasarian dealt with the war situation in his lecture, under the auspices of the First Unitarian society. Taking for his topic, 'The Case of Germany,' he said:

By M. M. MANGASARIAN.

"The German-Americans in this country have a right to be proud of the Germany of Goethe, of Wagner and Mozart; but they should find it a pleasant duty to be loyal to the country of their adoption. An adopted country should be dearer to us than our fatherland, and a naturalized citizen could be more patriotic than the native born. We are not responsible for the place of our birth—we are responsible for the choice of a country to belong to.

"I am a naturalized citizen. I was a little over 21 when I came to this country, and after five years of acquaintance with its people, its institutions, its opportunities, I decided to adopt America for my country. Was not that a more deliberate and responsible act than that of being born an American? The infant born under the flag has no choice. I could have chosen France, England, Russia or Germany for my country; but I said: 'I will take America for my bride.' Does not that make me an American in a sense more real than if the accident of birth had made me an American?

"And my American sympathies at this critical hour prove that when I took the oath of allegiance I knew what I was doing, and my loyalty also proves that in that respect, at least, America did not make a mistake in adopting me for a citizen. I am now ready to bend every energy not to lose the country I adopted as my own, even as America is ready to tax all her resources to protect me in the exercise of the rights which she conferred on me when I became a citizen.

"But is there any danger of losing America? Where is Belgium today? Where is Serbia, or Armenia? And is not France wavering in the balance? Is not Great Britain? Is not Germany herself on the brink of the precipice? What, then, could make us think that America is exempt from a similar fate? Is there any one among the millions of naturalized Americans who would be happy to see this country like another Belgium?

"But such a fate is sure to befall us—let there be no mistake—if the German submarine proves to be an invincible weapon. I would not like to see even America in possession of an invincible weapon of warfare. Liberty is born of the balance of power among nations. Therefore, for a single country to be able to send all the first-class powers of the world to the bottom of the sea by a weapon stronger than all their combined strength would spell the doom of freedom. Our congressmen in Washington who hesitated, dilly-dallied, swooned in their seats, and finally voted against their own flag, did not have sufficient acumen to foresee the consequences of an invincible weapon which threatened to whip the world to its knees.

"Let even America be in a position to impose her will upon all mankind and there would develop an American autocracy as evil and corrupt as any the world has ever seen. If the German submarine wins, do you think that Germany will leave England, France and America in a position to recuperate their losses, grow strong again for another war? Will she permit these countries to continue to hold some of the fairest portions of the earth? Is Germany as thoughtless as that? If the submarine succeeds there will be no Monroe doctrine; that is to say, no America, or only a 'little America,' something like Mexico, and there will be no France, except shrunken France, and no Great Britain, except as a vassal, and no Russian empire. There will be only the imperial will of the German submarine.

"Americans, beware!

"It may be objected that if America and the entente powers won there would be the same menace to liberty. But the allies practically represent the world, and their success at its worst could only hurt the four central empires. Moreover, the allies are so balanced in military strength that three or four of them together could easily curb imperialistic designs on the part of any one of them. Germany, however, is so much superior to Turkey, Bulgaria and Austria-Hungary that all three of them combined would be helpless against her after she has downed the rest of the world."

Mr. Mangasarian, after dwelling at some length on the moral and intellectual qualities of the German which have made him a power in the world, and after touching upon the German high pressure system of education, and the German form of government which is nominally constitutional, but really an autocracy, since the chancellor can not be removed by the reichstag, and is not responsible except to the emperor, quoted German authorities to prove that in political education the Germans are at least a hundred years behind the United States.

"The crown in Germany possesses the whole and undivided power of the state in all its plenitude," Mr. Mangasarian quoted from a celebrated German jurist. "Thus what Louis the Fourteenth could say in France 300 years ago, the German emperor can say today. 'The state; it is I.' Do naturalized Americans prefer such a ruler to an Abraham Lincoln as the head of a government of the people, by the people and for the people?

"We are often invited to consider the wonderful results of the German form of government and education, its efficiency and organization. And what, after three years of the war, are the accomplishments of the German system or machine? One thing we may freely find fault with is German diplomacy. There has never been in recent years anything more inadequate.

"Was the failure of the German government to keep the friendship of the United States a credit to German diplomacy?

"Was the nature of the German propaganda in this country which necessitated the dismissal of the attaches of the German embassy and the arrest of her many agents a credit to her diplomacy?

"Was the way Germany alienated Italy, one of her allies, a credit to the German diplomat?

"Was the German assault upon the conscience of the world by her invasion of Belgium, by her silence in the massacre of Armenians, by her waging war upon noncombatants—upon women and children even—a credit to the pupil of the German schools and the German government?

"Was Von Zimmerman's attempt secretly to pluck three of the stars from the American flag and toss them over to Carranza as a sop for Mexican friendship the evidence of German efficiency?

"The excuse that, in inviting neutrals to break with Germany, America did the very same thing loses its point when it is remembered that the Zimmerman note to Mexico was dispatched before our government broke relations with Germany, and certainly contributed toward bringing about the present breach.

"Finally, is Germany's ruthless warfare, after having assured us that unarmed merchantmen would not be torpedoed without warning, worthy the diplomacy of a civilized nation? The plea that the promise of Germany not to sink passenger boats was conditional on the future conduct of England is wide of the mark, for the very cogent reason that our government refused to accept a conditional promise, and sent a note to that effect, to which Germany gave its consent by silence. In diplomacy it is the last and final communication which binds. Why did not the German government reply to America's last note? Was she not under obligation to let us know that our protest would not be heeded, instead of by her silence leading us to believe that it would be?

"But look at the military accomplishments of German efficiency? Where are they? Did it require great talent to conquer Belgium or Serbia? Did it require great strategy to invade France by a door left open by mutual agreement and solemn pledges and treaties?

"I am sure President Wilson was right when he drew a distinction between the German government and the German people. The newspapers of the empire resented Wilson's discrimination, but the German newspapers are muzzled. It will be difficult for me to believe that the country of some of the greatest sons of our planet prefers to be directed than to direct itself; that, as a nation, it would rather be a subject than a sovereign people; that if the kaiser were to resign his crown the people would insist upon his wearing it; that if the chancellor were to tell the reichstag that henceforth he would be responsible to them for his policies they would plead with him to let them remain mere figureheads and their parliament only a debating society; that if the government were to tear the old constitution and invite the people to write a new charter of liberty they would of their own will restore the old parchment.

"There is only one thing that stands between the great German people and an unhampered democracy—the German government. Let it be our service to that glorious land to remove that obstacle."

Commenting on this lecture the Spokesman-Review of May 22, said:

"The German-Americans, Mr. Mangasarian rightly said in Spokane on Sunday, should find it a pleasant duty to be loyal to the country of their adoption. An adopted country should be dearer than our fatherland. A naturalized citizen could be more patriotic than the native born. We are not responsible for the place of our birth. We are for the choice of a country.

"After five years' acquaintance with this country, its people, institutions and opportunities, Mr. Mangasarian decided to adopt America as his country. The choice was a fortunate one both for him and for us. Was not his decision, he cogently asks, a more responsible and deliberate act than being born an American? He could have chosen England, France, Germany or Russia as his country, but he said: 'I will take America for my bride.' Does not that choice make him an American in a more real sense than if the accident of birth had made him an American?

"The parable of this Americanized Armenian has its message for other Americans of foreign birth or ancestry. We have our citizens of alien blood who naturally and justifiably feel a decided liking for the home of their forebears. It may be the England of Lloyd George, the France of Joffre, the Germany of Kant, the Italy of Garibaldi, the Russia of Tolstoi or Holland, Scandinavia or Switzerland, each and all a nation to be proud of. But it is imperative and indispensable that the naturalized American from any of those peoples should replace even allegiance of the heart for them with whole-souled loyalty to the country which he has chosen as his new home. There can be no divided allegiance. Love the old land as much as you can or will, but love the new land better and more.

"The new country of one's citizenship claims the new citizen exclusively. The Mangasarian idea that loyalty on the part of the naturalized citizen to the country of his adoption should be a joy is the true and sound idea. It solves immediately whatever difficulties arise from the Americanized alien from his love for the fatherland and his duty to his adopted country. There can be but one reply to his questioning. It is that his deliberate adoption of a new country ends all question of duty to the old country."

A Menace to Children.

Dr. Henry Jones Mulford does not share Dr. Lyman Abbott's admiration for the gutter evangelist. He believes that children should be kept away from the revival meetings, and says so in a communication to the Outlook, which Dr. Abbott prints. Under the heading, "Our Children and Billy Sunday," he gives renewed expression to the dictum of Thomas Paine: "Any religion which shocks the mind of a child cannot be a true religion." His article follows:

The question behind our title is: Shall we send our children to the Tabernacle to hear "Billy" Sunday?

And the answer is: No.

But why shouldn't we send them? Because, approaching the matter from a general point of view, the example there set forth is a wrong example to set before immature and impressionable minds. The developing mind is easily impressed, readily takes on a bias; and it never forgets anything, good or bad. We therefore should be very careful what we place before such minds.

But why the need for caution in regard to Mr. Sunday? Isn't his a good influence?

Again, the answer must be: No, not for children. But, in order rightly to understand it, let us examine the matter more in detail. We approach the subject from four directions.

First, the environment. The atmosphere of the Tabernacle is all wrong as to the effect produced upon the child. It is the atmosphere of the circus rather than of the church. There is more entertainment in the Tabernacle than there is theology. As one young man put it: "I don't go to the movies now; I go to the Tabernacle. It's more fun, and it doesn't cost me anything."

Second, the discourse. There is much that is objectionable here because of its unconscious suggestion to the youthful mind. There is the slang. Slang has a subtle appeal for all of us; it has an especial appeal for the child. He will remember slang while he forgets the real points of the discourse. There is the poor English in which the discourse is presented. Language is one of the weak points of the child, and the example confirms his weakness. There are the stories used to drive home the points of the discourse. These induce laughter but not understanding. And sometimes they put into the mind of the child (and the adult) an idea that had, and should have, no place there. There are the "knocks" and the abuse of "unbelievers" that are a major part of the discourse. The child wonders at these, and then, unable to reason for himself, accepts them because he is led to believe that the preacher speaks as one having authority.

Third, the attitudes of the preacher. Bizarre antics never added dignity to any discourse. To appreciate the effect upon his hearers one needs only to attend the meetings and listen to the laughter that follows the antics of Mr. Sunday. Instead of being impressed by his words, his hearers see only his motions; instead of gravity, there is levity. Is this a fit embellishment for a sacred message? Is the example a fit one for children whose minds are in the formative stage?

Fourth, the theology presented to the listener. Mr. Sunday's theology is obsolete, horrible, unchristian; it is the theology of fear. He says, in an interview reported in Pearson's Magazine for April: "I believe in heaven, where all saved souls will rejoice in blessed company, and I believe in hell. Yes, I believe that the devil receives the damned souls and that other devils shovel coals and build fires to torment the sinners with flames." And, further, Mr. Sunday believes that, in order to escape this hell, one needs only to confess Christ; that is, to unload one's sins upon him.

What a picture! All the "saved" gathered together in an appointed place, singing hymns of joy that they are "saved"! Jesus in the background, staggering under the load of their sins! Below, lurid hell, with its ever-blazing fires, its devils, and its tortured "sinners"!

What a picture! And what a picture to place before our children: Heaven, a picture of selfishness; hell, a picture of hate; Jesus, a picture of man's supreme cowardice, of man's fear to approach God alone!

And now, am I not right when I say that we should not allow our children to hear "Billy" Sunday? Could there be a more pernicious atmosphere than that within his Tabernacle? Remember here that I am considering children, not adults. I am willing to admit that Mr. Sunday gets results. But he gets his results through the employment of false images; through the effect of fear. It is the subtle effect of this fear upon the unconscious mind of the hearer that brings the result. The fear of the unknown has ever been a threatening shadow upon the face of man. The race has grown up in that shadow; and it is not difficult to make that shadow seem like the real thing in the minds of the susceptible. But this, perhaps, does no harm to those adults who need a good hard jolt before they come to themselves. But our children need no such jolt. The child is not a sinner; and he never will become one if he is kept in the right way—away from superstition and fear. We must not allow these things to become enthroned within his mind. We must say to him that God and he are living together in the same universe, and that his actions must measure up to God's standard. He must be taught that he is to stand upon his own feet before God; not to approach him leaning upon the shoulder of another. The picture to place before our children is not that of a fear-beset man, tottering into the presence of an awful God, leaning upon Jesus as a staff, but that of a man, erect, with the light of confidence upon his face, striding fearlessly toward his God, a God of Love.

There is in fact, as we now see, nothing in the externals of the Christian church which is not a survival from the churches of Paganism. Tonsured head and silvery bells and swinging censer; Christmas and Easter festivals; Holy Madonna with the child; the sacramental use of bread, of water and wine. The very sign of the cross; are all ancient human institutions, rites and symbols. Scratch a Christian and you come upon a Pagan. Christianity is rebaptized Paganism.—Rev. R. Heber Newton.

The history of science is the narrative of two contending powers; the expansive force of the human intellect on the one side and the compression arising from traditionary faith on the other. In 1,200 years when Christianity dominated the civilized world, the church had not made a single discovery that advanced the cause of humanity or ameliorated the condition of mankind.—Professor Draper.

A Novel Constitution.

A novel and modern if not always a model constitution is the new Mexican charter signed at Queretaro de Arteaga on January 31, 1917, and fully effective since May 1. It contains 136 articles and sixteen transitory articles, as against 128 articles and one transitory article in the Constitution of 1857. It is thus a document of considerable length, and an English translation published in parallel columns with that of 1857 by the American Academy of Political and Social Science, Philadelphia, makes a book of over 100 pages.

The Constitution of Queretaro is especially strict in regard to foreigners. Only Mexicans by birth or naturalization and Mexican companies have the right to acquire ownership in lands and waters, or to obtain concessions to develop mines, waters or mineral fuels. But we read:

"The nation may grant the same right to foreigners provided they agree before the Department of Foreign Affairs to be considered Mexicans in respect to such property, and accordingly not to invoke the protection of their governments in respect to the same, under penalty, in case of breach, of forfeiture to the nation of the property so acquired."

And within 100 kilometers from the frontiers and fifty kilometers from the seaboard no foreigner shall "under any conditions" acquire direct ownership of lands and waters.

This passage is followed immediately by a paragraph vesting in the national government ownership of all places of public worship, episcopal residences, rectories, seminaries, orphan asylums, convents or any other building erected for the purpose of furthering the tenets of any religious creed. The government has power to decide to what use such structures may be put; a place of public worship erected hereafter is national property; no charitable or educational institution may be administered by a religious sect or be under ecclesiastical patronage.

Monopolies are frowned upon except such as are reserved to the federal government, which is to control absolutely the coinage, the postal, telegraph and wireless services, and the issuance of bills. And there is a further exception in favor of limited patents and copyrights. But note this highly modern clause:

"The law will accordingly severely punish and the authorities diligently prosecute any accumulating or cornering by any one or more persons of necessities for the purpose of bringing about a rise in price; any act or measure which shall stifle or endeavor to stifle free competition in any production, industry, trade or public service . . . and in general whatever constitutes an unfair and exclusive advantage in favor of one or more specified person or persons to the detriment of the public in general or for any special class of society."

Trade unions are legalized and so are cooperative associations for selling abroad, provided they act under government supervision and do not sell necessities of life.

Compulsory education is provided up to fifteen years and compulsory military training is ordained for such periods as the various states may prescribe. Mexicans shall be preferred under equal circumstances to foreigners for all kinds of concessions and public employments. Just how far the compulsion extends it is hard to say, but at any rate "it shall be the duty of every Mexican citizen" to register not only for election purposes but for identification, to enlist in the national guard, to vote, to fill offices.

Eight hours is the maximum limit of a day's work. The maximum limit for night work is seven hours. Unhealthful and dangerous occupations are forbidden to all women and to children under sixteen; these cannot do night work in factories nor work in commercial establishments after 10 P. M. Children between twelve and sixteen may not work over six hours a day; the work of children under twelve cannot be made the subject of a contract. To every worker is guaranteed one day's rest in seven.

The provision safeguarding child-birth is broadly worded:

"Women shall not perform any physical work requiring considerable physical effort during the three months immediately preceding parturition; during the month following parturition they shall necessarily enjoy a period of rest and shall receive their salaries or wages in full and retain their employment and the rights they may have acquired under their contracts. During the period of lactation they shall enjoy two extraordinary daily periods of rest of one-half hour each, in order to nurse their children."

Employers must pay a minimum wage sufficient "to satisfy the normal needs of the life of the workman, his education and his lawful pleasures, considering him as the head of a family. In all agricultural, commercial, manufacturing or mining enterprises the workmen shall have the right to participate in the profits." Employers in every agricultural, industrial, mining "or other class of work" are bound to furnish to their workmen sanitary and comfortable homes at a rental not to exceed one-half of 1 per cent. a month of the assessed value. They "shall likewise establish schools, dispensaries and other services necessary to the community." In addition to this private munificence every labor centre having 200 or more inhabitants must also have a space of 5,000 square meters for public markets, municipal buildings and places of amusement. Saloons and gambling houses are barred from this zone. A church cannot be dedicated without the sanction of the Department of the Interior. Ministers are simply professional men. But freedom of religious belief is protected. The Congress may neither establish nor forbid any creed. All education must be secular; no man must be overworked or underpaid; Mexico is for the Mexicans. These are the underlying ideas of the new Constitution of Mexico.

Church and State in Ireland.

From the Public.

A constitution might be framed that would ensure complete separation of church and state. All constitutions ought to do that anyway. No government may properly regard a church organization differently than it does a secular body lawfully conducted. There should be equal treatment to all, none being allowed any privileges denied to others. Such provision, together with the usual guarantees of freedom of opinion and of expression, should remove all distrust. If nothing more underlies the opposition than fear lest opportunity be given for clerical oppression, such guarantees would make its continuance absurd.

But even if a minority should persist in opposition to self-government that is no reason why it should be withheld. Settlement of differences between parties in Ireland is Ireland's concern alone. To withhold home rule until all agree is to encourage a minority to hold out in order to coerce the majority. Every government ought to preserve the full freedom of each citizen bounded only by the equal freedom of every other. So long as it does that it can do nothing that the most suspicious will find oppressive. Should it fail to do that it must meet opposition from fair-minded persons, regardless of church affiliations.—(Editorial.)

Your editorial deserves careful reading by all. Your statement regarding the democratic implications of the principle of the separation of church and state, to which we all pay lip service, should be well pondered by such Singletaxers as still strangely support the undemocratic policy of exempting church property from taxation, and thereby subsidizing the proselyting activities of creeds accepted by only a part of the population, and forcing dissenters, against their conscience, to help pay for the spread of doctrines to which they are opposed. It is hard to comprehend how any opponent of special privilege can so lack consistency as to increase the tax burdens of all members of the community, in order to enable a single element to carry on its private propaganda only in part at its own cost, and largely at the cost of others.

In 1906, the latest year for which exact statistics are at hand, the church property of the country was valued at $1,257,575,867, having doubled in considerably less than twenty years. The increase of value from 1890 to 1906 was 85.1 per cent., while the increase in church edifices was only 35.3 per cent. It is thus evident that the value of church property to-day, the rate of increase remaining substantially the same, will approximate two billion dollars, much the greater part of which being in the form of land value; and that this part is growing more than twice as fast as building value. It is thus easy to calculate the annual loss to the nation due to this undemocratic exemption.

JAMES F. MORTON, JR.

A correspondent of a Los Angeles newspaper finds room for complaint in the fact that nobody but the unorthodox now calls attention to the peace precepts of Jesus, which the clergy ignore and demand war. A baccalaureate sermon by an eminent Baptist divine is quoted to this effect:

"God can only save the soul of Germany by the supreme licking of history. And we pray that Germany may be licked to a frazzle for the sake of her people's souls."

The devout correspondent who believes God reigns and the Bible is his revelation, avers that the war is directly traceable to the door of the church, and that its continuance is due to the clergy, of whom not one in a hundred has tried to turn the thoughts of his hearers to peace. They are making a fine record for men who pretend to preach the gospel of love. How would the creed sound if it read: "He who would be saved, before all else it is necessary that he be licked to a frazzle."

NOTES AT LARGE.

An announcement which is important if true, or at least interesting, is found in the June number of the American Sentinel, Washington, D. C. It is to the effect that Christ is coming; and we gather that he is on the way. Says our contemporary:

"He is coming. He will soon be here.
"Get ready. Get ready. And 'when He shall appear, we shall be like Him; for we shall see Him as He is.' Glory to God."

We have some difficulty in grasping this concept. In the book that tells us all we know about Christ, we find he was on earth nineteen hundred years ago, and departed this life without undergoing dissolution of the flesh. The book says that while in the company of his disciples, after having died and risen, he was separated from the group: We quote:

"And it came to pass, while he blessed them, that he was parted from them and carried up into heaven" (Luke xxiv, 51).

That is a difficult passage. Being "carried up into heaven" is no simple proposition. We have only the direction, but neither the means of conveyance, the speed, nor the distance of the destination. Heaven, to which he was carried up, is affirmed by theology to be beyond the farthest star, and the distance of the farthest star, like the caverns where ran the sacred river, Alph, is fathomless by man. The nearest one by traveling at the inconceivable speed of light, could be reached only by making the start some years ahead of the time the voyager expected to arrive. There is a star called Canopus, so immense that in comparison our sun would be as a flyspeck on a baseball, and so far away that its rays, coming toward us 186,000 miles per second, are a thousand years getting here. Heaven, whence it is assumed Christ will come, is beyond Canopus; and that is why we infer that since he is soon to arrive he must be now on the way. We marvel at the faith retained in the book that tells the story of the ascension, and in its promises. The idea that Christ is soon to come is older than the Christian church. As long ago as apostolic times the second advent was expected, and scoffers were quoted as saying: "Where is the promise of his coming?" (2 Peter iii, 4.) We are of the opinion that if Christ expected to be of further service to this world, he should have taken the precaution not to leave it. For those who go out over the harbor bar it is slow work beating back, and none has accomplished the return trip to our knowledge.

The editors of the Appeal to Reason are caught between the ages of 21 and 30 years—Mr. Kopelin being 30 and Mr. Gunn 24—and they registered on June 5. But they will seek exemption from military duty. They say: "Our conscience will not permit us to kill our fellow men nor to participate in war in any form. We cannot change our conscience." Many will feel with Messrs. Kopelin and Gunn that they cannot participate in any kind of war; but is it philosophical to say that a man by taking thought cannot change his conscience? His conscience is merely his settled conviction, working automatically. Conscience often goes with conversion. Convert these editors to Seventh-day Adventism, and their conscience would not permit them to work on Friday. Make Catholics of them, and conscience would deny them meat on Friday. Perhaps at one time Mr. Kopelin's conscience would not permit him to eat pork. The inflexible conscience generally has reference to religious matters. We once felt the again-bite of the inwit when playing a game of croquet on Sunday. We observe that that confirmed conscientious objector to war, the Public, has experienced a change of heart. That very clear-thinking organ of Singletax calls upon radicals for a searching of motives. "They must discover how much self-indulgence, how much feeling of vanity and self-conceit, there has been in devotion to principles and movements that set them apart and gave them distinction even as it called for sacrifice of material interests." With a vision of the Prussian rulers dominating western Europe, and our neighbor Canada under the reign of Kultur, the Public urges that no considerations should obscure for American radicals "the issue that now unites Americans in a common opposition to the Prussian conception of a superstate divinely ordained to impose, by military force, the will of its irresponsible leaders on an entire world." Thus, apparently, the pacifist may change his conscience. But as to participating in war, we are obliged to do that when we pay our tax; another step is taken when the citizen registers as of military age; and joining the ranks and actually fighting is merely making good what has already been begun. Henceforth, all is done under duress, and conscience is discharged from the direction of moral conduct. The pacifist or non-resistant has vindicated his principles when he has entered his solemn protest, as the Secularist vindicates his when he raises his voice against the imposition put upon him by religious enactments. If the argument of the Public is sound, the editors of the Appeal to Reason may change their conscience.

In an address given recently before three hundred Roman Catholic women in New York, Abbé Flynn, who was announced as a priest who had just come from the seat of war, told his hearers that there is now taking place on the battlefields of Europe a religious revival of far greater importance and proportions than the world has realized. This is another little papal scheme to advertise the Catholic church by its priests taking advantage of some war condition which would be quite impossible for one to verify as world-matters now stand. The cause for this revival, as stated by the Irish-French abbé, plainly exhibits the advertising features. He said the revival was due to the spiritualizing effects of constant exposure to death, and to the courage of the French priests who had accompanied the armies to the front. In our opinion neither of these reasons is calculated to produce the result here mentioned. The effect of war among soldiers has heretofore not been looked upon as developing normally any high ideals, whether moral or religious. Men accustomed to the sight of death are rarely moved by religious scruples on the firing line. And as to men becoming Roman Catholics on seeing the courage of Romish priests in war, the thing is so very absurd that a church must indeed be hard pressed for members to announce publicly such a reason for anyone's receiving God's "divine revelation." One does not need to go to war to see the mettle of the "true priest." There is Father McGrath of the Seamen's Mission of New York, who has a fight with the hoodlums of his neighborhood almost every day, and usually comes out victorious. Witness his pugilistic feats, and be converted to the true church.

The man behind Billy Sunday in New York has no fault to find with him. When the evangelist preached his farewell sermon, June 17, John D. Rockefeller, Jr., affirmed his belief in Sunday's sincerity, methods and effectiveness, and predicted that the results of the campaign would be apparent a year hence. "There is only one place for me," said Mr. Rockefeller, "and that is behind Billy Sunday." Before this announcement the public were of the opinion that Mr. Rockefeller was before Billy Sunday; at all events, the elaborate preparations of a financial nature made before the arrival of the notorious gospeler seemed to point to some mysterious source as the ground for Billy's remarkable confidence in the success of the meetings. As for the trail-hitters, Mr. Rockefeller confessed that he didn't know how many of them were sincere, but he would be satisfied with that phase of the revival as a "business proposition" if only ten per cent. were honestly desirous of doing the things that are symbolized by the ceremony of taking Sunday's hand. All this talk is so strikingly human and "unspiritual" that we cannot escape a smile while writing this note. The whole performance was practically a business venture. Just what particular returns it will bring to the Standard Oil Company will probably be better known "a year hence." That it has been without moral benefit to the people of the city in general is no longer a question with the thinking part of the public. That a few lazy rich persons may hereafter give up their pink teas in Lent, and confine their card-playing and dram-drinking to Palm Beach and Newport, is a bare possibility. As Billy was the rich man's savior, it is to be hoped that they duly appreciated his sweat-covered efforts to reclaim them; but as for the rest of us who belong to the working class, it looks very much as if we would work out the problem of our little life just as if the Hell-Evangelist had never come to town.

"Opposition to the war," says Miss Jane Addams of Hull House, Chicago, in a typical burst of pacifism, "is not necessarily cowardice." This would be true of war in a general sense, but it is far from being true in the present conflict when our country has engaged in an offensive war in order to protect its life and personal property against the inroads of a peculiarly dangerous and unscrupulous enemy. The advice given to the body of pacifists, which has arisen since this country's declaration of war with Germany, ought certainly to have a primary application to the nation that started the war and not to those nations that are striving to defend themselves. Those who want a speedy end of the war, let them emigrate to their dear Germany, and there apply their peace-loving sentiments. Let them convert the originators of the conflict, the gentle barbarians of Louvain, of Rheims, of the Lusitania, in whose feelings they have an interest that surpasses that which they have in the fate of the murdered men, women and children in the train of the Teutonic army and navy. It is no place for pacifists here. Their obvious field of labor is the German empire; and if they think their methods are wise ones, and that they possess some efficiency in carrying them out, they may render the world a great service if they confine their energies to the nation that wanted war and not to the nation that wanted peace, and is determined to have it.

The national food commissioner, Herbert Hoover, asks THE TRUTH SEEKER to print notes or abstracts of sermons preached in the churches on food conservation. We are not generally dependent on the pulpit for information about public questions, and it is our opinion that readers of this paper are about the last persons who would take it from that source. Probably, being intelligent, they are of the saving class anyway. We live in a community where the residents, by breaking up unused spaces, are trying in a bungling and unskilful way to overcome the food shortage with home-raised vegetables. There is excuse this year, perhaps, for exhorting people to serve and eat less food. With proper organization for cultivating vacant land, next year should be a year of plenty, for untold acres within fifty miles of New York are strangers to the plow and hoe. It will take more than one year, even with the parsons preaching about it, to change the people's way of setting their tables, and by that time the shortage should be over; for the country has the land and the workers, who need only to be brought together. According to reports, there are thousands of "food sharks," speculators in the necessities of life, who are getting rich on the high prices they have induced. Let the ministers preach to them. They will be found in the congregations on Sunday.

A lot of ministers are traveling the by and forbidden paths. Some of the instances have a religious import that make them of interest to others than the police. Take the case of the Rev. Ira A. Burnell, who has been presiding over a mission in Kansas City, Mo. He experienced more than a pastoral affection for Mae Closser, a 17-year-old girl who attended his mission, and declared his love. As he is married and the father of three children, the girl questioned whether it was right. The Rev. Mr. Burnell in her presence took it to the Lord in prayer, and got results. "He arose from his knees," the girl testifies, "and said God told him that love was first and we might have each other freely." When doubts arose in her mind, he threw another prayer, and the girl surrendered. To the police, who found him rooming with Miss Closser and gave him quarters in jail, he said he was married to her "in the eyes of God." Taking that view of it, his wife said she would forgive him. He is a very devout man, quite convinced that God is on his side, and grieves that others should be skeptical. Religious organizations generally condemn this sort of thing, but religion itself is readily adjustable to such irregularities. The piety of the Rev. Burnell cannot be impeached, whatever may be said of his morals.

"LONDON, June 20.—Sixteen children, only two of whom were more than five years of age, the victims of the last German air raid on London, were given a public funeral this afternoon and their bodies were laid in a common grave in an East End cemetery, over which a monument will be placed. Floral offerings bore the inscription: 'To our children murdered by German aircraft.'"

The scriptures covering such cases order the invader to "kill every male among the little ones," but the kaiser's zeal carries him further. Some of the little ones killed by the murderous machines were girls.

Mrs. Annie Besant, who before the mental lesion occurred that made a Theosophist of her was a Freethought advocate, appears to have become the Emma Goldman of India. Last year she was expelled from the Presidency of Bombay for preaching revolt, and now she is banished for the same offense from the city of Madras, and her lecturing and writings are prohibited circulation. We have read some of Mrs. Besant's late writings without perceiving how they could do either harm or good.

The pope has given permission for night mass at the Catholic church on Coney Island. The people who frequent or dwell at that pleasure resort must still have funds that the other fakers have not captured.

THE TRUTH SEEKER

Published weekly by the Truth Seeker Company, President, George E. Macdonald; Secretary, James A. Conway, 62 Vesey street, New York.

Entered at the Postoffice, New York, N. Y., as second-class matter.

Address communications and make drafts, checks, postoffice and express money orders payable to THE TRUTH SEEKER, 62 Vesey street, New York.

Subscription Rates.

Single subscription in advance . . $3.00
Two new subscribers 5.00
One subscription two years in advance 5.00
One subscription and one new subscriber, in one remittance . . 5.00
To all foreign countries except Mexico, 50 cents per annum extra.
Subscriptions received for any length of time under a year at the rate of 25 cents per month. Can be begun at any time.
Single copies, 10 cents.

SPECIAL NOTICE.—We shall be obliged to our readers if they will send us the name and address of any Free-thinker who is not a regular subscriber.

OBJECTS.

It is the object of THE TRUTH SEEKER to educate the people out of religious superstition. It denies the inspiration and infallibility of the Bible, and asserts the human origin of that book. It denies the existence of the theological heaven and hell, but as to the existence and immortality of the soul neither affirms nor denies. It waits for evidence.

THE TRUTH SEEKER upholds the theory of Evolution, believing that to be the solution of the question of the origin, growth, and development of the animal kingdom, including man. THE TRUTH SEEKER believes that the answer to the questions Whence? and Whither? can be given only by Science.

THE TRUTH SEEKER holds that morality and ethics—or man's relation to man—are entirely independent of creed or religion, and are founded on rules developed by experience.

In current politics THE TRUTH SEEKER takes no side or part. In general it holds to the principles of freedom enunciated by the Founders of the Republic.

THE TRUTH SEEKER believes in Free Speech, Free Press, and Free Mail; in full discussion of all sides of all subjects, and affords those having new and worthy thoughts, clearly stated, a generous and welcome hearing, each contributor being responsible for his own opinion. We neither indorse an idea by printing it, nor condemn it by exclusion.

THE TRUTH SEEKER is the recognized medium of communication between the Liberals of the country, and is edited each week for their information, instruction, entertainment, and support against religious error and mental slavery and in maintenance of their equal civil and religious rights as citizens of the United States.

The Editor invites communications on the subjects to which these pages are devoted.

POLITICAL PRINCIPLES.

(THE NINE DEMANDS OF LIBERALISM.)

1. We demand that churches and other ecclesiastical property shall be no longer exempt from taxation.

2. We demand that the employment of chaplains in Congress, in the Legislatures, in the navy and militia, and in prisons, asylums and all other institutions supported by public money shall be discontinued.

3. We demand that all public appropriations for educational and charitable institutions of a sectarian character shall cease.

4. We demand that all religious services now sustained by the government shall be abolished; and especially that the use of the Bible in the public schools, whether ostensibly as a text-book or avowedly as a book of religious worship, shall be prohibited.

5. We demand that the appointment by the President of the United States or by the governors of the various states, of all religious festivals and fasts shall wholly cease.

6. We demand that the judicial oath in the courts and in all other departments of the government shall be abolished, and that simple affirmation under the pains and penalties of perjury shall be established in its stead.

7. We demand that all laws directly or indirectly enforcing the observance of Sunday as the Sabbath shall be repealed.

8. We demand that all laws looking to the enforcement of "Christian" morality shall be abrogated and that all laws shall be conformed to the requirements of natural morality, equal rights, and impartial liberty.

9. We demand that not only in the Constitution of the United States and of the several states, but also in the practical administration of the same, no privileges or advantages shall be conceded to Christianity or any other special religion; that our entire political system shall be founded and administered on a purely secular basis; and that whatever changes shall prove necessary to this end shall be consistently, unflinchingly, and promptly made.

Letters of Friends

Readers desirous of communicating with the writers of the letters in this department may address them in care of THE TRUTH SEEKER, 62 Vesey street, New York, N. Y., and the letters will be re-addressed and forwarded.

A TERRESTRIAL HEAVEN.

From L. H. Kreitman, New York.

To the Editor of The Truth Seeker:

Lord Byron has written:

"But words are things, and a small drop of ink

Falling, like dew, upon a thought, produces

That which makes thousands, perhaps millions, think."

In the great alembic of life the mixing of the ingredients of thought and ink, truly as the poet says, moves the world. Like everything else certain thoughts are acceptable to one; others abhorrent. Consequently, a dispute arose in THE TRUTH SEEKER about how much space should be allotted Socialism and economics, and I wish to take my stand with the present policy of the paper as against an increased prominence to these topics. On the other hand, it is idle to argue as one of your subscribers did, against the exploitation of these subjects at all in your pages. You cannot absolutely separate religion from economics. The primary factor in life is self-maintenance, or making a living. This struggle for subsistence has created an inequitable economic régime that spells horror and desperation for millions of us. Discontent is rife, but strange to say not as intense as industrial disorder should make it. Two explanations apparently cover this. First, theology has colored up so enticing a picture of a celestial after-abode, that the struggle in this world is taken for an introduction to ease and security in the hereafter. A banker might discuss this point from the view-point of a promissory note with very unstable collateral. The second explanation is the palliation of conditions by charity—charity in Christ's name.

What is charity? In the last two thousand years, ever active and essentially noble as it is, has it lessened one horror, eased one load? Will two thousand more years of charity do aught else than salve and bandage the wounds? An illuminating insight into the utter inutility of Christian charity is derived from the story of L'Abbe Pierre Froment, the hero of Emile Zola's "Paris," who, as he renounces his priesthood and belief, cries out in travail of spirit: "The poor man, who is the wretched dupe of it all, no longer believes in Paradise, but requires that each and all should be rewarded according to their deserts upon this earth; and thus eternal life becomes the good goddess, and desire and labor the very laws of the world, while the fruitfulness of woman is again honored, and the idiotic nightmare of Hell is replaced by glorious Nature whose travail knows no end. Leaning upon modern Science, clear Latin reason sweeps away the ancient Semitic conception of the Gospel. For eighteen hundred years, Christianity has been hampering the march of mankind towards truth and justice. And mankind will only resume its evolution on the day when it abolishes Christianity, and places the Gospel among the works of the wise, without taking it any longer as its absolute and final law."

Ah, then, if the demand for the full reward on this earth discards charity, a fundamental cure is necessary to accomplish this full reward. Socialism is offered as the probable industrial solution. In the last few numbers of THE TRUTH SEEKER,

Socialism was criticised as having failed at repeated trials previously, and the point is therefore implied that it is a false philosophy and method.

It is inexact to declare Socialism has previously fallen down. There cannot be such a thing as a trial of Socialism. Its plan is not a sporadic, spasmodic compactness that can be folded up and moved about like a tent. Certain ideas that are characteristic Socialistic principles; these more humane and enlightened industrial standards that we are steadily acquiring, for instance, may be instituted at any time. They may perhaps fail on account of inopportune or improper execution. Industrial organisms change and modify like the physical organs at all times, and certain fundamental changes make imperative an entirely new scheme of things. For example, feudalism was impossible for the lusty baby that was born out of the wedlock of new machinery and better water-routes. This babe was christened Capitalism and grew up strong and healthy. Apparently it has served its day, or will soon have done so. At any rate, its senility is working harm on our social status by manipulating profits as an exclusive privilege for a scant handful as against the remaining indigent many. It is the necessity itself of a change in the lop-sided social structure that is bringing on the change. Step by step, inch by inch, new industrial methods will be inaugurated until that time when a new economic psychology will prevail.

Note one essential condition of this change, please. It will not be effected by a bloody physical revolution. The latter is only a phase of certain industrial conditions and is of itself of no fundamental utility. The inception of Socialism will come as a logical, orderly development out of Capitalism, with a retention of all the finer Capitalistic elements and the renouncement of those aspects that the newer industrial standards will demand. It is futile to argue, therefore, that "Socialism has been found wanting before" in view of this explanation that Capitalism is the progenitor of the former. The present world war appears to the discerning to come under Haeckel's "Saltatory" theory in so far as it will unquestionably hasten the elemental social structural changes.

The combination of human direction and application with evolution in nature and time itself makes Socialism inevitable. And this combination is doing this one more thing, it is exerting a powerful change on the erstwhile power of religion. We have already seen how the new social consciousness spurns the promised heavenly guerdon in place of the present earthly satisfaction. We have also seen that charity is only an excuse for the iniquity of exploitation. A still greater Knight of Reason enters the jousts. The probing idea of a Divine manager of things. Doubt gleams from nearly every intellectual eye. In one book John Draper said that he believes in a supreme power but not a supreme Being. In his "Intellectual Development of Europe" he declares that "the equilibrium and movement of humanity are altogether physiological phenomena." Accordingly, if civilization and life are put on a physiological or material basis, the solution of our ills will naturally not be sought for in spiritual sources.

"Man feels no ill but what to man he owes; The earth abundant furnishes a store To sate the rich and satisfy the poor."

So sang Henry Fielding. The complaint however points out the remedy, too. "The earth abundant" should truly abolish all chance of famine and poverty—that dreary, hateful poverty than which not even the Billy Sunday Hell is worse. And yet despite plenty of potentialities for universal happiness and good-living, and above all, despite a God of love and mercy and all-powerfulness, we are suffering under the heaviest burden of wretchedness, disease and degeneracy imaginable. This condition we attempt to mitigate by praying to God. Now, praying oftentimes does bring comfort and added strength to the individual. He breathes a hope or aspiration out of the innermost recesses of his heart, and the intensity of the desire for the attainment of this prayer, may bring temporary solace and sustenance. The genesis of this inspiration lies in the subconsciousness of the individual praying, and it is a keen pity that this inspiration must surely die out owing to a lack of response from Above when prayed to. Perhaps the immeasurableness of space disintegrates the prayer as it wafts upwards and its message is thus lost. Prayer has been of less use even than charity.

To hide the failure of these two chief religious tenets Christianity has invested itself in a strange ritualistic garb. Its frumpieries and mummeries, its formalisms and incongruities, its numerous insipidities of all kinds, serve to obscure the essential facts of Christianity's futility. Stuff one's head with ceremonials and methodologies and the form will be taken for the substance.

Come, then, let us be honest. God or Christ, cannot save the world, neither by his love or his power. It is true there is a set saying that "Christ saves." It is not Christ, it is fear falsely instilled that "saves"—the false fear of an unredeemed death, of an endless punishment in Hell. The only real safety lies in the abolition of Hell as a human concept. Morality is not determined by death-bed repentance but by the laws of social needs and progress. It is admittedly a beautiful work the religious missions are doing in rescuing degenerates from sin, in rehabilitating the downtrodden and sodden sinners. There is a work of true moral resuscitation and physical rejuvenation. But is it Christ who is helping them pull the victims out of the pit? How ridiculous. An all-powerful loving Jesus would have averted the original downfall. If he can and does refashion one's life anew, it were much easier to guide the weak human feet away from the pitfalls in life.

Away with the absurdity of it all. Throw the sunlight of reason on the dark obscure corners of theology. See the rats of superstition, the vermin of ignorance, the dirt of biblical idolatry, the disease of Ultramontaniam, the stench of hell-fear, the mustiness of evangelism—see all that brood scurry away from the new light and die of its brightness.

Science is our Messiah. It has fought its way throughout the ages and left its crusaders slain and bleeding by the path. Religion has reddened its hands in their murder and then wiped the blood on the skirts of its Christ.

Would there were a God to help man along in his path. We have sought him and to-day we need him more than ever. But we fear that only the hand and the heart and the brain of man on this earth has wrought the products of time, and no sign of supernatural partnership will be vouchsafed us.

God and heaven are anxiously needed only while the condition of man is not yet properly developed. When better living conditions become our lot, an after-life of peace and comfort will be so urgent. The need of heaven forces the desire for it.

WORD "IMMORTALITY" OBJECTIONABLE.

From E. Summers, Washington.

To the Editor of The Truth Seeker:

I wish some doctrinal, spiritualistic writer, who loves to employ the word "immortality" with reference to the human soul after the death of the body would consider the following axiom:

Whatever has a beginning must in the nature of things have an ending, as everything that ends must have had a beginning.

It is absurd to assert that a thing that ends now has existed from all eternity, or that a thing that commences to exist now may exist to all eternity. Both are impossible physically, mathematically and logically. I am sick of the continued use of the word "immortality" with reference to the soul, and this of course includes consciousness. Let's quit such nonsense.

NATURE'S GREATEST GIFT.

From E. E. Kusel, California.

To the Editor of The Truth Seeker:

Reason is only a supposition that a thing or theory is true. If it be demonstrated that the theory is false, the structure or argument, built on the sand formation of reason, falls. Intuition does not depend upon reason or so-called logical deductions. To psychometrize we must wait for 'the still small voice' of intuition and not attempt to find truth by material roads of reason and logic."

"Relax all bodily functions and thus quiet material operation and you may read so-called inert matter, as you would read printed pages. Psychometry is miracle-made, natural, or occultism ingrafted into every day life. 'Nothing is hidden that shall not be revealed,' and humanity stands at the door of the New Day when 'none shall say unto his neighbor, Know the Lord for the Truth shall set them free.'"

I quote the above from an article entitled "Psychometry" written for the "Aletheian," a theosophical publication. Geo. W. Carey is the author of that article. I should like to see some of our reasoning scientists tear that Carey argument all to pieces. Evidently Mr. Carey does not know what logic is, for he, like the faithist, is speculating and not reasoning. All such as "know the Lord" is nonsense stuff—an expression meaning absolutely nothing. Our reasoning may sometimes fail, but without reason we know nothing. Beyond reason all is blank. I used to talk like Brother Carey, but since getting a jolt to awaken me I confess all my occult "knowledge" was a lot of fool junk that I got from religion and spiritualism. I wanted something on the line of hallucination, so I studied on "occult" lines. Like Brother Jamieson I reasoned my way out of all superphysical ideas and now I am free indeed. I do not "psychometrize" any more, so now I have my equilibrium and can REASON. As Thomas Paine said: "The choicest gift of God (Nature) to man is Reason." Reason is the weapon of the Rationalist and is the shrapnel-shell that is tearing things asunder and bringing people to their senses.

CHRISTIAN OR BARBARIAN, WHICH?

From Jim Ebb, Missouri.

To the Editor of The Truth Seeker:

A rather important member of our family is a dog named Fox. For twelve years Fox has been the constant companion and playfellow of our only son. Fox was about five inches from the tip of his curly tail to the point of his little nose, when I brought him home and placed him upon the boy's bed; he, the boy, at that time being ill with measles. Fox proved to be such a cheerful companion that the boy soon laughed himself well.

Fox has always been a "belligerent," and the friendship he has been able to establish in dogdom is quite limited. He has fought almost every hound, mastiff, bull and cur from Kansas City to the Rocky Mountains, and he seldom ever gets the worst of it. If he should, he retires to lick his wounds and then again, when the opportunity presents, will take up the fight where he left off.

But there is something emphatically distinct in the way Fox conducts his dog war, and that is highly commendable and worthy the emulation of all Christian soldiers. Fox never plants a mine under the other dog to blow him into eternity without warning, never drops a bomb upon his unsuspecting head, never smothers him with poisonous gases, never impales a little puppy dog upon a bayonet and, listen, Fox will not fight a mother dog or a puppy.

If I am not greatly misinformed, Christian soldiers will do all these things. In fact this very morning I have read in the paper that a bomb had been dropped upon a school house, exploding in a room where were sixty-four little fellows from five to seven years of age, that the explosion killed many, tore the arms and legs from others, that the room was filled with the screams of the little sufferers crying distractedly for their mothers. And while Christian soldiers do things like this they call upon Almighty God to prosper and bless them in it.

Yet we have been taught for two thousand years that Christianity, with many a word synonymous with the word civilization, works to make the human animal more kindly, more compassionate. We have been led to believe that all men, starting equal, one has surpassed another only when he has excelled in acts and deeds of human kindness; and after all to come to the realization that one man is better than another only in the amount of gold he has been able to filch from the common humanity.

But taking off your smoked glasses, and looking it squarely in the face, applying natural law, natural justice, natural instinct, the question before the jury is this: Which is the Christian and which the Barbarian, Fox or the War Lord? Then if the jury decides that Fox is Barbarian, how much has Christianity and civilization advanced and benefited the human race? Speak up, Stell, what think ye?

A NEW RECRUIT.

From Fred Wessels, California.

To the Editor of The Truth Seeker:

A friend of mine, Mr. Robert Taylor, gave me a few copies of THE TRUTH SEEKER, and I beg to state, that it is the sanest and most common sense talking paper I ever read. I am with you in the cause of humanity. Keep up the cause of Liberty. I will help all I can by putting your papers and books in the hands of friends, and whenever they will do any good. Enclose check for $6.00 and order. I congratulate Mr. Franklin Steiner on his article of June 2 to "William Sunday, the kaiser of the United States." I wish you could print a few more articles about the kaiser, William II. of Germany like "The Kaiser's Prayers; a favorite story in Belgium." They certainly are fine, and make good liver medicine. We ought to send a few of these copies to "von Gott," Berlin. Could you send me a copy of each piece? I think you will like to know who I am, so I will tell you. I am a young German (but not a patriot) twenty-four years old, raised up in the Roman Catholic church; but when I saw all kinds of humbug happen in said organization, I denounced it as one of the biggest blocks in the path of human progress. I should be glad if you would let me write my life story for publication in THE TRUTH SEEKER. I would tell what I saw as a member of the Roman Catholic church. Please let me know what you think about it. I was living next door to the head priest of the church for eighteen years until I came to California. I hope you will receive this letter in good order, and wish you all success in your work for humanity.

SINCERE APPRECIATION.

From Frank H. Ford, New York.

To the Editor of The Truth Seeker:

Please find enclosed money for renewal of the best weekly paper on the subjects of religion and world matters that it has been my fortune to meet with. I have taken it for fifteen or twenty years. I kept note of the time so I could brag about it, for surely it's a great paper and should be supported in fine style.

Personally I can do very little in a financial way with my twenty-seven and one-half cents an hour; but my heart is with it, and the copies I receive are often taken to the factory for others to read. Last week I took the article of Franklin Steiner to the factory and it was read by at least twenty men. It certainly was fine. Oh! how I do hate a demagogue, one who misleads people for money. THE TRUTH SEEKER has some of the best writers I ever read, both men and women, with occasionally one of those animals that Christ is supposed to have ridden into Jerusalem. More success to THE TRUTH SEEKER, say I.

A RATIONALIST FRATERNITY.

From Philip R. Davis, Chicago.

To the Editor of The Truth Seeker:

In view of the fact that I have been a Rationalist and a reader of your publication for the last ten years, I was indeed pleased to learn that there is at last fomenting some concerted effort at linking together Freethought advocates by means, the only way it can be done, incidentally, of a fraternal organization.

The rise of such an institution would not only be marked by an unprecedented growth but would eventually, along with the invaluable TRUTH SEEKER and other Agnostic organs, be the means of rationalizing the world, for organized propaganda is the only way to combat the sickening spread of superstition infested religion, and all religions have that common bond, superstition.

I know such an organization can be realized and on an international scale, for I myself, while attending the Northwestern University Law School gathered around me unaffiliated broad-minded men and with them organized the Pi Epsilon Delta Legal Fraternity, which was based on the principle of freedom of thought and speech, liberty, justice, and independence, and recognition of the right to individual conviction on all matters. The influence of this body which was organized in the winter of 1913, has been felt wherever there has been an attempt in legal circles to muzzle the mouths of independent thinkers and talkers. I am proud to say that some of our local judiciary are honorable members.

Let's get together and make Rationalism and its vital message potent factors in the lives of those who have hitherto been deprived of knowledge that comes from exercising the brain. Let's make our influence for good felt in the circles where faith and foibles have corroded that which the religious glacier couldn't destroy, the public forum.

If the Rationalists in each city got to know each other, the rest would be easy. Let each Freethinker send his name and address and phone number, as well as city and state, to THE TRUTH SEEKER, if it will undertake the task to be suggested. THE TRUTH SEEKER, with that information could then send to a prominent Rationalist in each city, a list of names of Rationalists in that particular city, the idea being for the respective individuals chosen by THE TRUTH SEEKER to proceed to get in touch with the people on their respective lists, call a meeting, organize locally, inform THE TRUTH SEEKER of the election results, select delegates to a national convention, make a national fraternal body out of it, and adopt THE TRUTH SEEKER for its part in the plan, as the official organ.

And take it from one who has been through the mill of organization, it's not more difficult to do than stand for the things a public speaker on an unpopular subject, has to stand for, and our Agnosticism is decidedly unpopular in some parts "o' this yere town o' oun."

Fellow Freethinkers! There's no time like now. Will you be slackers in the drive for concerted effort to organize what should be the greatest fraternity for liberation of the intellect that the world ever known, or will you volunteer to do your bounden bit? Just think of the nine points enunciated on the editorial page of THE TRUTH SEEKER, and think how far we are from a full realization of them under our present conditions, and think of what unity could do.

DEATH OF R. B. KELLY.

To the Editor of The Truth Seeker:

It is with sadness that I chronicle the death of R. B. Kelly of Clinton, Mo., on Jan. 3, who had long been a subscriber to your paper. He was born in Ohio in 1858, a graduate of Oberlin College, and taught in the colleges for several years. He was a member of the state Grange and deeply interested in the welfare and advancement of the industrial and producing classes. The churches, he claimed, were established by monarchs and used by the predatory classes to rob and enslave the people, and that this government will not be free while they exist. He regarded the priests and clergy as drones and parasites, and desired no religious services at his funeral. His wishes were respected. He was a member of the Rationalist Association, and outspoken in advocating its principles. I asked him when dying if he had changed his views on religion. He answered No. THE TRUTH SEEKER was his favorite, and the last paper he read. He was honest and upright in his dealings, and kind and gentle in his manner. You may continue his paper to me.

JANET KELLY.

CHARLES D. WALKER.

The announcement of Charles D. Walker's death, Sunday evening, May 13, 1917, at his home at Georgetown, Minnesota, was a great surprise to the community but few people being aware that the end was so near. Although a sufferer for several months, he exercised unusual patience and consideration throughout his sickness; ever thankful for every act of kindness, and anxious to do everything which might hasten the recovery which he so much desired; one of the most patient sufferers it has been our experience to be with.

Mr. Walker came west many years ago, residing with the Northrop family for the past twenty-seven years, and by his sterling qualities of justice and kindness, he had won the love and respect of all who knew him. He held the office of city recorder of Georgetown for several years, every vote being cast for him at the last election in March. He was also a member of the Modern Brotherhood of America since Dec. 28, 1898. He was known as a man representing ambitious purposes and character. He regarded life as a great opportunity to gain knowledge, to increase usefulness, and to add to the sum total of happiness. He believed in the brotherhood of the race and in the fatherhood that embraces all, and that respects the right of individual opinion, honestly held; that regards mankind as learners who though making mistakes are facing toward the light, and are ever seeking the highest good that shall continue to grow better and brighter, with added knowledge, and the lapse of time. His mental horizon was too broad, his spiritual insight too clear; his emotions too tender, to accept the limitations of a human creed.

Mr. Walker was born in Johnson county, Missouri, Nov. 7, 1856, and was therefore 60 years 6 months and 6 days old. An only brother resides at Leighton, Iowa.

After the funeral services at his home in Georgetown, May 16, his remains were conveyed to Leighton, Iowa, where final services were conducted on May 20.

We shall cherish his memory, and emulate his virtues, and we shall entertain a hope, even if we cannot all heartily believe that his loving spirit still continues in conscious existence and that we shall meet him again when life's work here is done. And now—

"Farewell! A word that must be and hath been,
A sound that makes us linger—yet farewell!"

"Cover the embers,
And put out the light,
Toil comes with the morning,
And rest with the night."

The book is complete,
And closed like the day;
And the hand that has written it
Lays it away."

In loving remembrance,
MRS. CHARLOTTE NORTHROP,
MR. and MRS. J. H. NORTHROP.
Georgetown, Minn., June 12, 1917.

[Mr. Walker had been for many years a subscriber to THE TRUTH SEEKER and a loyal friend and supporter of the cause of Freethought. We join the signatures to the above letter in their tribute to the worth of this noble man and useful citizen.—Ed. T. S.]

THE GREAT INGERSOLL CONTROVERSY containing the

FAMOUS CHRISTMAS SERMON

By

COL. ROBERT G. INGERSOLL

With the heated replies of the ministers and Colonel Ingersoll's rejoinders to them.

Paper, 213 pages. Price 35 cents

Address: The Truth Seeker Co.

62 VESEY STREET - NEW YORK

THE REASON WHY. A Story for Freethinkers. By Ernest E. Russell.
Paper, 50 cents.

CHILDREN'S CORNER FOR BOYS AND GIRLS YOUNG AND OLD

"Between the dark and the daylight,
When the night is beginning to lower,
Comes a pause in the day's occupations
That is known as the Children's Hour."

FREETHOUGHT CALENDAR. CONDUCTED BY FRANKLIN STEINER.

Jean Jacques Rousseau, June 28, 1712-July 2, 1778.

Jean Jacques Rousseau, emphatically the philosopher of the French Revolution and sometimes called its prelude, was born in Geneva, Switzerland, the old home of John Calvin, June 28, 1712. He was the son of of a watchmaker. Of his early life nothing is known except what he has told us himself in his "Confessions," a work that has become a classic. Here is a plain unvarnished tale that paints him as he was, yet defying any other man to assert truthfully that he was better. As a youth he gave no promise of the talents which have so greatly distinguished him. In 1725 he was apprenticed to an engraver, from whom he ran away in 1728. He had been born a Protestant, but becoming acquainted with Madam de Warens, who took a fancy to him and sent him to a Roman Catholic college in Turin, he renounced Protestantism. At her house he found a home for three years. He wandered to Lyons, where he became a tutor. The year 1741 found him in Paris, and in 1743 he obtained the position of secretary to the French ambassador in Venice. He returned to Paris in 1745, where he led a precarious life studying and copying music for a livelihood. He became acquainted with Diderot, Grimm, D'Holbach, Madam D'Epinay and other distinguished writers, and became a contributor to the Encyclopaedia. At this time he formed an attachment for Therese le Vasseur, whom he afterwards married. In 1750 he won a prize for an essay offered by the Academy of Dijon, which brought him prominently before the public as an author. He afterwards brought out an operetta and a Letter on French Music. In 1760 he published a novel, "Julie ou La Nouvelle Heloise," which was followed by "Le Contrat Social" and "Emile ou de l'Education," which included his well known work, "Confession of Faith of a Savoyard Vicar." Here, in a paradox, he attacked the popular religion. It was condemned and publicly burned both in Paris and Geneva. He was obliged to flee, going finally to England, where he made friends of Hume, Boswell and other literary lights. In May, 1767, he returned to France, where he often lived in great poverty, dying near Paris, July 2, 1778. Rousseau struggled against hypochondria, which often made his life miserable. He was not what is called a practical man, and sometimes did not carry out his own principles consistently. But his great work was the giving of these principles to the world. Professor Lowell says: "He was the father of modern democracy and without him our Declaration of Independence would have wanted some of those sentences in which the immortal longings of the poor and the dreams of solitary enthusiasts were at least affirmed as axioms in the manifesto of a nation, so that all the world might hear." David Hume well said that he was entitled to a place among the first writers of the age.

Other events of which the past week is the anniversary are:

June 24, Robert Dale Owen died, 1877. Dumas born, 1803.
June 25, John Horne Tooke born, 1736. Custer massacred by the Indians, 1876.
June 26, Josiah Warren born, 1798.
June 27, Harriet Martineau died, 1876. Protestants burnt in Smithfield, 1555.
June 28, Declaration of Independence presented to Congress by Thomas Jefferson, 1776.
June 29, Henry Clay died, 1852. Pius VII. condemns reading of the Bible by Papal Bull, 1817.
June 30, Guiteau hanged, 1882.

A Torpedoed Captain's Story.

"I will now give a short account of the events we have experienced," wrote Benjamin Chave, master of the Alnwick Castle, in a report to her owners of the torpedoing of his ship without warning, 320 miles west of the Scilly Islands, about daybreak on March 19. It has been said, remarks the New York Sun, that out of the war would come a remarkable literature of heroism, fortitude and sacrifice when peace was concluded. We are already getting it from unaccustomed hands while peace seems far off.

This story of a plain seaman, told in a letter to his employers with no thought that it would be read by others, is as graphic and absorbing a narrative as anything Defoe or Clark Russell ever wrote, and it is entitled to the name of literature.

When the Alnwick Castle met disaster there were on board of her a crew of 100 men, fourteen passengers and twenty-five of the crew of the torpedoed collier transport Trevose, who had been rescued in boats the evening before. When the Alnwick Castle was struck Captain Chave was taking his morning coffee, easy in his mind because no less than eight lookouts were scanning the sea. Twenty minutes later all the ship's boats were in the water, and the Alnwick Castle was going down by the head. A Marconi operator and Captain Chave dropped into a boat just in time to escape the fate of the ship, which, like a sentient thing, gave a farewell blast of her whistle as she went down.

The submarine, "silent and sinister," lay near, but with the plunge of the Alnwick Castle "she proceeded northeast after a steamer which was homeward bound about four miles away, and soon after we saw," said Captain Chave, "a tall column of water and knew that she had found another victim."

Telling the officers in the other boats "to steer between east and east-northeast for the Channel," the master gave his attention to his own charges. He had with him eighteen of his crew, six third class passengers and five sailors of the Trevose. "After dark I saw no more of the other boats," he says. That night the sea rose before a fierce and bitter wind that blew the spray aboard in sheets. It was necessary to furl the sail and stream a sea anchor. When day broke both sea anchor and rudder were gone. The problem of reaching land 300 miles away became graver. "There was too much sea to sail," says the master. "We manœuvred with oars, while I lashed two oars together and made another sea anchor. We spent the whole of Tuesday fighting the sea, struggling with oars to assist the sea anchor to head the boat up to the waves, constantly soaked with cold spray and pierced with the bitter wind, which was now from the north."

Thirst soon became a torment. Water was served out twice a day, a dipper to two men, "which made a portion about equal to one-third of a condensed milk can." A tin of milk had to do for four men. As to food, there was enough of that, but it was a question how long dry throats could swallow it. Wednesday the iron step of the mast gave way, but shift was made to improvise a new one with an axe and "a piece of wood fitted to support the boat cover strongback." Murmurs for more water were now heard in the boat. A few of the weaker men got a dole. Hail fell Wednesday night, and it was caught in clothing and eagerly lapped up. Some of the lightheaded men now began to drink sea water. By Thursday most of the men had become helpless, and some were raving in delirium. A cattleman died and his body was slid overboard with little said. It was to be a bad night. Let the master take up the story:

"Soon after dark the sea became confused and angry; I furlled the tiny reef sail and put out the sea anchor. At 8 P. M. we were swamped by a breaking sea and I thought all was over. A moan of despair rose in the darkness, but I shouted to them, 'Bale! Bale! Bale!' and assured them that the boat could not sink. How they found the balers and bucket in the dark I don't know, but they managed to free the boat."

By this time some of the men had lost their reason; one was pugnacious and dangerous. On March 23 the master, "with the help of the few who remained able," hoisted the sail, and headway was made with hope. But not a wisp of smoke was anywhere to be seen. Another night of horrors, and with daylight "the appeals for water were so angry and insistent" that Captain Chave "deemed it best to make an issue at once." Much of the water was lost between the cursing and snatching men. Only one more issue remained, a fact which Chave kept to himself. A fireman now died, and other men were too far gone to swallow water. No one could take food any longer. "Our throats," says the captain, "were afire, our lips furred, our limbs numbed, our hands white and bloodless."

Friday morning four men died, but there was no one strong enough to throw the bodies into the sea. About 1:30 p. m. of that day the French steamer Venezia came up, and the long agony was over. Not one of the survivors could climb the ship's ladder. The boat drifted off with the dead men in it. Shots were fired to sink her, but they went wide.

Five days later Captain Chave had not regained the use of his hands and feet. He believes that another night without water in the boat would have finished everybody. Chave was the right man for this terrible adventure: his bravery had been previously recognized by the Royal Humane Society, and he has given us a story that is powerful and moving in its simplicity and its vigor of style.

Frankness Rewarded.

In a Canadian camp somewhere in England a second George Washington has been found. He, in company with several others, had been granted four days' leave, and, as usual, wired for extension. But no hackneyed excuse was his. In fact, it was so original that it had been framed and now hangs in a prominent spot in the battalion orderly-room. It ran as follows: "Nobody dead, nobody ill; still going strong, having a good time, and got plenty of money. Please grant extension."

And he got it!—Pittsburg Chronicle-Telegraph.

Family Trait.

At the annual prize-day of a certain school, the head boy rose to give his recitation.

"Friends, Romans, countrymen," he vociferated, "lend me your ears!"

"There," commented the mother of a defeated pupil, sneeringly, "that's Mrs. Biggs's boy! He wouldn't be his mother's son if he didn't want to borrow something."—Tit-Bits.

Bad Little Girl.

Archbishop Trench, seeing one day in Dublin a little girl trying to reach a door knocker, came to her assistance.

"Rap hard!" said the little innocent.

He did.

"Now, run like the very devil!"—Dublin Journal.

"Everybody has his faults," said Uncle Eben. "De principal difference in folks is whether dey's sorry for 'em or proud of 'em."—Washington Star.

A Tip and a Bat.

The woman with a baseball bat advanced ominously. "Are you the teacher that tore Henry's shirt?"

"Yes."

"What did you do it for?"

"Because Henry was naughty and wouldn't behave. To make him listen to me I took him by the collar, and he broke away."

The woman swung the ball bat toward the teacher.

"Next time he don't behave," she said, "you hit him with this."—Newark News.

Explaining the "Lamb."

According to the governor (remarks the London Observer), the people of Greenland "are all Christians," and they have a Bible, though no bishops. In some ways, the Bible—at least, the Eskimo Bible—differs curiously from ours. Much difficulty was experienced by the early missionaries in getting the fur-clad denizens of icy wastes to understand the pastoral images of Scripture. The phrase "the Lamb of God" proved especially perplexing. In the end it was converted to "the Little Seal of God," and all went well.

Easy Enough.

The colored preacher was a higher critic and denied all miracles.

"But, Caleb, how about the Hebrews crossing the Red Sea?"

"I'll 'splain dat. Dey crossed over on solid ice; and next day it was very warm, and de 'Gyptians just broke through de rotten ice."

"But, Caleb, my geography says that ice does not form south of the equator."

"Dat objection is nuffin. In dem days they didn't have no geographies."

Social Equals.

"Your Uncle Henry writes that he would like to have me spend a month with them on the farm, Dorothy," announced mother smilingly.

"Really? Is there any society in the neighborhood?" questioned Dorothy dubiously.

"I've heard him speak of the Holsteins and Guernseys. No doubt they belong to our set."—Merchants Reserve Life Magazine.

Joy.

The lady bank clerk had completed her first week, and a friend asked her how she liked the work. "Oh, it's beautiful!" said the girl. "I'm at a branch where nearly all the people we know have accounts, and it's so nice to see how little money some of your friends have in the bank!"—Manchester Guardian.

Piety.

Little Mabel, who belonged to a very religious family, asked for a second helping of her favorite dessert. "Mabel, where would you put it?" asked her mother.

The child, aged three, answered reverently, bowing her head, "My heavenly father will prepare a place for it."—Missouri Woman.

Done Hunting.

A young Swede appeared at the county judge's office and asked for a license.

"What kind of a license?" asked the judge. "A hunting license?"

"No," was the answer. "Aye tank aye bane hunting longenough. Aye want marriage license."—Freeman's Journal.

Saving the Youngster.

"Oh, hubby, such an instructive lecture. The gentleman told us that what you eat, you become."

"Huh?"

"What you eat, you become."

"Take that all-day sucker away from Tommy."—Courier-Journal.

Patriotism Encouraged.

Patriots.—First Subway Director—"We may have to provide more seats."

Second Subway Director—"Nonsense! Simply have 'The Star-Spangled Banner' played on all cars."—Life.

THE LETTER BOX.

J. D. T., Boston.—Your skit will appear. We need the stamps you inclosed for its return.

T. C. GUNTER, New Mexico.—Your communications and newspaper cuttings fill a felt want. You could hardly increase our obligation to you except by becoming a subscriber.

JOHN CICERO of Pennsylvania writes: "Please acknowledge me if you accept any correspondence from your reader of whatever ideas if any person can express his thought." Surely. We sieze upon truth wherever found.

R. H. L., Chicago.—Congratulations. The editor of the daily who published your quotations from Paine, with one selected by himself, will find the Author-Hero's writings from Revolutionary times a mine of truth at all times appropriate for publication.

F. S., New Jersey.—The first professional Sunday ball game was played at the Polo Grounds in New York, June 17. It was a benefit for the Engineers' Reserve Corps, soon to depart for France, of which the editor's son is a member; and was attended by about 25,000 persons.

A. J., Walla Walla, Wash.—Mr. C. V. Cook, president of the Rationalist Association of North America, was among those so unfortunate as to be arrested in Chicago for participation in a meeting where disregard of the registration and conscription law was advocated, June 14.

DR. WM. J. BRYAN, New York.—We do not question your honesty when you say the pages of verbiage you send us is inspirational writing dictated to you by your spirit-father, but what seems true to you has to us an opposite appearance. We have published some Spiritualist matter lately, and feel a strong sympathy with readers who pronounce it unutterable nonsense.

H. L. TWOMEY, Wyoming.—The two books you saw mentioned as "for those whose education is limited" may be "Travels in Faith from Tradition to Reason," by Captain Roberts C. Adams (25 cents), which was described as having no superior for beginners in the study of truth; and Joseph McCabe's "Bankruptcy of Religion" ($2.50), called by the reviewer "an authoritative text-book of the status of religion as it exists at the present time."

W. P. DAVIDSON, Chairman War Council American Red Cross, Washington, D. C.—As the Red Cross was founded by a Free-thinker, a Swiss named Dunant, who used the flag of his country as its symbol, we naturally are proud of its work; but if you knew how many times a commuter is held up by Red Cross workers between his office and his home, and how many calls are made on him and his family to contribute to its various activities, you would not expect one of moderate means to send any large sum to the Washington headquarters. You cannot sit in a chair or the seat of an automobile in Montclair, where Skeet-side is located, without risk of being penetrated by needles stuck in sweaters or wristlets or mufflers being knit for the Red Cross. The knitting-work is commendable, but we are of the opinion that the Red Cross should be financed by the government. Some of the collectors for it appear to us to be grafters.

THE CHRISTIAN MYTHOLOGY

A Work that Traces the Principal Features of the Christian Religion to Their Source in the Mythologies of Older Religions.

By BRIGHAM LEATHERBEE
Illustrated.

A feature of the work is the uncovering of the phallic principles in Christianity, to which the key is given in a series of illustrations.

"The Christian Mythology" is printed on light but substantial paper, convenient in size, handsomely bound in cloth, with gold sidestamp, and is provided with a sufficient index and a Bibliography that guides the reader to works drawn upon as authorities. The unpretentious little volume will bring light to thousands who know nothing about the origin of the dogmas they believe or the rites they practice.

Published by

The Truth Seeker Co.
62 Vesey Street New York
Price, 75 cents

The Ingersoll Birthday Book

Selections by
GRACE LELAND MACDONALD

(Mrs. G. E. Macdonald)
Preface by EVA INGERSOLL-BROWN.
(Granddaughter of Ingersoll)
Decorations by PAUL F. BERDANIER.

Cover by HUGH HENNESSY.

Printed in Color on Cameo Plate Coated
Sepia Paper, 252 pages, Octavo.
Descriptive Circular sent free on application.

PRICE, $1.65 POSTPAID
The Truth Seeker Company
62 Vesey Street, New York

This Is the Book We Have Been Waiting For

The Belief In God and Immortality

A STATISTICAL STUDY

By JAMES H. LEUBA
Professor of Psychology and Pedagogy in Bryn Mawr College.

The work is the result of an inquiry among men of science — biologists, sociologists, historians, psychologists — as to whether they believe or want to believe in a prayer-answering God and in continuance of life after death. The answer is altogether different from what might be expected in view of the frequent affirmations of the supernaturalists that belief in Christianity, or at least its fundamental dogmas, is held by the majority of the men of science.

It puts into the hands of Freethinkers exactly the information they want on that subject, with the facts and figures verifying it.

As a logical conclusion, founded upon the general aspect of the case, we have held that science leads its votaries to a rejection of such undemonstrable propositions as the existence of gods and the survival of the "soul" when the body is dead. Here we have the evidence, in statistical form, which confirms our view.

To the inquiry into the attitude of the scientists there are added statistics regarding the thought of college students regarding the same religious dogmas.

The author is himself a man of science, an authority in his special branch, which is Psychology, and he knows and sets forth the origin and history of the beliefs with which he deals.

No recent book has attracted more attention from the press, or presented such a serious problem to the supernaturalists.

Cloth, 8vo., $2, postpaid
Sold by

The Truth Seeker Company
62 Vesey Street, New York

MIRACLES OF SCIENCE. A Record of Scientific Progress in This Century. By Henry Smith Williams. Price $2. Postage 15 cents.

FOURTH EDITION
THE BIBLE

By John E. Remsburg

Eleven Chapters on the Authenticity of the Bible—
Thirteen on the Credibility of the Bible—Ten on the Morality of the Bible, with an Appendix of Unanswerable Arguments Against the Divine Origin and in Favor of the Human Origin of the Bible : : : :

Twenty-six Pages of Index, enabling the reader to refer in an instant to any authority quoted or Argument used by the Author.

The book makes some five hundred pages, and is printed handsomely on heavy paper, with wide margins.
Price, $1.25 net.

The Candle from Under the Bushel

(Mark iv, 21); or,

1,306 Questions to the Clergy

And for the Consideration of Others.

Instructive, Interesting, and Laughable.

By WILLIAM HART

Price, paper, 50 cents; cloth, $1.00.

Address THE TRUTH SEEKER CO.

MYTH AND LEGEND IN THE BIBLE.

By Keighley Snowden.

A valuable handbook for those who desire to keep handy a clear statement of the most assured results of modern thought as applied to the critical examination of the Bible.

Price, cloth, $1.50.

Address, THE TRUTH SEEKER CO.,
62 Vesey St., New York.

SELF-CONTRADICTIONS OF THE BIBLE. By W. H. Burr. One hundred and forty-four propositions embodying the most palpable and striking self-contradictions of the Bible with a summary. Price 15 cents.

THE FOURTH DEMAND. Religious Teaching in Public Schools, with Reasons Why It Should Be Abolished. By Woolsey Teller. This is a fresh and up-to-date discussion of the subject. Price. 10 cents.

DESIGN ARGUMENT. Anatomically and Physiologically Considered. By an East Indian. Per copy, 10 cents; fifteen copies, $1.

ANTICHRIST. By Ernest Renan. Paper, 50 cents; cloth, $1.00.

ASMODEUS; or, THE DEVIL UPON TWO STICKS. By A. R. Le Sage. Translated from the French. With 14 illustrations. Paper, 50 cents.

"THE CHRIST"

A Critical Review and Analysis of the Evidences of His Existence.

By JOHN E. REMSBURG

Author of "The Bible," "Six Historic Americans," etc.

In deciding who Jesus was we are compelled to choose between the character drawn with scores of divergences in the synoptics, and that other character which is elaborated by the gospel of John; for nothing is plainer than that though Matthew, Mark and Luke may have the same Jesus in mind, theirs is not the Jesus of John. Little of the Jesus limned in one of the gospels is preserved in the others, except the name. With the name left out would anybody be sure that all the gospel writers were writing of the same man? What resemblance is there between the Jesus Christ of the synoptics and the Christ Jesus of Paul that does not subsist between either of them and any other "messiah" known to the history of religion?

One who begins Mr. Remsburg's book with curiosity to learn what can be said for the myth theory is likely to end with the conviction that this theory alone is supported by probability.

There are chapters on Christ's Real Existence Impossible; Silence of Contemporary Writers; Christian Evidence; Infancy of Christ; The Resurrection of Christ; Character and Teachings; The Christ a Myth; Sources of the Christ Myth. An Index of 19 pages enables the reader to open the book at the place where he desires to reread or at the subject to which he wishes to refer.

599 Pages; 12mo; Cloth Bound, Linen Finish; Gold Back and Side Stamp

Price, $1.25

ADDRESS—

The TRUTH SEEKER
62 Vesey Street

TENTH EDITION.
Crimes of Preachers

A RECORD OF THE CLERGY WHO HAVE COMMITTED CRIMES AND IMMORALITIES.

As was said of previous editions, the record is startlingly instructive and will open the eyes of the people, proving as it does that in thousands of cases the Bible and the Christian religion have totally failed to keep even their exponents from committing acts of grossest immorality and deeds of darkest crime.

Cover in colors. 247 pages.

PRICE, 35 CENTS

Address, THE TRUTH SEEKER CO.,
62 Vesey St., New York.

Is The Bible Worth Reading?
And Other Essays

By LEMUEL K. WASHBURN

Price, postpaid, $1.

Address THE TRUTH SEEKER,
62 Vesey St., New York

DEPARTMENT OF ECONOMICS.

Havelock Ellis on Women.

It may interest Mary Monico to learn how one man adversely contemplates man, so I shall quote the following from Vance Thompson on woman: "Man alone, has prisoned the female of his race in an eternal monstrous zenana of sex. He has condemned her into a sex-coop, precisely as a Strasbourg goose is shut up in a coop and gorged until it is all liver; and then having made her all female, he calls her 'a female'; and then having made her all sex, he calls her 'the sex'."

"I say man made the human woman in so far as he could into a long-haired, short-legged, fat-backed female, and condemned her to one function in life; and then finding that mere maternity did not take up all the time of all the females, he invented harlotry. Lest the creature shaped, trained and set aside for sex should waste her empty hours, he invented harlotry, an infamy of which the animal world never dreamed and could not dream in its severe sex-sanity."

This also: "Woman cannot take her place in human society 'side by side with man in splendid companionship until she gets out of her skirts'; and 'woman's first rebellion must be against the indecency of wearing specialized sex-garments in public.' She must be 'a human being having other business in life than that of stimulating the sex-curiosity of the male.'"

"In a world of woman-enfranchisement the double standard of morality is predestined to death and damnation." And Mr. Thompson declares the house built for the free woman shall be "without locks and without bars." Mr. Thompson is responsible for the statement that Joan of Arc introduced three methods of warfare, and if that is true, did the voices prompt her in that also?

Far be it from me to severely criticize man for his treatment of woman in the past, for on his upward way man has stumbled in deep darkness; but today, when intellect supposedly dominates, it is strange that there exist either men or women who are not only willing but anxious to raise barriers between the sexes. Letting my own observations pass, I shall glean for you a few truths from the pen of Havelock Ellis.

It is as wise for women to become soldiers as men, and better far a woman comrade in war than an army of prostitutes trailing the army for no other purpose than prostitution; and to show that women can fight, turn to Ellis. "In all parts of the world, in Australia and Africa, as well as among the ancient Celts, Teutons and Slavs, women have fought at need, and sometimes even habitually."

Woman's endurance is summed up thus: "While the men among all primitive peoples are fitted for work involving violent and brief muscular effort, the women are usually much better able than the men to undergo prolonged and more passive exertion, and they are the universal primitive carriers." From this we may gather that as soon as the petted, pampered women amongst the idle rich revert to a natural existence, neurotic diseases will die a sure death. But there is little hope so long as their men insist they shall not bother their pretty heads about anything more serious than a dance or pink tea. As for the working woman of today, she is enduring more than her primitive sisters, and therefore is growing weaker with every passing generation, and while man sits alone in the saddle we can expect no great remedial measures. Woman knows the needs of woman, even as man best knows the needs of man.

The Indian chief who said "Women were made for labor; one of them can carry or haul as much as two men can," had surely tested woman's strength. "Women have everywhere been the first potters," and that seems to indicate originality, but the ornamentation was left to the men, which clearly shows women strove for utility rather than style; and woman's practical sense would alone qualify her in executive offices.

Ellis quotes Prof. Mason on the American tribes, in which he pictures woman as "the first cutler, the real founder of Sheffield," and in caring for the skin and flesh of slain animals, she makes herself the "patron saint of all butchers," and establishes her reputation "as the first currier and tanner. With fingers weary and worn, with needle of bone and thread of sinew and scissors of flint, she cuts and makes the clothing for her lord and family," thus becoming "the first tailor and dressmaker." She fashions moccasins out of the leather; out of fur, feathers, shell, stone or seeds develop doll-dresses, toggery and head-dresses, "creating at a single pass a dozen modern industries. She was at first and is now the universal cook, preserving food from decomposition and doubling the longevity of man. Of the bones at last she fabricated her needles and charms.

... From the grasses around her cabin she constructs the floor-mat, the mattress, the screen, the wallet, the sail. She is the mother of all spinners, weavers, upholsterers, sail-makers. She becomes the first decorative artist; she invents the chevrons, herring-bones, frets and scrolls of all future art. She is the first pack animal that ever bent under a burden in the world ... she is the primitive miller and thresher, gardener, farmer and nurseryman. Along the lines of industrialism she was pioneer, inventor, author, originator." She is also the primitive architect and agriculturist; "thus in Italy, among eleven million women over nine years of age, more than three millions are employed in agriculture."

Ellis has studied the facts presented by some six or seven hundred investigators, and after examining the physical differences of man and woman he concludes that in some respects woman is further advanced in the scheme of evolution, and in others again the man leads, and this, then, leaves the sexes on an even level as regards the physical.

To show how the reason of one age may be undone in the next age, let us consider Broca. "Broca, the greatest of French anthropologists, whose keen and luminous intelligence has brought so much light to the study of man, believed many years ago (in 1861) that women are naturally and by cerebral organization, slightly less intelligent than men. This opinion has been very widely quoted; it is not so well known that with riper knowledge Broca's opinion changed, and he became inclined to think that it was merely a matter of education—of muscular, it must be understood, and not merely mental education—and he thought that if left to their spontaneous impulses men and women would tend to resemble each other, as happens in the savage state."

As against Juvenal the reformer, I prefer the man of science; and to the unwary reader I may remark that Juvenal "plays in Roman literature a part corresponding to that of the prophets under the Jewish dispensation." But most fitting had it been had Mary Monico with Juvenal genius and candor said, "I'll do my best to make as much waste paper as the rest." It may be that I am obtuse, but I should never have dragged in a writer on art such as Ruskin, when it is the anthropologist and biologist we need to discover the differences of men and women; and better far to turn to Darwin than Juvenal the satirist. Classical writers there are a-plenty, but I would not think to draw upon them in this instance unless they present scientific data, and data, it may be said, is never satirical.

But let the fusillade of words continue until editor and readers throw us out of court. I am quite sure that the most scientific of scientific minds would not venture to map out woman's future because of certain physiological truths. To anticipate the result of the future evolution of either man or woman borders on prophecy, and I will have none of it—as ever, I await proof.

To return to Ellis, who quotes Dr. Englemann: "Physical training begun in early life, the habit of exercise, will do much to remove the susceptibility to injury during the physiological fluctuations of the functional wave, as we are taught by the acrobat, who under constant training from childhood on persists in her trying feats, requiring the greatest nerve and muscle strain and the highest co-ordination of all powers, unaffected by the menstrual period." Perhaps if for three days in the month we cannot take an ice-cold bath, we can at all times take an "ice-cold plunge" in politics, business, or the professions—yes, and perhaps we do!

I shall point out that men are everywhere usurping "woman's sphere" and are found as cooks, dressmakers, milliners, housekeepers, and yet no one seems to think them the less manly nor have we heard the women wailing because the men have taken their jobs. However, let us consider what to Mary Monico would be the ideal state of affairs. Remove the women from the professions and trades and more men may find work at greater wages, which means more men will marry and thus a very few of the cast-off women may find their "natural sphere;" then please remove the men doing woman's work and replace them with women, and these cast-off men must crowd into "man's sphere" and wages go down again—the same old industrial see-saw. However, let us suppose that all women will take to housework; are there homes enough to employ them all? No. Then, there being more workers than jobs, it spells starvation wages or harlotry. Need I go further to prove that Mary Monico is not even an economist?

"There is at present no country in the world, certainly no civilized country, in which a woman may safely state openly her wishes and desires and proceed openly to seek their satisfaction." Do we wonder, then, that women give way to deception and cunning? "The masculine method of thought is massive and deliberate, while the feminine method is quick to perceive and nimble to act. The latter method is apt to fall into error, but is agile in retrieving the error." Would the conjunction of these two methods prove a boon in governmental matters? Or is it best to ponderously deliberate and investigate the food question while the masses die in poverty?

Since the idiosyncrasies of woman may be traced to the peculiar sex function, she is at all times excusable, but to what shall we trace the idiosyncrasies of man, who does not so functionate, and is therefore unpardonable? I shall reiterate that if woman is "absurd" for copying man, then man is likewise "absurd," for he has copied woman, and your circle is still a circle. If Mary persists in falling into her own traps I shall not stop her. When a man's socks are full of holes he may not darn them, but must wait until he happens to meet some willing woman, the darned "wretch." I am thrown into a state of bliss when I see a man croon over a baby; that kind of a man is all wrong and so am I.

Hear Ellis again: "I think there can be little doubt as to the more ready intelligence of women among the uncultivated classes, whatever the reason may be." Also: "women start more readily from the immediate fact before them." ... "Riccardi considers that women have greater educability, sociability, domesticity, diligence and a more profound aversion than men." ... "In America Scott Thomas has found that young women graduate at an earlier age than young men in the same college." Then it is said that women are not such good workers in the postoffice and telegraphic field, but it is supposed that, looking forward to marriage, they do not put forth their best efforts. But here is a test case in telegraphy. "It is admitted that the staff is a picked one, but the results obtained are stated to compare even to the disadvantage of the average male division."

Needless to say that those who have attained to the greatest heights (excepting the stage) have been men, but owing to their deductive sense women have ranked highly as mathematicians. But the fact remains when all comparisons are drawn, that though women are at a disadvantage in some respects, they have the advantage in other respects, and we discover that the balance swings rather evenly and there is neither inferior nor superior. While the male shows greater genius, he also shows greater idiocy, and of the woman it is said: "From an organic standpoint, therefore, women represent the more stable and conservative element in evolution." ... Organic conservatism may often involve political revolution. Socialism and nihilism are not, I believe, usually regarded by politicians as conservative movements, but from the organic point of view of the race they may be truly conservative, and, as is well known, these movements have appealed powerfully to women." And so I judge women may be needed in politics in order that conditions for the better may the sooner obtain.

Ellis so clearly shows that this being an industrial age and woman being the mother of all industries, it is at once to be seen that our age has a feminine trend, and woman is after all but seeking to come into her own. Yet man alone remains the governing force, thereby compelling woman to remain a slave and dependent. "Those who wish to prove the absolute inferiority of the male sex" and those "who wish to circumscribe rigidly the sphere of women, must alike be ruled out of court ... a precise knowledge of the actual facts of the life of men and women forbids us to dogmatize rigidly concerning the respective spheres of men and women."

"Nor may we listen to those would-be scientific dogmatists who on a priori grounds on the strength of some single and often doubtful anatomical fact, lay down social laws for mankind at large. The ludicrous errors of arrogant and over-hasty brain anatomists in the past should alone suffice to teach us this caution. And so many of the facts are modifiable under a changing environment that in the absence of experience we cannot pronounce definitely regarding the behavior of either the male or female organism under different conditions. ... The respective fitness of men and women for any kind of work or privilege can only be ascertained by actual open experiment. And as the conditions for such experiment are never twice the same, it can never be positively affirmed that anything has been settled once and for all."

So, then, do I rest my argument with Havelock Ellis, knowing well that if Ellis is to be discarded, we must discard with him the ablest authorities on the man and woman question. And in the face of Mary Monico's self-aggrandizement I shall at all times retain my humble attitude of pupil to all the world, serenely sensing that the passing years may ever add to my meagre store of knowledge.

EMMA BRUNZELL.

A RUSKINIAN JUSTIFICATION OF THE WORLD WAR.

Today we have a great wringing of hands and a loud crying of voices that ask: "How was it possible for the conditions that prevail in Europe today to have occurred in our time and in our present stage of civilization?"

Only those who are culpably ignorant, only those who have not read Ruskin and Aristotle on Interest need be in any darkness or any despair respecting the great world-war which is an epochal episode and carries a messianic message.

The mathematicians have told us that if a penny had been loaned out at interest in the year 1 A. D., it would today amount to a sum represented by a mass of gold twenty-five thousand millions times the size of the earth. Only by revolution and repudiation can the ravages of this monster be arrested. The present war is Nature's attempt to check the attempts of the Interest-monger to put a mortgage on the earth to the last period of time.

Far from being a wanton waste of life and wealth, far from betokening the benightedness of Medievalism, far from prelude to a period of utter financial depletion among the peoples of the earth, this Armageddon is a veritable bow of promise to Humanity—the only one that has ever flashed its myriad hopeful hues above the drab level of economic serfdom since Commercialism first bore sway.

This war must not cease too soon: it must not cease until it has piled up debts so huge that the interest can never be paid; when the absurdity of Interest will surely be apparent even to our most learned professors and our most distinguished statesmen.

The grave danger to Humanity is not that the war will not cease, but that it will cease too soon, before the sum total of the debts, through it incurred, shall have become repudiable by its enormity.

MARY MONICO.

No Rejection Slips.—Shears—How is it that young Scribleigh has been attending church so regularly of late?

Typo—Why, he says that he likes to go where he is always sure of having his contributions accepted.—A. W. B. in The Lamb.

"Cursed by the Past;
Blessed by the Future"

REMSBURG'S LATEST WORK

Thomas Paine

The Apostle of Liberty

BY JOHN E. REMSBURG

This is the Great Address delivered by Remsburg in Chicago last year, pronounced a masterpiece of thrilling oratory. To the Address is added

The Testimony of Five Hundred Witnesses.

This list of the names and words of eminent persons in all walks of life who have praised Paine is a revelation even to his admirers and students, and the eulogy of Remsburg is unsurpassed.

220 Pages; 12mo, Paper, 50 Cents

Published and sold by

THE TRUTH SEEKER CO.
62 Vesey St. - New York

DYNAMIC THEORY OF LIFE AND MIND. By James B. Alexander. An Attempt to show that all Organic Beings are Both Constructed and Operated by the Dynamic Agencies of their respective Environments. Over 400 illustrations, 87 chapters, 1,057 pages, and a 3-column index of 11 pages. Price, express prepaid, $2.75.

FOUR GOSPELS. By Marilla M. Ricker. Cloth, illustrated, $1.00. Monographs on Robert G. Ingersoll; Thomas Paine; John Calvin; Jonathan Edwards; and What is Prayer?

SEVENTH EDITION — REDUCED PRICE

BIBLE MYTHS

AND THEIR PARALLELS IN OTHER RELIGIONS

Being a Comparison of the Old and New Testament Myths and Miracles with those of Heathen Nations of Antiquity

CONSIDERING ALSO THEIR ORIGIN AND MEANING. WITH NUMEROUS ILLUSTRATIONS.

IT is a perfect Encyclopedia on the subjects treated, containing a vast amount of out-of-the-way knowledge not accessible to the majority of readers, and all the objections to the dogmas of Christianity one is likely to encounter, grouped under appropriate heads. No author has struck harder blows at the Christian religion. It is the most important Biblical criticism that has ever appeared, being the result of many years of study of the religions of antiquity. It is thoroughly reliable, every fact being verified by copious notes and authorities.

COL. ROBERT G. INGERSOLL said: "This work demonstrates the fact that there is nothing new or original in Christianity; that its maxims, miracles, and mistakes, its doctrines, sacraments, and ceremonies, were all borrowed; that its virgin mothers, miraculous babes, courier-stars, crucifixions, resurrections, and ascensions were familiar things hundreds of years before the founder of Christianity was born. It shows that all the machinery of the supernatural has been in active operation for countless generations; that all the nations of antiquity had about the same religious experience, and substantially agreed as to the correctness of about the same mistakes. Catholicism administered on the estate of Paganism, and appropriated most of the property to its own use. Christianity furnished new steam for an old engine. Fables, like most other things, wear out and have to be patched, gilded, or replaced.

"The author of 'Bible Myths' has succeeded in showing that our Bible is not the great central fire giving light to the world, but a collection of candles and tapers and sparks borrowed by the 'chosen people' from those whom Jehovah, according to the scriptures, had left in the darkness of nature."

REV. M. J. SAVAGE says: "To me, the volume is worth twenty times its cost."

THE BOSTON COMMONWEALTH says: "Here we have evidence upon evidence that there is no myth, legend, supernatural occurrence, doctrine, rite or ceremony recorded in the Bible which cannot be paralleled in some ancient record centuries older than the page on which the same thing is narrated in the Hebrew and Christian scriptures. We confess we are curious as to how the orthodoxies of the Christian world will greet this book. We more than suspect that they will not greet it at all, but will be content to pass it by in fearful silence."

Seventh Edition: Large 8vo, cloth, 614 pages, $2.

Address THE TRUTH SEEKER :: 62 Vesey Street, New York

In Best of Humor.

The Other Way.—"You go to church very seldom; it is because you cannot hear?" "No, it is because I can."

The Reply of the Fan.—"What is the 'call of the wild'?" "Take him out of the box!"—The Lamb.

Denied.—Lawyer—Judge, I plead for the dismissal of the defendant. He's deaf. Judge—Not granted. He'll have his hearing in the morning.—Chaparrall.

Mary.

Mary had a little lamp;
It was well trained, no doubt,
For every time a fellow called,
The little lamp went out.

Temptation in War Times.—"O vicar, I beg of you not to mention the 'fires of hell' in your sermon today. It would only lead us into temptation during this terrible shortage of coal!"—Le Rire, Paris.

What More Could She Do?—Daddy—You little scallawag, I'm sure that you must have given him some encouragement.

Dolly—Well, yes; I told him faint heart ne'er won fair lady and sent him a case of nerve tonic.

Held in His Wife's Name.—"John," whispered his wife, "I'm thoroughly convinced that there is a burglar downstairs." "Well, my dear," replied her husband sleepily, "I hope you don't expect me to have the courage of your convictions."—Boston Transcript.

Veterans.—A Boston woman applied for a pension the other day.

"And pray, madam," asked the pension examiner, "why do you think yourself entitled to a pension?"

"My husband and I fought all through the war," was the reply.—The Labor Clarion.

Makes Penalty Fit Crime.—Mrs. Justwed—We hadn't been married a week when he hit me with a piece of sponge-cake.

Judge—Disorderly conduct. Five shillings and costs.

Mrs. Justwed—And I'd made the cake with my own hands.

Judge—Assault with a deadly weapon. One year.—Pall Mall Gazette.

Chilling.—Clarence—"Would you scream if I kissed you?" Clara—"Do you flatter yourself that I would be speechless with joy?"—Puck.

The Real Thing.—"They own a limousine."

"That's nothing. I know people who eat potatoes twice every day."—Detroit Free Press.

Looks Well in Print.—The Lady—"And you may say we suspect a discharged butler of the robbery."

Reporter—"When was he discharged?" The Lady—"Oh, we never really kept a butler, but I think it sounds quite well."—Judge.

Less Room for Fault.—Mr. Bacon—Did you make these biscuits, wife?

Mrs. Bacon—I did. "They're smaller than usual, aren't they?"

"They are. That's so you'll have less to find fault with."—Yonkers Statesman.

Joyous Expectancy.

Farewell to old dyspepsia! No more we'll have to take

A lot of chemical compounds for the digestion's sake.

The nation will be happy yet; with sugar scarce and high,

Not mentioning the flour and lard, we'll all quit eating pie.—Washington Star.

Didn't Think Quick Enough.—Before introducing Lieutenant de Tesson, aid to General Joffre, and Colonel Fabry, the "Blue Devil of France," Chairman Spencer, of the St. Louis entertainment committee, at the M.A.A. breakfast told this anecdote.

"In Washington, Lieutenant de Tesson was approached by a pretty American girl, who said:

"And did you kill a German soldier?"

"Yes," he replied.

"With what hand did you do it?" she inquired.

"With this right hand," he said.

"And then the pretty American girl seized his right hand and kissed it. Colonel Fabry stood near by. He strolled over and said to Lieutenant de Tesson:

"Heavens, man, why didn't you tell her that you bit him to death."—Kansas City Star.

Recognized.—An old farmer couldn't really believe that people who were miles apart were able to converse over a telephone-wire. One day his wife went to a distant friend who had a telephone in her house. During the afternoon the farmer sought shelter from a thunder-storm in the house of a neighbor, who also possessed a telephone and who persuaded the farmer to call up his wife as a little surprise.

Following instructions, the farmer put the receiver to his ear and, after the usual preliminaries, shouted:

"Halloa, Jane!" Just then a flash of lightning struck the wire and he fell to the floor under the force of the shock.

Rising to his feet and shaking his head wisely, he said:

"It's wonderful! That was Jane right enough."—Chicago News.

THE SOUL AND ITS BEARINGS

SHOWING

The Material Quality of the Soul and the Mechanical Nature of Its Functions and of the Business Relations It Sustains with the Environment on One Side and the Rest of the Corporal Organism on the Other.

BY JAMES B. ALEXANDER

This is a Materialistic book. The author does not believe that the soul survives the body. He says: "Is it right to lie for the concealment of a disagreeable truth—to inclose the vital truth in a pleasant husk of fiction by tricking the people with the delusion of agreeable falsehoods? No! Tell the truth! Let not the truth be brought into disrepute by unworthy and debasing associations."

A very frank book; serious, scholarly, convincing.

Price $1.00

Sold at THE TRUTH SEEKER OFFICE

Paine's Age of Reason

By THOMAS PAINE, M.A.

This edition of Thomas Paine's masterpiece is the one that is sure to become the standard for all future correct editions. It is reprinted from one of the first copies in English published by Barrois at Paris, January, 1794, and the proofs were probably read by Paine. It enables the world of the twentieth century to read Paine's AGE OF REASON as Paine wrote it in the eighteenth century. It is printed from large new type. 180 pages. 15c. T. S. Co.

THE CHRISTIAN HELL

From the First to the Twentieth Century By

HYPATIA BRADLAUGH BONNER

There is no book in the English language which describes the theory and experience of the doctrine of the Christian Hell with such fulness of details as this work by Mrs. Bonner. No one who wishes to know what this doctrine means when carried to its natural conclusions, as in the teaching of the Roman Catholic church, should fail to secure a copy of this startling work. Mrs. Bonner's sources are entirely authentic, and the reader is held spellbound by her graphic descriptions, which grow in intensity as she reaches the climax of her subject. There are some twenty-eight illustrations in the book, taken from pictures actually circulated by the churches, which serve to bring to view all the horrifying phases of this most inhuman of conceptions. This work alone is sufficient to condemn Christianity as a thoroughly unnatural institution.

PRICE, PAPER, 30 CENTS
CLOTH - 45 CENTS

The Truth Seeker

62 Vesey Street - New York

EXEMPTING THE CHURCHES

A Presentation of Facts and Reasons to Show Why

CHURCHES SHOULD BE TAXED

Argument of

JAMES F. MORTON, JR.,

Before the Committee on Taxation of the Constitutional Convention at Albany, New York. Expanded into a pamphlet of 84 pages, to which is annexed a tract by John E. Remsburg.

It Covers All the Ground

The many pretexts for the exemption of church property from taxation examined and exposed.

Price 25 Cents

Write for rates on quantities.
THE TRUTH SEEKER CO.

ETERNITY

World-War Thoughts on Life and Death, Religion, and the Theory of Evolution

By ERNST HAECKEL

(Professor at the University of Jena)

Author of "The History of Creation," "The Evolution of Man," "The Riddle of the Universe," etc.

Of highest importance are these latest thoughts of Professor Haeckel, which embody the ideas of a Monist philosopher and Humanitarian Freethinker on War, Religion, and the nature and origin of Man. The conclusions of the evolutionists on these questions are restated, emphasized and strengthened. Apart from severely scoring the hypocrisy of nations that profess to be followers of a Prince of Peace, and yet enter upon wars of conquest and make arms and munitions their trade, what the author has to say on the merits of the parties to the present war is given in an appendix. In the main he confines himself closely to the themes indicated—science, religion and humanity. He rejects utterly the Christian scheme of this world or any other.

Cloth, $1.25 net.

THE TRUTH SEEKER COMPANY

62 Vesey Street, New York

SELF-CONTRADICTIONS OF THE BIBLE. By W. H. Burr. One hundred and forty-four propositions embodying the most palpable and striking contradictions. Price 15 cents.

News of the Week.

A Roumanian mission to the United States arrived at a Pacific port June 22.

Mrs. Emmeline Pankhurst, British suffragist leader, arrived unexpectedly in Petrograd June 19.

Gifts of $284,000 from alumni and others have been made to Princeton University during the last few months.

Dr. Charles Brodie Patterson, the New Thought lecturer and author, died in New York June 22, aged 63 years.

James Montgomery Flagg is appointed by Gov. Whitman as official military artist of the state of New York for the duration of the war.

War registration returns show 9,649,938 men between the ages of 21 and 30 years, inclusive, have been enrolled for the country's service.

A report presented to the National Physical Laboratory at its annual meeting declares that the Tower of London is sliding into the Thames.

Two thousand machinists at the plant of the General Electric Company, Schenectady, N. Y., struck June 18 as a protest against the employment of a negro.

Dynamite Johnny O'Brien, filibuster and blockade runner during the civil war and the Spanish-American war, died in New York June 21, aged 80 years.

The Senate, after giving a tremendous welcome to the Belgian Mission June 22, heard from Baron Moncheur the terrible story of Europe's saddest country.

The Senate has settled the question of war tax on publishers by raising the postage on periodicals from 1 cent to 1 1/4 cents per pound, and levying a 5 per cent. tax on profits.

President Wilson gives his unqualified indorsement to the War Department programme for building the greatest fleet of aeroplanes and hydroaeroplanes the world has ever seen.

James Mason Crafts of Boston, a distinguished scientist, and president of Massachusetts Institute of Technology from 1898 to 1900, died June 20 at his summer home in Ridgefield, Conn.

In greeting Belgium's war mission June 18, President Wilson expressed America's solemn determination that on the inevitable day of victory Belgium shall be restored to her place among the nations.

Contracts for ten more steel merchant ships complete and for twenty-four additional wooden hulls were announced June 18 by Major General Goethals. The vessels will be delivered in 1918.

Throughout Germany, according to reports, all valuable grain crops are burning, as they did in 1915, in an unprecedented heat wave. A prolonged drought has not been broken since early in May.

Great Britain resumed shipping gold to the United States June 18 when a consignment of $22,000,000 from Ottawa arrived here for the account of J. P. Morgan & Co., fiscal agents of Great Britain.

Judson C. Clements, who for a quarter of a century was interstate commerce commissioner, died June 21 in Washington, aged 71. He had been soldier, lawyer, Representative in Congress and conspicuous public pleader.

The British Union Jack was taken up Bunker Hill for the first time June 18 in a military and civic parade commemorating the historic battle on the heights of Charlestown between the American Minute Men and the English redcoats 142 years ago.

Treasury officials have reached a tentative decision that all subscribers to the Liberty bond offering in amounts of $10,000 or less shall receive their full subscriptions. There were 4,000,000 subscribers, and the two billion is 50 per cent. oversubscribed.

It is officially announced that an explosion has occurred in the military munition depots at the Steinfeld, near Wiener-Neustadt, thirty-one miles from Vienna. The statement says three depots have been destroyed, and that 100 persons were injured.

The rush of the people of Thessaly, the most fertile province of Greece, to embrace the cause of Venizelos and the Allies is continuing, and now virtually all the populous sections of the province have repudiated the principles of the deposed Constantine.

The North German Lloyd liner Kronprinzessin Cecilie, in port at Boston since the early days of the war, was seized June 21 by Collector of Customs Billings and held for the United States Shipping Board, which will proceed to put her in seaworthy condition.

Minister of War Kerensky of Russia won enthusiastic applause in the Pan-Russian Congress of all Councils of Soldiers' and Workmen's Delegates June 17 by a ringing defense of his steps in attempting to make the Russian army once more an active fighting force.

Charles F. Phillips and Owen Cattell, the Columbia students accused of conspiring to induce other persons not to register under the Federal draft law, were found guilty in the United States District Court. Miss Eleanor Wilson Parker, indicted with them, was acquitted.

The German mark went to a new low level on June 9, when a despatch from Berne, Switzerland, said it had reached 71 francs for 100 marks, compared with 123.42 in peace time. The rate of the mark on that date dropped lower than the Italian lira, which was quoted at 72.

El Universal, which is probably the most important newspaper in Mexico, prints statements from twenty-three prominent civilians of Mexico advocating severance by Mexico of relations with Germany and asserting that Mexico's place in the war is on the side of the entente Allies.

The House of Commons June 19 by a large majority passed the final reading of the clause in the electoral reform bill dealing with the question of woman suffrage. It is expected that a proposal will now be made that the franchise be conferred on women on the same basis as men.

Emma Goldman and Alexander Berkman were indicted by a Federal grand jury June 21 on a charge of conspiring to induce men of military age not to register under the conscription law. Their trial begins this week. Miss Goldman has raised $25,000 cash bail and got out of the Tombs.

Alfredo Cocchi, the fugitive New York motorcycle dealer, abandoned June 23 his pretense of innocence of the murder of Ruth Cruger and confessed his guilt. Jealousy was his motive. He was unable, he declared, to win the girl's love, and became furious when she rebuffed his persistent attentions.

Excavating in the vicinity of the battered remnants of the Hindenburg line, British soldiers struck a strange object which proved to be the tooth of a mammoth. The discovery caused great excitement among the troops. The skeleton of the prehistoric monster now has been located definitely and the gradual exposure of it is proceeding under a scientific din.

At Rome, June 23, Monsignor Gerlach, former chamberlain at the Vatican, was found guilty of being head of pro-German propaganda in the papal court and throughout high circles in Italy, and was sentenced to life imprisonment. Pomarice, an accomplice, was sentenced to be shot. Both convicted men are fugitives from Italy. The conviction of Mgr. Gerlach is the climax of the Italian secret service's successful attempt to run down pro-German propaganda in the Vatican and Italy. Documents whose contents involved about 300 residents of Italy were discovered locked in a safe in a building adjoining the German embassy at Vienna.

THE WAR.

The Norwegian steamship Bissy, bound from Chili with coal, has been sunk by a mine. The crew of the steamship was saved.

After many weeks of inactivity on the Russian front heavy guns have been brought into operation and general activity is reported.

Vice-Admiral William S. Sims, U. S. N., has been appointed to take general charge of the operations of the Allied naval forces in Irish waters.

A large number of British and Indian prisoners taken by the Turks in Mesopotamia have succumbed to ill treatment or lack of proper medical attention.

Fighting activity on the west front is shifting to that portion of the line held by General Petain's armies and is assuming considerable proportions, with the French steadily advancing.

Members of the crew of the American freighter Hilonian, which was sunk on May 16 in the Mediterranean, said that two days later they saw the submarine sunk a short distance off shore.

The British have begun their winter campaign to wrest what remains of German East Africa from the enemy. This is the last of the German colonies to resist complete occupation by the Allies.

The German casualties, as reported in the German official casualty lists in the month of May, follow: Killed and died of wounds or sickness, 22,000; prisoners and missing, 26,562; wounded, 62,394; total, 110,956.

These casualties, added to those previously reported, give the following totals since the beginning of the war: Killed and died of wounds or sickness, 1,068,127; prisoners and missing, 557,410; wounded, 2,731,223; total, 4,356,760.

Comparatively small, but stoutly contested struggles for position characterized the fighting on the West front June 20, with the artillery activity growing in intensity both on the Flanders front and in the Champagne.

On all fronts the Italian troops have given a good account of themselves. June 18 there was fighting in the Trentino, on the upper Isonzo and on the Carso plateau, and everywhere success was with Gen. Cadorna's troops.

An American destroyer came back to its British port June 21 with a crew jubilant in the belief that they had rammed and sunk a German submarine. This is the first submarine the sinking of which a crew has reported.

The Germans made an attack June 19 on the positions in the Champagne, between Mont Blond and Mont Carnillet, which were taken by the French June 17. The official statement says the Germans were repulsed with heavy losses.

The crew of the Norwegian sailing vessel Perfect, 1,088 tons gross, has arrived at Ymuiden, Holland, the ship having been torpedoed and sunk. Two of the crew are Americans. The Perfect had a cargo of wheat from Bahia for Copenhagen.

A vigorous German attempt to recapture lost positions on Infantry Hill, on the Arras front, which Haig's forces recently stormed in two minutes, June 18 cost the British several advanced defense elements, but failed to shake their grip on the height itself.

Heavy attacks by the Germans north of the Aisne have been repulsed by the French troops with severe casualties. In the attack, which was along a front of about one and one-quarter miles, the Germans only at one point succeeded in penetrating the French trenches.

By a dashing attack June 20 the Canadian troops, inactive for nearly two months in the outskirts of Lens, snatched from the Germans a nest of trenches at the foot of Reservoir Hill, which the Canadian staff regarded as the chief German place of shelter between the Canadian lines and Lens.

Lectures and Meetings

The New York Secular Society. Mr. Irving Meirowitz and Mr. Nicholas Mitichuly of this society will speak at Thirty-seventh street and Broadway every Wednesday and Saturday night; and at 137th street and Broadway every Tuesday night.

The Rationalist Society of Toledo, Ohio, meets in the Arcade Bldg., Room 133, St. Clair and Jackson sts., Wednesday evenings at 8.

The Chicago Freethought Society meets in Corinthian Hall, Masonic Temple, Sunday mornings, at 11 o'clock; H. Percy Ward, lecturer.

The Freethought Congregation of Cedar Rapids, Iowa, meets every second Sunday of the month at the C. S. P. S. Hall, corner Eleventh Avenue and Third Street; Jos. J. Hajek, Speaker.

The Columbus Rationalist Association meets the second and fourth Tuesday evening of each month, 7:30 P. M., at the Hotel Vendome, Third street, opposite State House. O. C. Weatherby, president; Olin J. Ross, 23 East State street, Columbus, O., secretary.

The Friendship Liberal League, (Inc.) of Philadelphia, meets every Sunday at 2:30 and 7:30, at 1417 Columbia avenue. Open platform. The Truth Seeker and liberal literature on sale. F. Garfield Bowers, secretary, 245 N. Ninth street.

The Milwaukee Rationalist Society meets every Friday evening in Convention Hall, Republican House. Joel Rubin, Pres., 9, 10 Cawker Bldg.

The Denver Rationalist Association meets the first and third Thursday of each month at 319 Kittredge Building: Olive Oliver, president.

The Meetings of the Independent Lectureship of San Francisco. Walter Holloway, Rationalist and Lecturer, are held every Sunday night at 8 o'clock, at Golden Gate Commandery, 2135 Sutter Street, San Francisco, Cal.

The Toledo Rationalist Society meets every Wednesday evening at 8, Room 133, Arcade Building, St. Clair and Jackson streets. W. M. Braun, secretary. Speakers, Dr. Rullison, J. Carl, J. Braun and K. Pauli.

Tacoma Rationalist Society meets every Sunday at 3 p. m. in Maccabees Hall, 1109 Broadway, Tacoma, Wash. S. T. Hammersmark, Secy., Colonial Hotel.

The Ferrer Association holds public meetings at the Ferrer Centre, 63 East 107th street, New York, every Saturday and Sunday evening.

The Detroit Society of Truth Seekers (Lithuanian) meets the second Sunday of every month at 2 P. M. in C. O. F. Hall, Chene, cor. Trombly st.; Karl Rutkus, organizer, 338 West End ave., Detroit, Mich.

The Detroit Freethought Association and the Toledo Rationalist Society will hold a joint picnic at the Piers, a park at Monroe, Michigan, on Sunday, July 22, 1917.

GOD AND MY NEIGHBOR

The Bible Reviewed in the Light of Modern Thought.

By ROBERT BLATCHFORD

IS THE BIBLE TRUE?

This is the chief subject of debate today between Christians and Scientists the world over.

Robert Blatchford, who does not believe it is, says: "Is the Bible a holy and inspired book and the Word of God to man, or is it an incongruous and contradictory collection of tribal tradition and ancient fables, written by men of genius and imagination?" He answers Yes to the last question.

"We cannot accept as the God of creation," he writes, "this savage idol (Jehovah) of an obscure tribe, and we have renounced him and are ashamed of him, not because of any later divine revelation, but because mankind have become too enlightened to tolerate Jehovah."

"The ethical code of the Old Testament is no longer suitable as the rule of life. The moral and intellectual advance of the human race has left it behind."

CHRISTIANS declare the highest conception of God is the Christian conception of him as a Heavenly Father. "God is love," they say. To which Blatchford replies: "This is a very lofty, poetical and gratifying conception, but it is open to one fatal objection—it is not true!"

Mr. Blatchford does not believe that a divine being would need or ask for PRAYER and PRAISE.

"If you were a human father, would you rather your children praised you and neglected each other, or that brother should stand by brother, and sister cherish sister?"

"GOD AND MY NEIGHBOR," is one of the most thought-provoking books of the age. It is discussed from hundreds of platforms and in thousands of homes.

Cloth, 248 pages, $1 postpaid.

THE TRUTH SEEKER

THE REASON WHY

A Story for Freethinkers

By ERNEST E. RUSSELL

We do not know which will be most admired in this book, the narrative or the argument, for both are rich. The author has pictured religion as it is preached and talked, and has added brilliant and informing chapters on modern thought about religion.

In Paper Covers, 50 Cents

THE TRUTH SEEKER OFFICE
NEW YORK

THE CASE OF BILLY SUNDAY

A complete exposure of the greatest charlatan of the age, exhibiting his coarse vulgarity in the pulpit, his medieval theology, his insane bigotry, his vulgar abusiveness, and his fundamental dishonesty. Contains the famous parallel columns showing his stealings from Ingersoll, and presents unanswerable proof of the deliberate falsehoods with which he has sought to turn aside exposure. Now is the time to circulate this most effective of all propaganda documents by the hundreds and thousands.

PRICE, FIVE CENTS

For sale by

THE TRUTH SEEKER

62 Vesey Street, New York City

THE WRITINGS OF THOMAS PAINE. Collected, edited and chronologically arranged by Moncure D. Conway, with portrait, notes and historical introductions. In 4 volumes, royal octavo, gilt tops. Set, $10. Sold separately, per volume, $2.50.